

✓43033

april 7

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

43033

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXXXIV

JANUARY 6, 1932, to JUNE 29, 1932

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXXIV

JANUARY 6, 1932, to JUNE 29, 1932

(Nos. 3470-3495)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
C Correspondence
Ct Cartoon
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
I International Relations, Documents
IP International Relations, Foreign Press
IS International Relations, Signed Article
M Music
MP Moving Pictures
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

- A., Doctor
On Swiss bourgeoisie; C.....259; see also 167
A nous la liberté. M. Marshall; MP..... 659
Abyss, nearing the; E..... 130
Academic freedom
Reed, H., editor of Columbia university
Spectator, expelled from university;
EP.....411; E..... 455
Acting
Art of; E..... 246
Advertising; Dt 341
Agriculture
American farm; can it be saved? E. G.
Nourse; S 460
Farmers' plight. P. P. Slack; C..... 544
Alabama Negroes' case. See Negroes—
Scottsboro
Alcock, J. Curtis
Kentucky, views on; C..... 571
Alfonso XIII of Spain. See Spain
Alger, Horatio
Centenary of birth; E..... 186
"Alice in wonderland"
Whoop-la over original Alice; EP..... 529
Aliens
Keeping alien in his place. G. Horne;
S 40
Registration bill called indefensible.
F. R. Black; C..... 285
Allen, Arthur M.
Revolution, guiding; C....47; see also C 144
Allen, Devere
Thomas, N., presidential possibility; S.. 365
Allen, Robert S.
Commends Villard article on N. D.
Baker; C 516
Congress and birth control; S..... 104
Altman, George T.
Tax burden, growing; S..... 304
American civil liberties union. See Coal miners, American
American federation of labor
Unemployment insurance; federation ends opposition; EP..... 30
American friends service committee
Fifteenth anniversary; EP..... 501 American investments abroad. See Investments, American, abroad Americanism
In East Saint Louis, Illinois. C. R. F.
Smith; S 283
Americans
"Mind," American, as demonstrated in Lindbergh case; E..... 329
Ammann, O. H.
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
Ammunition. See Munitions, war
Amram, David W.
On situation of Washington-Hoover airport service station; C..... 116
Anderson, Paul Y.
Answers Mrs. Pinchot's criticism of his article on her congressional campaign;
C....170; see also13; 75
Banks' right to deal in securities, report on, buried in 1910; S..... 595
Brown, T., appointment; S..... 139
Cardozo appointment due to Borah; S... 251 Concentration of wealth defended by Secretary Mills; S..... 489
Congress, elections, to, from Minnesota and Missouri, must be at large; S.... 489
Congress maligned; S..... 697
Conventions, moronic; S..... 697
Democratic "harmony"; S..... 489
Finance, international; S..... 13
Finances; government plays politics; S.. 595
Financial writers, "tips" to; S.....538;
see also EP..... 528
Garner, John Nance; S..... 465
Geneva conference; S..... 489
Hoover; aid from adversaries; S..... 303
Hoover; books on; S..... 66
Hoover; ineptitude in economic crisis;
S 66
Hoover; McFadden attack on; S.....13;
see also C..... 75
Hoover; "selling" to public; S..... 251
Insurance employment, federal; Hoover opposition; S 190
Johnson, Hiram W., for president; S.. 139
La Follette-Costigan bill for unemployment relief; S..... 139
Legislative cooperation, Democratic and Republican; S..... 368
Loans, foreign; state department action;
S 66
Lucas, B., master mind; S..... 66
Mellon, A. W.; neglected; S..... 66
Mellon, A. W.; transfer to London; S.. 190
Moratorium, war debt; S..... 13
National credit corporation; S..... 13
Nationalism, resurgence; S..... 13
Newspapers, salary reductions; S..... 539
Prohibition in politics; S..... 303
Radio corporation of America; dissolution suit finally pressed; S..... 368
Railroad, loan to, scandal in; S..... 420 Reconstruction finance corporation; Hoover remedy for depression; S..... 13 Reconstruction finance corporation; secrecy on loans; S..... 251 Republican party, "contributions" by officials and employees; S..... 368
Russia, recognition of; S..... 539
Sales tax in congress; S..... 368
Short selling, investigation; S.....489;
S 538
Stimson press conferences; S..... 252
Taxation; battle in Washington; S..... 489 Taxation; dishonest arguments on budget; S 420
Taxation; program, Democratic; S..... 303
Unemployment relief; defeat in senate;
S 251
Unemployment relief; Hoover recognizes need at last; S..... 697
Wilkerson, Judge, appointment; S..139;
S 420
Young, Owen D., and presidential nomination; S..... 595
Anderson, Sherwood; house making; Dt... 114
Animal kingdom, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 151
Another language. J. W. Krutch; D..... 580
Anti-trust laws
Business, big, control of. W. H. Hamilton; S..... 591
Appleman, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Prosecuted for feeding poor; EP..... 30
Architecture
German. D. Haskell; S..... 292
Modern. D. Haskell; A..... 441
Arkwright, P. S.
Georgia power company not in Insull group; C..... 704
Armament limitation and disarmament
Danish disarmament and neutrals. P.
Munch; IS..... 296
Fish resolution for ban on arms and munitions reported favorably; EP..... 410
French public opinion; EP..... 611
Geneva conference; E..... 217
Geneva conference. M. F. Murphy;
S.....257; S..... 340
Geneva conference; American delegates;
EP.....3; EP..... 58
Geneva conference; America's role. D.
W. Wainhouse; S..162; see also EP. 29
Geneva conference; Chinese-Japanese question. M. F. Murphy; S..... 425
Geneva conference; French propose international police force; EP..... 181
Geneva conference; hollow pretense. P.
Y. Anderson; S..... 489
Geneva conference; meets. D. W. Wainhouse; S.....137; see also EP, 153;
EP, 191; C, 286.
Geneva conference; soviets propose complete disarmament; EP..... 213
Geneva conference; Stimson at; EP, 128;
E 53
Geneva conference; ten millions send petition; EP..... 181
Navy, strong, urged by Secretary
Adams; EP..... 58
Peace caravan, credit for. A. Martin;
C, with editorial comment..... 116
Peace organizations active; EP..... 355
Youth votes for peace; E..... 91
Arms. See Munitions, war
Army, United States
Officers, retirement of, proposed; EP... 58+ Reductions needed; EP.....154; see also C, 492
Arsène Lupin. M. Marshall; MP..... 320
Artists
Pictures for sale; E..... 90
Request to hold open-air market refused;
EP 481
As you desire me. A. Bakshy; MP..... 708
Asia
Conflict and overpopulation. C. V. Drysdale; S..... 107
Athletics
Yale announces radical changes; E.... 667
Atom, smashing; E..... 587
Austria
Default; on the brink; EP..... 85
Travel abroad restricted; EP..... 1
Austro-German customs agreement
French logic versus customs union. L.
Rogers; IS..... 179
Automobiles
Sales and business revival. S. P. Harman; S 493
Azaña, Manuel. See Spain

B

- B., A
Youth and war; C.....469; see also C 342
B., D.
Merry widow, the; D..... 294
Baker, Newton D.
League of nations, views on; EP..... 154
Presidential possibility. O. G. Villard;
S.....414; see also C, 516
Baker, Ray Jerome
Massie case; C.....727; see also EP 527
Bakshy, Alexander
As you desire me; MP..... 708
Forgotten commandments; MP..... 708
Hollywood tries "ideas"; MP..... 708
Monte Carlo madness; MP..... 708
Two seconds; MP..... 708
Baku, conditions and opinions. L. Fischer;
S 134
Baltimore, Maryland
Abolishes Sunday closing laws; EP..... 557
Baltimore Evening News
Correction; did comment on grand jury report on lynching case; EP..... 453
Should have been on The Nation's honor roll, not Baltimore Sun; C..... 74
Baltimore Sun
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931—7;
correction; Baltimore Evening News should have been on roll, not Baltimore
Sun; C..... 74
Band, one-man, traveling with. A. Warner; S 491
Bankers
To the rescue of business; E..... 613
Banks
And bonds. C. T. Norris; C..... 427
And "relief." S. P. Harman; S..... 627 Control. H. P. Willis; S.....422; see also EP..... 411
Federal reserve banks; new powers for.
S. P. Harman; S..... 260
Glass bill for changes in law; EP..... 354
Glass bill; study needed; EP..... 182
Postal savings, government banks for;
EP 213
Right to deal in securities, report on, buried in 1910. P. Y. Anderson; S... 595 Urbana, Illinois, suspends business to aid banks; EP..... 155
Barber, Arlie
Public and private ownership; C..... 259
Barnes, Joseph
Japan, economic insecurity; S..... 249
Russia, cultural recognition; S..... 565
Barnett, A. G.
Communism for America; C..... 74
Kelley, William D., views quoted; C... 20
Barter; Dt..... 469
"Bears." See Stocks and bonds

- Beast of the city, the. M. Marshall; MP... 380
 Beck-Linthicum resolution. See prohibition
 Beecham, Sir Thomas, conducting. A. Mendel; M..... 475
 Beede, A. McGee
 Food in old frontier days; C..... 372
 Behrman, S. N.
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Bell, T. H.
 If soviets should fail; C..... 342
 Bell county, Kentucky, O. See Coal miners, American Bergman, Doctor Walter G.
 Right to criticize upheld; EP..... 3
 Berkman, Edith
 Deportation case; EP..... 557
 Berlin, J. W. Krutch; D..... 82
 Biddle, William W.
 Asks Ohio readers to meet; C..... 545
 Bingham, Senator Hiram
 Quoted incorrectly in Massie case; C..... 727; see also E, 559
 Bingham, R. W.
 Kentucky, views on; C..... 571
 Biologist
 Presidential plan, 1932-1936; C... 312; see also February 17, section two Biro-Bidjan. See Russia
 Birth control
 And Congress. R. S. Allen; S..... 104
 And education. J. Dewey; S..... 112
 And sex morality. W. A. Pusey; S..... 111
 And social engineering. H. P. Fairchild; S..... 105
 Asiatic conflict and overpopulation. C. V. Drysdale; S..... 107
 Bill for information fails; EP..... 636
 Birth control, religion and the unfit. C. P. Gilman; S..... 108
 Cartoon 101
 China; not a solution for country's problem. A. Smedley; S..... 282
 Future of; E..... 89
 In disease. S. A. Knopf; S..... 109
 Issue of The Nation, January 27
 Letters, pro and con; C..... 195
 Moral validity. Reverend D. Cummins; C..... 371
 Nullification of law against. M. L. Ernst; S..... 113
 Pope Pius XI., position; S..... 102
 Sanger, Mrs. M., receives medal of American woman's association; EP... 500
 Spiritual aspect. G. B. Lake; S..... 110
 Bisson, T. A.
 China fights back; S..... 187
 Black, Forest Revere
 Registration of aliens; C..... 285
 Black tower, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 124
 Blanshard, Paul
 Negroes; not always lynched; S..... 42
 Blessed event. J. W. Krutch; D..... 266
 Bloede, Carl S.
 Ritchie, A. C., for president; C..... 703
 Blonde captive, the. M. Marshall; MP..... 320
 Bloss, Roscoe, and V. Bucher
 Want jobs in Russia; C..... 170
 Bolivia
 Loans, American 93
 Bond issue. See Unemployment
 Bonds. See Stocks and bonds
 Bonus. See Veterans
 Books
 Juvenile; Alger centenary; author no longer popular; E..... 186
 Publishing business; E..... 62
 Unsold copies; Dt..... 626
 Borah, Senator William Edgar
 Cardozo appointment due to him. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 251
 Presidential possibility; now or never. W. C. Murphy, junior; S..... 247
 War debt cancellation, views on; E... 503
 Borchard, Edwin
 Boycott, economic, of Japan; reasons against; EP..... 297; S..... 332
 Boycott, economic. See Chinese-Japanese relations
 Boys. See Juvenile delinquency
 Bradford, Gamaliel
 Death. H. Hazlitt; S..... 494
 Bradley, Rolland
 Trained reserves; C.... 286; see also 137
 Brady, Alice
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Bram, Jacob
 Asks Long Island readers of The Nation to meet; C..... 116
 Brandeis, Justice Louis Dembitz
 Upholds principle of government regulation of business; EP..... 381
 Brazil
 Loans, American 93
 Bread
 Bakers'; costly and tasteless. W. Raushenbush; S..... 164
 Breckinridge, Desha
 Kentucky, views on; C..... 571
 Briand, Aristide
 Death; EP..... 299; E..... 328
 Brickwedde, Doctor F. G.
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Bridal wise. J. W. Krutch; D..... 707
 Bride the sun shines on, the. H. H.; D.... 54
 Broken
 Experiment in turning goat into man; EP 711
 Brockway, A. Fenner
 India, government by ordinance; S.... 226
 Brodsky, Joseph R.
 Asks contributions for Scottsboro Negroes; C..... 601
 Brookhart, Smith Wildman
 Defeated for reelection to senate; EP.. 692
 Brooklyn Daily Eagle; contempt of court case; EP 299
 Brown, Thad
 Appointment to Federal radio commission. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 13
 Brown shirt army. See Germany
 Brüning, Chancellor. See War debts and reparations
 Bucher, Vincent, and R. Bloss
 Want jobs in Russia; C..... 170
 Budget. See United States—Finances
 Buell, Raymond Leslie
 On China and Japan, and United States action; C..... 285; see also E..... 245
 Buffalo Evening News
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Building industry, D. Haskell; S..... 550
 Bulgaria
 Default; on the brink; EP 85
 Burlesque. See Theater, the Business
 Big; control of. W. H. Hamilton; S... 591
 Big; failure of. O. G. V.; E..... 586
 Government regulation upheld by Justice Brandeis; EP 381
 Business depression
 Automobile sales and business revival. S. P. Harman; S..... 493
 Bankers and industrialists form rescue committee; E..... 613
 Banks and "relief." S. P. Harman; S..... 627
 Big business, failure of. O. G. V.; E..... 586
 Cincinnati method of dealing with depression. N. Klein; C..... 75
 Congress not cooperating; EP..... 269
 Equal to war. G. A. Coleman; C..... 399
 Financial recovery, road to. S. P. Harman; S..... 400
 Hoover; advice to buy now; EP..... 409
 Hoover; and the empty pot; Ct..... 715
 Hoover; optimism; E..... 185
 Hoover; prophet of prosperity..... 671
 Hoover; remedies; EP..... 610
 Hoover remedy. P. Y. Anderson; S... 13
 Problems permanent, according to National economic league; EP..... 585
 Recovery, chase for; Ct..... 641
 Recovery plans. S. P. Harman; S... 653
 Relief without taxation. G. Mallon; S. 645
 Revival forces at work. R. Vance; S... 724
 Rift in the clouds, a. S. P. Harman; S..... 704
 Tariff the cause; EP..... 610
 Washington views; EP..... 30
 What's ahead? N. M. Hunter; C.... 170
 World action. H. Hazlitt; S..... 642
 But the flesh is weak. M. Marshall; MP... 553
 Butler, Nicholas Murray. See Columbia university
 Byrd, Harry Flood
 For president. R. Flannagan; C..... 703
 C
 California
 Democratic primary result; EP..... 555
 Calkins, Clinch
 Veronal for November; P..... 680
 Calm within the cyclone (on Henry James). C. H. Grattan; S..... 201
 Canada
 Radio, public ownership; EP..... 636
 Cancer
 Knife or ray? E..... 483
 Capital gains tax; E..... 33
 Cardozo, Justice Benjamin Nathan
 Appointment due to Senator Borah; P. Y. Anderson; S..... 251
 Appointment to United States supreme court; EP..... 213
 Suggested for United States supreme court; EP..... 87
 Carothers, Doctor W. H.
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Carroll, Lewis (C. L. Dodgson)
 Whoop-la over original Alice; EP..... 529
 Cassidy, Maynard
 Prohibition, views on; C..... 626
 Catholic theater movement, "white list." J. W. Krutch; D..... 633 Censorship
 War; Dt 702
 Censorship, literary England censors verses; sends writer to jail; E..... 385
 Censorship, magazine
 New York city; EP..... 87
 Central Europe. See Europe, central Chicago
 Government bankrupt; EP..... 243
 Unemployment situation. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 534
 Chicago Journal of Commerce
 Views on entry of United States into European war; EP..... 182
 Child of Manhattan. J. W. Krutch; D.... 351 Children
 And parents; E..... 504
 Experiment in good government; Dt.... 492
 Children's bureau
 Twentieth anniversary; EP..... 481
 Childs, Richard S.
 Undergraduate Yale; S..... 70
 Chile
 Loans, American 93
 Regime, changes in; EP..... 710
 Socialist republic proclaimed; EP..... 664
 China
 Birth control not a solution. A. Smedley; S..... 282
 Revolutionary action; EP..... 637
 Chinese-Japanese relations
 Boycott, economic, reasons against; E..... 245; E, 273; C, 285; EP, 297; S, 332; C, 398; C, 399
 Boycott, voluntary, of Japan advocated. C. R. Long; C..... 342
 China fights back. T. A. Bisson; S... 187
 Discussion at League of nations council meeting; EP..... 181
 Hoover administration ineptitude. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 190
 Japan sends armed force to Shanghai; EP 128
 Japan the outlaw; E..... 3
 Japanese aggression condemned at Geneva; EP..... 85
 Japanese invasion of Yangtze valley; EP 298
 Japanese liberal view. R. Hoashi; C... 652
 Japan's aims; EP..... 214
 League of nations action. M. F. Murphy; S..... 340; see also EP.... 325
 League of nations affected by Japanese aggression; EP..... 297
 Manchuria converted into Japanese state; EP 241
 Manchuria; is there war? A. E. Hindmarsh; S..... 10
 "Methods" of dealing with situation. J. Sabloff; C..... 342
 Militarists, Japan, in control; EP.... 298
 Partition of China proposed by Japan; E 184
 Political opposition in Japan. U. Close; S..... 189
 Shanghai, attack on; EP..... 153; E..... 156
 Shanghai, horrors at. A. Smedley; S... 369
 Stimson warning to Japan; E..... 272; see also C, 399
 Truce, proposed; EP..... 269
 United States clarifies position under nine-power treaty; EP..... 58 War, open; E..... 217
 "Christless culture"; E..... 693
 Christmas greetings, canned; Dt..... 73
 Churches
 "Christless culture" scored by Presbyterians; E..... 693
 Clergymen and peace. J. Tractenberg; C..... 399
 Ohio clergymen; views on pacificism and unemployment; E..... 158
 Chusid, Paul
 Asks volunteers for Society for voluntary technical aid for Russia; C..... 728
 Cincinnati, Ohio
 Government, efficient; EP..... 215
 Method of dealing with business depression. N. Klein; C..... 75
 City affairs committee
 Leaders, J. H. Holmes and S. S. Wise, castigated by Governor Roosevelt; EP. 410
 City of song. M. Marshall; MP..... 607
 Civil liberties union. See Coal miners, American Civil service
 Spirit violated by Second assistant postmaster general Glover; EP..... 584 Civilization
 Downfall of; E..... 6
 Long life and sane one. H. C. Frost; C 428
 Clark, Barrett H.
 Forbidden words in the theater, pamphlet on; E..... 302
 Clark, Evans
 Peace; non-intercourse as means of preservation; C, with editorial comment.. 702
 Clergymen. See Churches
 Cleveland, Grover
 Letters sought by associations; C..... 373
 Cleveland, Ohio
 Primary election; EP..... 86
 Close, Upton
 Opposition in Japan; S..... 189

- Coal miners, American
 Bell county, Kentucky; American civil liberties union party suits officials; EP. 585
 Children, suffering, appeal for. O. Van Horn; C. 48
 Harlan county, Kentucky. J. C. Byars, junior; S. 672
 Harlan county, Kentucky; class prejudice and race antagonism play part in trial; EP. 710
 Harlan county, Kentucky; reign of terror investigated; EP. 30
 Illinois; Williamson is hungry. M. A. Hallgren; S. 457
 Kentucky; American civil liberties union challenges persecution; EP. 557
 Kentucky; editors' views; C. 571
 Kentucky; food and justice denied; EP. 214
 Kentucky; gets publicity; EP. 243
 Kentucky; miners and sympathizers to go on trial; EP. 585
 Kentucky; miners called out in Harlan and Bell counties by National miners' union; EP. 2
 Kentucky; situation; A. G. Hays; S. 619
 Kentucky; starvation and "reds." O. Johnson; S. 141; correction, C. 229
 Kentucky; students' expedition to, and situation; EP. 383
 Kentucky; university officials fail to aid students in investigation of conditions. H. Solow; C. 493
 Letter from miner; Dt. 651
 Coal strike. See Coal miners, American
 Cohen, Harriet. A. Mendel; M. 81
 Cohen, Professor Morris Raphael
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Coleman, George A.
 Business depression equal to war; C. 399
 Colleges and universities
 Academic freedom. See Academic freedom
 Financial difficulties; EP. 271
 Graduates find politics "dirty"; E. 483
 Professors' salaries; F. P. Garvan proposes reductions; EP. 453
 Radicalism not controlling; EP. 529
 Student radicalism; Dt. 571
 Students, liberal, suppressed; EP. 637
 Students vote for peace; E. 91
 Colombia
 Loans, American. 93
 Columbia university
 Harris, R., editor of Spectator, expelled; EP. 411
 Harris, R.; may be reinstated; EP. 481
 Harris, R.; reinstated; EP. 500
 Liberalism of President Butler questioned, in Harris expulsion; E. 455
 Report, annual, of President Butler; EP. 87
 Comic strips; Dt. 427
 Commonwealth college
 Appeal for books. G. Y. Rusk; C. 21
 Summer at. H. Coy; C. 727
 Communists
 Communism for America. A. G. Barnett; C. 74
 Disturbances, growing; EP. 129
 East Saint Louis, Illinois, studies Americanism. C. R. F. Smith; S. 283
 Fish-Dies bill for deportation and exclusion of alien communists; EP. 693
 Rumanian communists in jail. A. Most; IS. 322
 Starvation and "reds" in Kentucky. O. Johnson; S. 141; correction, C. 229
 Wolf-Easley scare; EP. 529
 Companies, holding. See Holding companies.
 Composers. See Music
 Congress
 Activities of house of representatives; EP. 527
 Butt of criticism; EP. 610
 Cooperation, Republican and Democratic. P. Y. Anderson; S. 368
 Elections to, from Minnesota and Missouri, must be at large. P. Y. Anderson; S. 489
 "Lame duck" session amendment submitted to states; EP. 242
 Maligned. P. Y. Anderson; S. 697
 Nepotism; EP. 710
 New Hampshire district elects W. N. Rogers, Democrat; EP. 58
 Revolt in house of representatives; E. 384
 Connery bill. See Pensions
 Consumer, information for. F. J. Schlink; C. 312; see also February 17, section two Contempt of court. See Courts
 Conventions. See Presidential campaign of 1932
 Cooke, Morris Llewellyn
 Planning for power; S. 621
 Coolidge, Calvin
 Oath of office taken twice; EP. 183
 Presidential possibility. F. R. Kent; S. 309
 Coomaraswamy, Ananda K.
 India, terrorism; C. 228
 Coon, Horace
 Individual action in crises; C. 196
 Cost of government. See Government, cost of Country life; Dt. 514
 Courts
 Contempt of court; Brooklyn Daily Eagle, case against; EP. 299
 Reform. I. M. Wormser; S. 224
 Cox, Father. See Unemployment
 Coy, Harold
 Commonwealth college, summer at; C. 727
 Crane, Hart
 Death; E. 531
 Credit
 Government and private. S. P. Harman; S. 21
 Inflation. S. P. Harman; S. 48
 Problem, real. S. P. Harman; S. 171
 Crime and criminals
 Lawlessness in dealing with crime advocated by Grand Rapids Herald; E. 639 Crisis, world. See Economic crisis, world
 Criticism
 Apocalypse of the world; transition and criticism. W. Troy; S. 723
 Critic's dilemma. II. The jest and the ear. J. W. Krutch; S. 16
 III. Pure criticism. J. W. Krutch; S. 430 Criticism, dramatic. See Theater, the Criticism, musical. A. Mendel; M. 318
 Cross, Leslie F.
 Milwaukee governmental plan; S. 537
 Crowd roars, the. M. Marshall; MP. 444
 Cry of the world. M. Marshall; MP. 607
 Cuba
 Loans, American. 93
 Cummins, Reverend Damian
 Birth control, moral validity of; C. 371
 Cumpson, Harry. A. Mendel; M. 81
 Currency
 Dollar, devaluation. H. Hazlitt; first article, S. 359; second, S. 387
 Dollar, French attack on; EP. 452
 Emergency. H. Hazlitt; S. 94
 Glass-Steagall bill for expansion; E. 216; EP. 664
 Gold movement from the United States. S. P. Harman; S. 677
 Hoarding, campaign against; EP. 298
 Hoarding; Hoover appeal shows official optimism; E. 185
 Hoarding; Hoover on; EP. 241
 Inflation—blessing or catastrophe? E. 530
 Money, easy. S. P. Harman; S. 145
 Sterling fluctuation. S. P. Harman; S. 428
 Customs. See Tariff
 Cutting, Senator Bronson
 For recognition of Russia. 566
 D
 Daily Eagle. See Brooklyn Daily Eagle
 Dalcroze, Emile Jaques. See Jaques-Dalcroze, Emile
 Daniels, Winthrop M.
 Railroads, future of; S. 699
 Danubian customs federation. See Europe, central Danziger, Samuel
 Ritchie, A. C., and public utilities; C. 427
 Davenport, Iowa; unemployment. M. A. Hallgren; S. 505
 Davis, Jerome
 Russia, recognition of; views of business men; S. 567
 Dawes, Charles Gates
 Appointment to Emergency reconstruction corporation; EP. 128
 Delinquency, juvenile. See Juvenile delinquency
 Democratic party
 Jefferson day banquet in Washington. P. Y. Anderson; S. 489
 See also Presidential campaign of 1932
 Denmark
 Disarmament, Danish, and neutrals. P. Munch; IS. 296
 Deportation
 Berkman case; EP. 557
 Fish-Dies bill for deportation and exclusion of alien communists; EP. 693
 From Los Angeles; Dt. 169
 Depression. See Business depression
 Detroit
 Free speech wins victory in Bergman case; EP. 3
 Deutsch, Babette
 To a friend who fears revolution; P. 547
 Detzer, Dorothy
 Work for peace caravan. A. Martin; C, with editorial comment. 116
 De Valera, Eamon. See Ireland
 Devereux, Katherine
 Work for peace caravan. A. Martin; C, with editorial comment. 116
 Devil passes, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 124
 Dewey, John
 Education and birth control; S. 112
 Dictators. See If I were dictator Diplomacy
 Benighted. F. L. Schuman; S. 563
 Disarmament. See Armament limitation and disarmament
 Distant drums. J. W. Krutch; D. 177
 Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. M. Marshall; MP. 82
 Dodgson, Charles Lutwidge. See Carroll, L.
 Dole. See Insurance, unemployment Dollar. See Currency
 Doumer, Paul
 Assassination; E. 557
 Downing, Doctor F. B.
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Drama. See Theater, the Dressler, Frank J.
 Case for boycott of Japan; C 398; see also E. 273
 Drugs
 Manufacture, "limiting." E. La Motte; S. 418
 Drysdale, C. V.
 Asiatic conflict and overpopulation; S. 107
 Dunne, E. F.
 Birth control; C. 195
 Duprene; real discoverer. F. D. Kershner; C. 116
 E
 Earhart, Amelia. See Putnam, Amelia Earhart
 East of Broadway. J. W. Krutch; D. 210
 East Saint Louis, Illinois
 Studies Americanism. C. R. F. Smith; S. 283
 Eastman, George, suicide; EP. 327; E. 358
 Eastman, Max
 Commends Villard article on N. D. Baker; C. 516
 Eberson, Doctor Frederick
 Isolates infantile paralysis germ; EP. 31
 Economic conditions, American. See Business depression
 Economic conditions, world
 Abyss, nearing the; E. 130
 Rumbings of a new crisis; E. 300
 Economic conference, international
 Questionnaire favors discussion of war debts, reparations and tariffs; EP. 709 Economic depression. See Business depression
 Economic nationalism; EP. 155
 Education
 Modern. H. Solow; C. 492
 Progress in. O. D. Wannamaker; C. 545
 Eisenberg, Emanuel
 Potential Christ; P. 705
 Election, presidential. See Presidential campaign of 1932 Elections
 Money, use of; E. 5
 See also Congress
 Electric power. See Power and power industry
 Elliot, Grace
 Rugs for sale for benefit of textile workers, Marion, North Carolina; C. 313
 Elliott, George Fielding
 Army, United States, commands; C, with editorial comment. 492; see also EP. 154
 Elliott, John
 German government change; S. 720
 Germany seeks a president; S. 255
 Ellis, Jean
 Lincoln on self-government; C. 20
 Emigration. See Immigration
 Ernst, Morris L.
 Birth control; nullification; S. 113
 If I were a (constitutional) dictator; S. 36
 Loans, foreign, controlling; S. 168
 Eugenics
 Study of, 1932. H. M. Parshley; S. 569
 Europe
 Central. See Europe, central Disintegration, financial and economic; EP. 85
 In extremis; E. 639
 Situation alarming, according to J. Sauerwein; EP. 664 Europe, central
 British urge action on French plan in Danubian customs federation discussion; EP. 382
 French logic versus customs union. L. Rogers; IS. 179
 London conference fails in effort at reconstruction; EP. 452
 European war
 American entry; misfortune of; EP. 453 see also
 American entry; reason for; EP. 182
 Photographs held back by War department; EP. 327
 Exposition of Indian tribal arts
 Artists and anthropologists on The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Ex-president, diary of. M. Ryskind; book, extracts from. 594

F

- Face the music. J. W. Krutch; D..... 294
 Fadiman, Clifton
 What is left of Goethe? S..... 678
 Fairchild, Henry Pratt
 Birth control and social engineering; S. 105
 Farming. See Agriculture
 Fata Morgana. J. W. Krutch; D..... 82
 Fatal alibi, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 266
 Fathers and sons; E..... 504
 Federal reserve banks and system. See Banks
 Ferril, Thomas Hornsby
 Blue-stemmed grass; P..... 494
 Fess bill. See Radio
 Finance, articles on. See Harman, S. P.
 Finance, international Conference; purpose nullified by Secretary Stimson; E..... 666
 Methods exposed by bankers. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 13
 Finances, United States. See United States
 Financial "reconstruction." S. P. Harman; S. 313
 Finger, Charles J.
 Commends Villard article on N. D. Baker; C..... 516
 Finland
 Fascism opposes government; EP..... 271
 Firstenberg, Sophie
 Seeks liberal discussion group in Brooklyn; C..... 343
 Fischer, Louis
 Baku, conditions and opinions; S..... 134
 Beliefs about Russia; S..... 331
 If the soviets should fail; S. 219; see also C..... 342
 Jews of Russia and the five-year plan; S..... 597
 Wages go up in Russia; S..... 8
 Fish-Dies bill. See Deportation
 Fiske, Minnie Maddern; death; E..... 246
 Flannagan, Roy
 For H. F. Byrd for president; C..... 703
 Food
 Frontier days. A. McG. Beede; C..... 372
 Menu of a century ago; D..... 371
 Foote, F. H.
 Moderation, madness of; C..... 229
 Ford motor company
 Riot at unemployment demonstration; EP..... 355; EP..... 326; S..... 333
 Forgotten commandments. A. Bakshy; MP. 708
 Foreign affairs. J. W. Krutch; D..... 525
 Foreign loans. See Loans, foreign France
 Election results; EP..... 555
 French logic versus customs. L. Rogers; IS..... 179
 Government; Tardieu succeeds Laval; EP..... 241
 Import quotas, restrictive; EP..... 327
 Political situation; EP..... 86
 Public opinion on armament limitation; EP..... 611
 Frank, Florence Kiper
 This nonchalant pause of earth; P..... 117
 Frank, Glenn. See Wisconsin, university of Frankfurt, Germany
 Architecture, "New Mayland." D. Haskell; S..... 292
 Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
 Freedom of speech
 Upheld in Detroit; EP..... 3
 Freeman, Joseph
 B. Stolberg takes exception to Freeman's views on Trotsky's History of the Russian revolution; C..... 515; see also review..... 314
 Frost, Frances M.
 Inheritance; P..... 654
 Lullaby for Jonathan; P..... 204
 Poem for Jonathan; P..... 374
 Sunrise; P..... 22
 Frost, H. Crawshaw
 Long life and sane one; C..... 428
- G
- Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
 Meets R. Rolland..... 167; see also C.. 259
 See also India
 Garner, Speaker John Nance
 Presidential possibility. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 465
 Garvan, Francis P.
 Proposes reductions in salaries of professors; EP..... 453
 Geddes, Patrick; death. S. K. Ratcliffe; S. 513
 Geneva conference. See Armament limitation and disarmament
 George Washington bridge
 Designers and builders on The Nation's honor roll for 1931..... 7
 Georgia power company
 Not in Insull group. P. S. Arkwright; C..... 704
 Germany
 Architecture. D. Haskell; S..... 292
 Economic conditions; patient Germany. H. R. Mussey; S..... 64
 Election. J. Elliott; S..... 255
 Election; Hindenburg fails of majority; EP..... 325
 Election; Hitler loses; E..... 455
 Election; presidential; EP..... 270
 Foreign trade not encouraging; EP..... 242
 Government, change in. J. Elliott; S.. 720
 Government suppresses National socialist brown shirt army; EP..... 480
 Hitler and Goethe. W. H. Hale; S..... 307
 Military reaction in appointment of Chancellor Von Papen; E..... 667
 Republic in danger; E..... 695
 Stand-still agreement on debts; EP..... 128
 War debts and reparations. See War debts and reparations Gerson, J.
 Hoover, President, strange career; book on; C..... 196
 Gilman, Charlotte Perkins
 Birth control, religion and the unfit; S. 108
 Ginsberg, Captain Abraham. See Hurley, P. J.
 Glass bill. See Banks
 Glass-Steagall bill. See Currency
 Glover, Second assistant postmaster general W. Irving Attack on civil service spirit; EP..... 584
 Goat, experiment with Fails to turn into man, on Brocken; EP. 711
 Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von
 And Hitler. W. H. Hale; S..... 307
 What is left of Goethe? C. Fadiman; S. 678
 Gold
 Standard in United States withstands withdrawal of foreign gold; EP..... 710
 See also Currency
 Goldman, Emma
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Goldsborough bill. See Prices
 Gottschalk, Louis
 Asks for Lafayette letters; C..... 728
 Government. See United States Government, cost of
 Must be cut; EP..... 354
 Government finance. See United States Government ownership. See Ownership, government Government regulation of business. See Business Government securities. See Stocks and bonds
 Grand hotel. M. Marshall; MP..... 498
 Grand Rapids Herald
 Advocates lawlessness in dealing with crime; E..... 639
 Grandi, Dino
 Phrase, use of. O. Guerlac; C..... 20
 Grass by the yard; E..... 34
 Grattan, C. Hartley
 Calm within the cyclone, the (on Henry James); S..... 201
 Great Britain
 Budget, protective. J. A. Hobson; S.. 568
 "Buy British" movement; EP..... 155
 Irish free state. See Irish free state
 Tariff; British seek reciprocity; S..... 197
 Tariff; country goes protectionist; EP.. 500
 Tariff; general, proposed by cabinet; EP. 183
 Tariff; opposed by economists; EP..... 214
 Tariff; Snowden threatens to resign; EP. 128
 Tariff, ten per cent, in effect; EP..... 270
 Tariff; wins. J. A. Hobson; S..... 393
 Greece
 Default, on the brink; EP..... 85
 Greenberg, Sophie
 San Francisco readers to meet; C..... 170
 Greene, Marc T.
 New Zealand, situation; S..... 675
 Gregory, Horace
 Poem for my daughter; P..... 146
 Poem for my daughter: II; P..... 200
 The third decade; P..... 729
 Gregory, Lady; death; E..... 640
 Gropper, William. L. Lozowick; A..... 176
 Grundy, J. Owen
 Asks readers in Hudson county, New Jersey, to meet; C..... 704
 Guerlac, Othon
 Grandi's use of phrase; C..... 20
 Gutelius, Margaret F.
 Russian freedom; C..... 47
 Gutman, Walter
 Sacco-Vanzetti, passion of; A..... 475
- H
- H., H.
 Bride the sun shines on, the; D..... 54
 Hey, nonny, nonny; D..... 707
 Of the I sing; D..... 54
 Sentinels; D..... 54
 Show boat; D..... 660
 Hackett, Francis
 Defends G. B. Shaw; denounces F. Harris; C..... 515
 Haiti
 Foreign loan forced by state department; EP..... 242
 Hale, William Harlan
 Hitler and Goethe; S..... 307
 Hallgren, Mauritz A.
 Chicago, unemployment situation; S.... 534
 Davenport, Iowa; pigs, plows and charity; unemployment; S..... 505
 Philadelphia; mass misery; S..... 275
 Republican convention; S..... 716
 Roosevelt, Franklin D.; S..... 616
 Russia, trade with; S..... 561
 Steel towns, panic in; S..... 361
 Toledo; bankers and bread lines; S..... 395
 Unemployment; how many hungry? S.. 159
 Williamson, bloody, is hungry; S..... 457
 Hamilton, Walton H.
 Control of big business; S..... 591
 Handel; presentation. A. Mendel; M..... 475
 Hargreaves, Mrs. Alice
 Whoop-la over original Alice of "Alice in wonderland"; EP..... 529
 Harlan county, Kentucky. See Coal miners, American Harman, S. Palmer
 Automobile sales and business revival; S. 493
 Banks and "relief"; S..... 627
 Bears, clipping their claws; S..... 287
 Bond-purchase plan; S..... 517
 British seek tariff reciprocity; S..... 197
 Business depression; recovery plans; S.. 653
 Commodity prices, slump of; S..... 230
 Credit, government and private; S..... 21
 Credit problem; S..... 171
 Federal reserve banks, new powers for; S..... 260
 Financial "reconstruction"; S..... 313
 Financial recovery, road to; S..... 400
 Gold movement from the United States; S..... 677
 Inflation of credit; S..... 48
 Investments, American, abroad; S..... 75
 Kreuger, I., and the holding company; S..... 373
 Money, easy; S..... 145
 Prices, slump of; S..... 230
 Prices, Wall street, reading; S..... 116
 Protection; S..... 574
 Railroads; deficits; S..... 728
 Railroads; legislation; S..... 602
 Rift in the clouds; S..... 704
 Sales tax; S..... 343
 Sterling fluctuation; S..... 428
 Stocks, taxation of; S..... 470
 United States steel corporation omits dividend; S..... 546
 Harris, Frank
 Denounced by F. Hackett; C..... 515
 Harris, Reed. See Columbia university
 Harris, Roy; music of. A. Mendel; M..... 26
 Haskell, Douglas
 Architecture, German; S..... 292
 Architecture, modern; A..... 441
 Housing; S..... 550
 Hastings, Mary L.
 Taxation of land values; C.... 493; see also Four-year presidential plan, issue of February 17
 Hauptmann, Gerhart
 Visit to America; E..... 274
 Hawaiian islands
 Naval control, as seen in Massie case; EP..... 155
 See also Massie case
 Hay fever. J. W. Krutch; D..... 82
 Hays, Arthur Garfield
 Kentucky situation; S..... 619
 Hayti. See Haiti
 Hazlitt, Henry
 Bradford, G., death; S..... 494
 Business depression; world action on; S. 642
 Currency, emergency; S..... 94
 Dollar, devaluation; first article; S. 359; second; S..... 387
 Hey, nonny, nonny. H. H.; D..... 707
 High pressure. M. Marshall; MP..... 267
 Hill, Robert C.
 Seattle; jobless enter politics; S..... 718
 Hill, Robert L.
 Seattle; power system and politics; S.. 253
 Hindenburg, President von. See Germany
 Hindmarsh, A. E.
 War in Manchuria; S..... 10
 Hirsh, Harry
 Defends Gayety theater, Minneapolis; C..... 286; see also E..... 158
 Hitler, Adolph
 Career and methods. K. Radek; S. 462; correction..... 516
 See also Germany; Prussia
 Hoarding. See Currency
 Hoashi, Riichiro
 Chinese-Japanese situation; C..... 652
 Hobson, J. A.
 Great Britain's protective budget; S... 568
 Tariff wins in Great Britain; S..... 393
 Holding companies
 Kreuger, I., and the holding company. S. P. Harman; S..... 373
 Holmes, John Haynes
 Castigated, with S. S. Wise, by Governor Roosevelt on city affairs; EP..... 410

- Contributions in honor of quarter century of pastorate suggested. H. J. Paul; C. 400
- Holmes, Justice Oliver Wendell Retirement; EP. 87
- Honor roll, The Nation. See Nation, The
- Hoover, Herbert Advice to buy now; EP. 409
- Aid from adversaries. P. Y. Anderson; S. 303
- Alarmist statements to senate; EP. 635
- All alone; Ct. 668
- Appointments. P. Y. Anderson; S. 139
- Appointments; narrow range of names; EP. 128
- Books on him. P. Y. Anderson; S. 66
- Business depression; Ct. 715
- Campaign strategy predicted. B. Rogers; C. 196
- Career, strange, book on. J. Gersong and E. Kremers; C. 196
- Chicago republican organization asks him not to run; EP. 381
- Chinese-Japanese situation; ineptitude in dealing with. P. Y. Anderson; S. 190
- Critic, Organized Farmer, hampered in use of mails; EP. 269
- Dictatorship in war time advocated by Hoover in 1924; EP. 584
- Finance proposal includes cutting smaller pay most; EP. 479
- Ineptitude in economic crisis. P. Y. Anderson; S. 66
- Insurance, employment, federal; Hoover opposition. P. Y. Anderson; S. 190
- Isolation, economic, of the United States; E. 89
- McFadden attack. P. Y. Anderson; S. 13; see also C. 76; C. 170
- Message to congress on finance; EP. 555
- Optimism, official; E. 185
- Pity Herbert Hoover. O. G. Villard; S. 669
- Presidential possibility. A. Pinchot; S. 336
- Prophet of prosperity. 671
- Public works, misstatements on; EP. 635
- Remedies for business depression; EP. 610
- Remedy for depression. P. Y. Anderson; S. 13
- Renominated; E. 712
- "Selling" president to the public. P. Y. Anderson; S. 251
- Unemployment relief; program; EP. 663
- Unemployment relief; recognizes need at last. P. Y. Anderson; S. 697
- See also Presidential campaign of 1932
- Hopkinson, Leslie W. Income tax, Massachusetts, federal and other states; C. 312; see also February 17, section two
- Horne, George Keeping alien in his place; S. 40
- Hot-cha. J. W. Krutch; D. 351
- Houghton, Alanson B. On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
- House of representatives. See Congress
- Housing And common sense. C. S. Stein; S. 541
- Building industry. D. Haskell; S. 550
- Howell, Basil P. India, terrorism; C. 228; see also E. 33
- Howell, J. C. Third-party movement in Florida; C. 286
- Hungary Default; EP. 85
- Hungry. See Unemployment
- Hunter, Nellie M. What's ahead? C. 170
- Hurley, Secretary Patrick Jay Services of Captain Ginsberg to him. P. Y. Anderson; S. 368
- Speeches; EP. 528
- Use of government airplane for campaign purposes; EP. 528
- I Business called not a public utility by United States supreme court; E. 411
- Idleness; Dt. 19; see also C. 196
- If Booth had missed. J. W. Krutch; D. 238
- If I were dictator Ernst, M. L.; S. 36
- Laski, Harold J.; S. 15
- Villard, Oswald Garrison; S. 67
- Illinois Coal miners. See Coal miners, American
- Riot instructions to national guard; EP. 86
- Immigration. See Aliens
- Income tax Increase should affect 1931 incomes; EP. 1
- India Crisis; Gandhi faced with imprisonment; EP. 2
- Government by ordinance. A. F. Brockway; S. 226
- Imports, falling off; EP. 528
- Irwin and Willingdon, views; EP. 528
- Moslem-Hindu riots; EP. 611
- Repression, British; EP. 86
- Repression, British; Gandhi in prison; E. 60
- Situation; EP. 327
- Situation; setbacks; E. 385
- Terrorism. A. K. Coomarswamy; C. 228
- War follows jailing of Gandhi and Nehru; E. 33; see also C. 228
- War—in India and outside. B. P. Howell; C. 228; see also E. 33
- Will for freedom grows; EP. 500
- Indians Courtship and marriage; E. 456
- Exploitation by federal government; E. 132
- Individual action. H. Coon; C. 196
- Industry Reconstruction finance corporation; E. 131
- Infantile paralysis (poliomyelitis) Germ isolated; EP. 31
- Inflation. See Currency
- Inflation of credit. S. P. Harman; S. 48
- Information for consumer. F. J. Schlink; C. 312; see also February 17, section two
- Injunctions Norris anti-injunction bill wins in congress; EP. 326
- Norris-La Guardia bill introduced; EP. 269
- Inouye, Junnosuke Assassination; EP. 213
- Insult system Financing and collapse; EP. 584; see also 704
- Insurance, unemployment American federation of labor ends opposition to government relief; EP. 30
- Dole or insurance? W. M. Leiserson; S. 193
- Hoover opposition to federal relief. P. Y. Anderson; S. 190
- Limitations and promise. L. Wolman; S. 508
- Wisconsin shows the way; EP. 183
- Workers' demands. F. Morrow; S. 222
- Intercollegiate disarmament council Vote for peace; E. 91
- International chamber of commerce American committee; statement on war debts; EP. 325
- International finance. See Finance, international
- Internationalism. H. Steichmann; C. 545
- Interstate commerce commission Decision on loans by Reconstruction finance corporation; EP. 381
- Inukai, Premier Assassination; EP. 583
- Investments, American, abroad Affected by foreign exchange market. S. P. Harman; S. 75
- See also Loans, foreign
- Irish free state Controversy with Great Britain over allegiance oath and land annuities; EP. 382
- De Valera wins election; EP. 243
- Liberty in. R. Reinhart; IS. 239
- Iron. See Steel and iron
- Irwin, Lord Views on India; EP. 528
- Italy Statement of international policy; EP. 451
- J James, Henry; calm within the cyclone. C. H. Grattan; S. 201
- Japan Assassinations; EP. 213
- Chinese-Japanese relations. See Chinese-Japanese relations
- Economic insecurity. J. Barnes; S. 249
- Fascism; E. 613
- Friction with Russia in far east; EP. 480
- Government turning from occidental ideas; EP. 354
- Militarism, reaction against; EP. 583
- Opposition, political; E. 189
- War with Russia not probable; EP. 665
- Jaques-Dalcroze, Emile; work. A. Mendel; M. 210
- Jennings, Leslie Jennings Dispossessed; P. 76
- Machinal; P. 344
- Summation; P. 518
- Jewel robbery, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 151
- Jewels Found by C. Kane; he gets reward; EP. 271
- Jews Polish, crisis. B. Smolar; S. 99
- Russian; and five-year plan. L. Fischer; S. 597
- Russian; home at Biro-Bidjan. W. Zukerman; S. 540
- Johnson, Gerald W. Ritchie, A. C.; S. 278
- Johnson, Senator Hiram W. For president. P. Y. Anderson; S. 139
- For recognition of Russia. 566
- Johnson, Oakley Starvation and "reds" in Kentucky; S. 141; correction, C. 229
- Jonas, E. A. Kentucky, views on; C. 571
- Jones, Orphan. See Lee, E.
- Journalists. See Newspapers
- Jugoslavia Default, on the brink; EP. 85
- Juvenile delinquency "Lost boy," play. E. Robin; C. 115
- K Kane, Charles Finds jewels, gets reward; EP. 271
- Kaufman, George S. Jimmy the well-dressed man; S. 676
- Keen, Doctor William W. Death; EP. 693
- Kelley, Florence; death; EP. 243
- Kelley, William D., views quoted. A. G. Barnett; C. 20
- Kent, Frank R. Coolidge, C., presidential possibility; S. 309
- Kentucky coal miners. See Coal miners, American
- Kershner, Frederick D. On discoverer of duprene; C. 116
- Kidnapping. See Lindbergh, C. A.
- Kincaid, Robert L. Kentucky, views on; C. 571
- Kirchner, Carl F. Disagrees with views of The Nation; C. 20; see also C. 259
- Kitchell, Richard Boycott of Japan; C. 399; see also E. 273
- Klein, Nicholas Cincinnati method of dealing with business depression; C. 75
- Knopf, Doctor S. Adolphus Birth control and disease; S. 109
- Kohn, Doctor M. E. Birth control; Dr. W. J. Robinson an early advocate; C. 195
- Kremers, Edward Hoover, President, strange career; book on; C. 196
- Kreuger, Ivar Death, and the holding company. S. P. Harman; S. 373
- Rise and fall. M. Winkler; S. 589
- Suicide; EP. 327
- Krutch, Joseph Wood Another language; D. 580
- Berlin; D. 82
- Black tower, the; D. 124
- Blessed event; D. 266
- Bridal wise; D. 707
- Burlesque; S. 647
- Catholic theater movement, "white list"; D. 633
- Child of Manhattan; D. 351
- Critic's dilemma, the. II. The jest and the ear; S. 16
- III. Pure criticism; S. 430
- Devil passes, the; D. 124
- Distant drums; D. 177
- Drama as a social force; S. 467
- Dramatic criticism, philosophical; D. 407
- East of Broadway; D. 210
- Face the music; D. 294
- Fatal alibi, the; D. 266
- Fata Morgana; D. 84
- Foreign affairs; D. 525
- Hay fever; D. 82
- Hot-cha; D. 351
- If Booth had missed; D. 238
- Jewel robbery, the; D. 151
- Lancashire lass, the; D. 82
- Life begins; D. 443
- Marriage of Cana, the; D. 238
- Merry-go-round; D. 552
- Models and paintings, stage, exhibition; S. 526
- Monkey; D. 266
- Moon in the yellow river, the; D. 319
- Mourning becomes Electra; D. 210
- Mr. Papavert; D. 177
- Never no more; D. 124
- Night over Taos; D. 378
- Pessimism in R. Sherwood's preface to Reunion in Vienna; S. 608
- Plays, best, and best performances; D. 707
- Plays, worth-while, at the new year; D. 28
- Robin Hood; D. 210
- Strachey, L.; career; S. 199
- There's always Juliet; D. 266
- Thousand summers, a; D. 688
- Too true to be good; D. 477
- Troilus and Cressida; D. 734
- Truth about Blayds, the; D. 497
- Warrior's husband, the; D. 378
- Whistling in the dark; D. 151
- Wild waves; D. 294
- L Labor Railroad workers accept pay reduction; EP. 154
- Turns to politics. E. Levinson; S. 648
- Wages, high and low, and prices; EP. 59
- Lady with a past. M. Marshall; MP. 320
- La Follette, Governor Philip F. On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7

M

- La Follette, Senator Robert Marion
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931.... 7
La Follette-Costigan bill. See Unemployment
La Guardia, Fiorello H.
Anti-injunction bill introduced; EP.... 269
Lake, Doctor George B.
Spiritual aspect of birth control; S.... 110
"Lame duck session." See Congress
La Motte, Ellen
"Limiting" drug manufacture; S.... 418
Lancashire lass, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 82
Lancaster, Pennsylvania
Nation readers asked to meet; J.
Weaver; C.... 516
Lanier, Mrs. Harriet
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931.... 7
Laski, Harold J.
If I were dictator; S.... 15
Lathrop, Julia Clifford
Death; EP.... 481
Latin America
American loans; 93
Laundry industry
Government interest in. F. J. Schlink; S. 620 Lausanne conference. See War debts and reparations
Lawrence, Massachusetts. See Strikes—Textile mills, Massachusetts Leadership
Wanted; E.... 482
Young, Owen D., views; EP.... 663
League for independent political action
Presidential plan, four-year, 1932-36, section two, issue of February 17; also
E.... 185; C.... 312, 313, 493, 545
League for industrial democracy
Student conference. A. M. Allen; C 47;
see also C.... 144
League of nations
Chinese-Japanese relations. See Chinese-
Japanese relations
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, joins opponents; EP.... 162
Lechlitner, Ruth
Song for Robert Herrick; P.... 575
Lee, Euel (Orphan Jones)
Trial; EP.... 129
Lefkowitz, Abraham
Mooney meeting called; C.... 115
Lehmann, Frederick W.
Report on banks' right to deal in securities was buried in 1910. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 595
Leiserson, William M.
Dole or insurance? S.... 193
Leserman, Lester A.
Asks Chicago readers to get together;
C.... 21
Letty Lynton. M. Marshall; MP.... 607
Levinson, Edward
Labor turns to politics; S.... 648
Levy, I. M.
Azaña, Premier, on Spanish policy; S.. 18
Liebeskommando. M. Marshall; MP.... 607
Lied ist aus, das. M. Marshall; MP.... 267
Life begins. J. W. Krutch; D.... 443 Light, electric. See Power and power industry
Lincoln, Abraham
On self-government. J. Ellis; C.... 20
Lindbergh, Charles Augustus
Kidnapping of child; Dt. 311; E, 301;
E.... 329
Newspaper treatment of kidnapping and murder of child; EP.... 585
Literature
American, new canon. C. Van Doren;
S.... 429
Lithuania. See Memel
Living, artificial; E.... 34
Loans, foreign
Controlling. M. L. Ernst; S.... 168
State department action. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 66; see also E.... 61; EP.. 128
See also Latin America
Long, C. R.
Boycott advocated, in dealing with Chinese-Japanese situation; C.... 342
Prohibition, views on; C.... 626
Los Angeles, California
Deportation from; Dt.... 169
"Red squad," activities; EP.... 2
Los Angeles Record
Wins victory in contempt case; EP.... 711
Lost boy, play, on juvenile delinquency. E.
Robin; C.... 115
Lovers courageous. M. Marshall; MP.... 320
Lowe, Robert Liddell
Kings bow their heads; P.... 431
Lozowick, Louis
Gropfer, William; A.... 176
Lucas, Bob, master-mind. P. Y. Anderson;
S.... 66
Lynchings
Maryland; follows routine; EP.... 383
Maryland; newspaper protests; EP.... 453
Negroes not always lynched. P. Blan-shard; S.... 42
- MacDonald, Vesta, and R. P. Utter, junior
Youth, plea to, for averting war; C.... 342
McFadden, Representative Louis T.
Attack — Hoover. P. Y. Anderson;
S.... 13; see also C.... 75; C.... 170
Mackintosh, Kenneth Appointment to United States circuit court of appeals; EP.... 213
Record; action in Centralia case; EP.. 127
McMaster, John Bach
Death; EP.... 637
Magazines. See Censorship, magazines
Mallon, Guy
Relief without taxation; S.... 645
Man I killed, the. M. Marshall; MP.... 212
Man who played God, the. M. Marshall; MP 267
Manchester Guardian
Scott, C. P., death; E.... 31
Manchuria. See Chinese-Japanese relations
Marin
Essay on. P. Rosenfeld; A.... 122
Marion, North Carolina. See Strikes—Textile mills, southern Marriage and divorce; Dt.... 227
Marriage of Cana, the. J. W. Krutch; D.. 238
Marshall, Harford T.
Praises A. Pinchot article, in December 16, 1931, issue, on unemployment relief, 1931 style; C.... 47
Marshall, Margaret
A nous la liberté; MP.... 659
Arsène Lupin; MP.... 320
Beast of the city, the; MP.... 380
Blonde captive, the; MP.... 320
But the flesh is weak; MP.... 353
City of song; MP.... 607
Crowd roars, the; MP.... 444
Cry of the world; MP.... 607
Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde; MP.... 82
Films based on plays; S.... 28
Grand hotel; MP.... 498
High pressure; MP.... 267
Lady with a past; MP.... 320
Letty Lynton; MP.... 607
Liebeskommando; MP.... 607
Lied ist aus, das; MP.... 267
Lovers courageous; MP.... 320
Man I killed, the; MP.... 211
Man who played God, the; MP.... 267
Mata Hari; MP.... 82
Mouthpiece; MP.... 553
One hour with you; MP.... 444
Passionate plumber, the; MP.... 380
Road to life, the; MP.... 212
Shanghai express; MP.... 267
Siberian patrol; MP.... 607
Sky devils; MP.... 380
Spider and the fly, the; MP.... 380
Taxi; MP.... 150
Tempest; MP.... 378
This is the night; MP.... 553
Trapeze; MP.... 607
Zwei menschen; MP.... 82
Martin, Anne
Peace caravan; C.... 116
Massie case
Defendants convicted; get one-hour sentences; E.... 559; see also C.... 727
Manslaughter verdict not liked in Washington; EP.. 527; see also C.... 727
Murder case, Hawaiian islands; EP. 57;
E.... 90; EP.... 155
Mata Hari. M. Marshall; MP.... 82
Maxey, Justice George W.
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931.... 7
Means, Gaston B.
Sentenced for grand larceny in Lindbergh case; career; EP.... 711
Meat packers Consent decree, supreme court action on;
dealers must confine business to meats;
EP.... 556
Mellon, Andrew William
Appointment as ambassador to court of Saint James; EP.... 182
Neglected. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 66
Transfer to London. P. Y. Anderson; S. 190
Memel
Coup d'état by Lithuania; EP.... 183
Mencken, Henry L.
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931.. 7;
correction; C.... 74
Mendel, Arthur
American music; M.... 524
Artists, musical; M.... 149
Beecham, Sir Thomas, conducting; M.. 475
Cohen, Harriet; M.... 81
Composer, American; M.... 578
Criticism, musical; M.... 318
Cumpson, Harry; M.... 81
Handel, presentation; M.... 475
Harris, Roy; music; M.... 26
Jaques, Emile (Dalcroze); work; M.... 210
Pelléas et Mélisande; M.... 377
Program making; M.... 377
Russian opera company; M.... 475
Menus. See Food
Merry widow, the. D. B.; D.... 294
- Merry-go-round. J. W. Krutch; D.... 552
See also New York city
Methodist episcopal church
General conference resolutions; EP.... 637
Milburn, George
Murray, W. H.; S.... 391
Militarism
Army and navy power in Washington;
EP.... 692
Reserves, trained. R. Bradley.. C. 286;
see also 137
Mills, Secretary Ogden Livingston
Comments on house revenue bill; EP.. 451
Defends concentration of wealth; S.... 489
Disparages federal unemployment relief, in figures on balancing budget; E.... 665
Speeches; EP.... 528
Milwaukee
Family welfare association relief plan. P.
Salsberry; C.. 196; see also Dt.... 19
Finances in good order; EP.... 87
Governmental plan of socialists. L. F.
Cross; S.... 537
"Mind," American. See Americans
Miners, coal. See Coal miners
Ministers (religious). See Churches
Minneapolis morals; E.. 158; see also C.... 286
Minnesota
Congress, elections to, must be at large.
P. Y. Anderson; S.... 489
Missouri, Pacific railroad Loan by Reconstruction finance corporation approved; EP.... 381
Loan scandal. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 420
Mobs. See Repression
Moderation, madness of. F. H. Foote; C. 229
Monaghan, John
Birth control; C.... 195
Money. See Currency
Monkey. J. W. Krutch; D.... 266
Montana
Power companies' evasion of just taxes fought by Western Progressive; EP.. 481
Monte Carlo madness. A. Bakshy; MP.. 708
Monuments; Dt.... 285
Moon in the yellow river, the. J. W.
Krutch; D.... 319
Mooney, Thomas J.
Meeting called. A. Lefkowitz; C.... 115
Rolph refuses to pardon him; EP.... 500
Morrow, Felix
Cox's army; C.... 144
Workers' demands; S.... 222
Morvillo, Doctor Giuseppe
Letter to "Mr. Willard"; C.... 144
Most, Amicus
Rumanian communists in jail; IS.... 322
Motion pictures. See Moving pictures
Mourning becomes Electra. J. W. Krutch;
D.... 210
Mouthpiece. M. Marshall; MP.... 553
Moving pictures
Better movies, move for. K. White; C. 286
Films based on plays. M. Marshall; S.. 28
Hollywood tries "ideas"; 708
Sexuality in advertisements; E.... 714
Mr. Papavert. J. W. Krutch; D.... 177
Mummiani, Vincent
Commissioner Mulrooney denies use of "third degree"; EP.... 215
Munch, Peter
Danish disarmament and neutrals; IS.. 296
Munitions, war
Profits in blood; E.... 713
Murphy, Doctor G. M.
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931.... 7
Murphy, J. Edwin
On placing of Baltimore Evening News on The Nation's honor roll; C.... 74
Murphy, M. Farmer
Geneva conference; Japanese-Chinese question; S.... 425
League of nations and Chinese-Japanese situation; S.... 340
Murphy, William C., junior
Presidential possibilities. W. E. Borah; S. 247
Murray, Governor William Henry
Presidential possibility. G. Milburn; S. 391
"Voluntary" contributions to his campaign; C.... 652
Music
American. A. Mendel; M.... 524
Artists, musical. A. Mendel; M.... 149
Composer, American. A. Mendel; M.. 578 Musicians
Unemployment; EP.... 129
Mussey, Henry Raymond
Germany, patient; S.... 64
Russia's new religion; S.... 511
Muste, A. J.
Lawrence strikers, aid for; C.... 74
Mystery expresses; Dt.... 727
- N Nation, The Albany meeting; O. G. Villard to speak.
H. P. Winchester; C.... 372
Albany meeting; postponed; C.... 400

- Berkeley, California, readers' study group; C..... 545
 Birth control issue, January 27
 Brooklyn readers asked to form discussion group. S. Firstenberg; C..... 343
 Chicago readers asked to form group. L. A. Leserman; C..... 21
 Disagreement with views by correspondent. C. F. Kirchner; C...20; see also C..... 259
 Honor roll for 1931....7; see also C... 116
 Hudson county, New Jersey, readers asked to meet. J. O. Grundy; C.... 704
 Lancaster, Pennsylvania, readers asked to meet. J. Weaver; C..... 516
 Letter to "Mr. Willard." G. Morvillo; C..... 144
 Long Island readers asked to meet. J. Bram; C..... 116
 Nation clubs suggested by a subscriber of sixty-seven years' standing. J. T. Sunderland; C..... 259
 Praise from subscriber. A. T. Rogers; C. 21
 San Francisco readers to meet. S. Greenberg; C..... 170
 Will support N. Thomas for presidency; EP..... 610
 National banks. See Banks
 National commission on law enforcement and observance (Wickersham commission)
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931 7
 National credit corporation
 Failure. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 13
 National economic league
 Problems, permanent, of economic depression, ballot on; EP..... 585
 Straw vote on economic conditions; EP. 58
 National socialists. See Germany
 Nationalism, American. See United States
 Nationalism, economic; EP..... 155
 Navy, United States
 Strong navy urged by Secretary Adams; EP..... 58
 Nazimova, Alla
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931.... 7
 Nearing the abyss; E..... 130
 Negroes
 Alabama boys' case. See Negroes—
 Scottsboro
 Children, in New York; E..... 588
 Lynchings. See Lynchings
 Scottsboro, Alabama, case; contributions for defense asked. J. R. Brodsky; C.. 601
 Scottsboro case; quarrel in defense forces; E..... 61
 Scottsboro case; state supreme court upholds conviction; EP..... 383
 Scottsboro case; state supreme court denies rehearing; EP..... 453
 Scottsboro case; United States supreme court to review case; EP..... 664
 Texas disfranchisement law declared unconstitutional; EP..... 556
 Nehru, Jawaharlal. See India Nerves
 Growth, discovery of; EP..... 31
 Never no more. J. W. Krutch; D..... 124
 "New Maryland." See Frankfort
 New York city
 Corruption disclosed by Seabury report; EP..... 127
 Demand for removal of Mayor Walker sent to Governor Roosevelt; EP..... 692
 Investigation; open letter to Samuel Seabury; E..... 32
 Jimmy, the well-dressed man. G. S. Kaufman; S..... 676
 Play, Merry-go-round, satirizing government, has difficulties; E..... 559
 Politics; J. H. Holmes and S. S. Wise castigated by Governor Roosevelt; EP. 410
 Tammany hall rule scored by Seabury; EP..... 270
 Unemployment relief funds running low; EP..... 452
 Visit to, on one hundred dollars; Dt.. 544
 Walker financial transactions under fire; EP..... 611
 New York telephone company
 Charges for "French" instruments to be maintained; EP..... 710
 Charity charged to operating expenses; stockholders do not control company; EP..... 452
 New York Times
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931.... 7
 Policy; EP..... 31
 New York World
 Nice story; about A. Sandoval. P. Sifton; S..... 44
 New Zealand
 Situation. M. T. Greene; S..... 675
 Unemployment and other troubles; EP.. 636
 News reels; Dt..... 677
 Newspapers
 Financial writers, "tips" to. P. Y. Anderson; S..538; see also EP..... 528
 Lindbergh case, treatment of; EP..... 585
 Los Angeles Record wins in contempt case; EP..... 711
 Pictures, double use of; EP..... 299
 Salary reductions. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 539
 Nicaragua
 Elections; hands off. C. A. Thomson; C. 46
 Nieuwlands, J. A.
 Real discoverer of duprene. F. D. Kershner; C..... 116
 Night over Taos. J. W. Krutch; D..... 378
 Nineteen thirty-two Challenge of; E..... 4
 Norris bill. See Injunctions
 Norris, Clark T.
 Banks and bonds; C..... 47
 Norris, Senator George William
 Anti-injunction bill introduced; EP.... 269
 Nourse, E. G.
 Can American farm be saved? S..... 460
 Novak, Sonia Ruthele
 Too much learning; P..... 628
 O
 Occupations; Dt..... 114
 Ocean travel; Dt..... 258
 Of thee I sing. H. H.; D..... 54
 Ohio
 Ministers' views on pacifism and unemployment; E..... 158
 Old-age pensions
 Connery bill reported; EP..... 215
 "Olive branch petition," sale of; EP..... 155
 Olson, Governor Floyd
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931.... 7
 One hour with you. M. Marshall; MP.... 444
 O'Neill, Eugene
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931.... 7
 Opera
 American, future of. W. Sergeant; S.. 389
 Organized Farmer
 Hampered in use of mails for criticism of Hoover; EP..... 269
 Oulahan, Richard V.
 Death; EP..... 31
 Overpopulation. See Birth control.
 Owens, Hamilton
 On placing of Baltimore Evening News on The Nation's honor roll; C..... 74
 Ownership, government
 Public and private ownership. A. Barber; C.....259; see also C..... 20
 P Pacifism
 Alien pacifist may not become American citizen; EP..... 154
 At university of Southern California; C. 313
 Freedom of speech upheld in Detroit; EP. 3
 Lesson for candidates in action of Ohio ministers; E..... 158
 Rochester, New York, judge subjects girls to mental examination; EP..... 480
 Packers. See Meat packers
 Painters. See Artists
 Parents and children; E..... 504
 Parshley, H. M.
 Eugenics, 1932; S..... 569
 Pasadena, California, lights its own. W. Sidney; S..... 72 Passionate plumber, the. M. Marshall; MP. 380
 Paul, Hugo Jaures
 Contributions for J. H. Holmes suggested; C..... 400
 Peace
 Clergymen and peace. J. Tractenberg; C. 399
 Enforcement; EP..... 556
 Non-intercourse as a means of preservation. E. Clark; C, with editorial comment 702
 Sharp, D. L., views on war and peace. G. H. Sharp; C..... 651
 Youth works for peace; E..... 91
 Peace caravan. See Armament limitation
 Pelléas et Mélisande. A. Mendel; M..... 377
 Pensions, old-age. See Old-age pensions
 Peru
 Loans, American 93
 Peterson, Willie
 Story of. P. Blanshard; S..... 42
 Pettingill, Robert B.
 Prohibition, views on; C..... 626
 Phifer, Lyndon B.
 Prohibition, views on; C..... 626
 Philadelphia
 Mass misery. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 275
 Philippine Islands
 Independence; bill passed by house; EP. 409
 Independence; house votes for it; E.... 454
 Independence; limited; EP..... 299
 Photographs, war. See European war
 Pinchot, Amos
 Commends Villard article on N. D. Baker; C..... 516
 Hoover, presidential possibility; S..... 336
 Unemployment relief article, in December 16, 1931, issue, praised. H. T. Marshall; C..... 47
 Pinchot, Cornelia Bryce
 Makes a correction concerning congressional campaign; C.....75; see also C..... 170
 Pittman, Senator Key
 For recognition of Russia..... 566
 Pius XI, Pope
 Birth control, position on; S..... 102
 Plays. See Theater, the Plunkett, Sir Horace; death; EP..... 383
 Poems
 Antique evening. L. Riggs..... 401
 Bar of shade. M. de L. Welch..... 471
 Blue-stemmed grass. T. H. Ferril..... 494
 Bore, the. M. Van Doren..... 76
 Dispossessed. L. N. Jennings..... 76
 Harbor, the. L. Riggs..... 288
 I taught the angel. H. S. White..... 49
 Inheritance. F. M. Frost..... 654
 Kings bow their heads. R. L. Lowe..... 431
 Light will be wisdom. H. S. White..... 603
 Lullaby for Jonathan. F. M. Frost.... 294
 Machinal. L. N. Jennings..... 344
 O quietly the earth is spun. H. S. White..... 681
 Of two eternities. I. Schneider..... 140
 Poem for Jonathan. F. M. Frost..... 374
 Poem for my daughter. H. Gregory.... 146
 Poem for my daughter. II. H. Gregory 200
 Potential Christ. E. Eisenberg..... 705
 So long it has for echoing. E. L. Walton..... 231
 Song for Robert Herrick. R. Lechlitter 575
 Summation. L. N. Jennings..... 518
 Sunrise. F. M. Frost..... 22
 Third decade, the. H. Gregory..... 729
 This nonchalant pause of earth. F. K. Frank..... 117
 To a friend who fears revolution. B. Deutsch..... 549
 Too much learning. S. R. Novak..... 628
 Unnatural love. A. Tate..... 314
 Veronal for November. C. Calkins..... 680
 Windherd. I. Schneider..... 261
 Winter: 1932. J. Rorty..... 172
 Poetry
 What is a poet? M. Van Doren; S.... 624
 Poland
 Jews. See Jews
 Pilsudski tyranny; EP..... 86
 Ukraine. See Ukraine
 Police
 "Third degree"; Pennsylvania editor's fight against; E..... 357
 "Third degree"; use in Mummiani case denied by Commissioner Mulrooney; EP..... 215
 Police Gazette; suspension threatened; EP... 215
 Poliomyelitis. See Infantile paralysis Politics
 Too "dirty" for college men; E..... 483
 Pope. See Pius XI, Pope
 Population. See Birth control
 Porter, Paul
 League for industrial conference, student conference; C....144; see also C.... 47
 Postal savings. See Banks
 Postmasters
 Demand that they support Hoover; EP.. 584
 Pound, Cuthbert W.
 Appointment as chief judge of New York state court of appeals; EP..... 326
 Power and power industry
 Electric light too dear; E..... 713
 Montana companies' evasion of just taxes fought by Western Progressive; EP..... 481
 Pasadena, California, municipal plant. W. Sidney; S..... 72
 Planning for power. M. L. Cooke; S.. 621
 Roosevelt, F. D., record; EP..... 353
 Seattle, power and politics in. R. L. Hill; S..... 253
 Presbyterian church
 General council scores "Christless culture"; E..... 693
 Presidential campaign of 1932
 Byrd, H. F., for president. R. Flanagan; C..... 703
 California Democratic primary; Roosevelt defeat; EP..... 555
 Conventions, moronic. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 697 Democratic possibilities; EP..... 85
 Democratic vote heavy in primaries; EP. 479
 Hoover asked not to run by Chicago Republican organization; EP..... 381
 Hoover campaign strategy predicted. B. Rogers; C..... 196
 Hoover losses in primaries; EP..... 353
 Hoover renominated; E..... 712
 Hurley, Secretary, uses government airplane for campaign purposes; EP..... 528
 Johnson, H. W., for president. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 139
 Presidential possibilities. I. Borah, W. E., by W. C. Murphy, Jr.; S..... 247
 II. Ritchie, A. C., by G. W. Johnson; S..... 278
 III. Coolidge, C., by F. R. Kent; S.... 309
 IV. Hoover, H., by A. Pinchot; S.... 336
 V. Thomas, N., by D. Allen; S..... 365
 VI. Murray, W. H., by H. G. Milburn; S..... 391

- VII. Baker, N. D., by O. G. Villard; S....414; see also C..... 516
- VIII. Garner, J. N., by P. Y. Anderson; S..... 465
- IX. Roosevelt, F. D., by H. F. Pringle; S..... 487
- Prohibition issue at Republican national convention; EP..... 691
- Republican candidacies; EP..... 29
- Republican convention. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 716
- Ritchie, A. C., for president. C. S. Bloede; C..... 703
- Roosevelt, F. D., and Smith battle for delegates; EP..... 326
- Roosevelt, F. D., candidacy; EP..... 527
- Roosevelt, F. D., candidacy. O. G. V.; S..... 612
- Roosevelt, F. D.; character and career; M. A. Hallgren; S..... 616
- Roosevelt, F. D. defeat in California primary; EP..... 555
- Roosevelt, F. D., open letter to O. G. Villard; S..... 532
- Roosevelt, F. D.; gains in primaries; EP 353
- Roosevelt, F. D., presidential possibility. H. F. Pringle S..... 487
- Smith, A. E.; Scripps-Howard newspapers for him; EP..... 691
- Smith, A. E. willing to accept nomination; EP..... 182
- Young, O. D., and Democratic nomination. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 595
- Presidential plan, 1932-36
- League for independent political action, Section two, issue of February 17; see also E....185; C....312, 313, C....493, 545
- Prices
- Commodity prices, slump of. S. P. Harman; S..... 230
- Goldsbrough bill for fixing prices; EP. 610
- Goldsbrough bill passed by house EP... 556
- Rise, attempted, by purchase of government securities by federal reserve banks; EP..... 499
- Wages and prices; EP..... 499
- Pringle, Henry F.
- Roosevelt, Franklin D.; S..... 487
- Professors. See Colleges and universities
- Program making. A. Mendel; M..... 377
- Progressives
- Florida movement. J. C. Howell; C.... 286
- Prohibition
- Beck-Linthicum resolution, for state control; EP..... 298
- Congress vote on repeal; EP..... 325
- In politics. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 303
- Loses supporters, including J. D. Rockefeller, junior; EP..... 692
- Repeal, no alternative to; E....502; see also C..... 626
- Views on; C..... 626
- See also Presidential campaign of 1932
- Prosperity, note on; E..... 6
- Protection. See Tariff, United States
- Prussia
- Election; Hitler chance of success; E... 455
- Hitler victory; E..... 501
- Public ownership. See Ownership, government
- Public utilities
- Financing, pyramiding shown by Insull collapse; EP....584; see also..... 704
- Ice business called not a public utility by United States supreme court E..... 411
- Kitchie, A. C., record. S. Danziger; C. 427
- Public works
- Hoover misstatements; EP..... 635
- Relief from business depression without taxation. G. Mallon; S..... 645
- Publishing. See Books
- Pulitzer awards
- For 1931; EP..... 529
- Pusey, Doctor William Allen
- Birth control and sex morality; S..... 111
- Putnam, Amelia Earhart
- Transatlantic flight; EP..... 611
- R
- Radek, Karl
- Hitler, A.; S....463; correction..... 516
- Radio
- Canada, public ownership; EP..... 636
- Educational broadcasting; Fess bill. J. Rorty; S..... 280
- "Free air." J. Rorty; S..... 280
- Radio corporation of America
- Stock, gambling in; EP..... 609
- Suit for dissolution finally pressed; P. Y. Anderson; S..... 368
- Railroads
- Deficits. S. P. Harman; S..... 728
- Future of. W. M. Daniels; S..... 699
- Legislation. S. P. Harman; S..... 602
- Loans to. See Reconstruction finance corporation
- Union action in unemployment situation; EP..... 583
- Wages. See Labor
- Rainey, Representative Henry T.
- For recognition of Russia..... 566
- Rankin, John Stuart
- Youth and war; C....469; see also C.. 342
- Raskob, John J.
- Gambling in Radio corporation of America stock; EP..... 609
- Ratcliffe, S. K.
- Geddes, P., death; S..... 513
- Rauschenbush, Winifred
- Bread, bakers'; costly and tasteless; S.. 164
- Reconstruction finance corporation
- Appointments; EP..... 154
- Creation and powers; EP..... 57
- Doles for industry; E..... 131
- Hoover remedy for depression. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 13
- Railroads, loans to; EP..... 409
- Railroad, loan to; scandal in. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 420
- Railroads, loans to; Interstate commerce commission decision on; EP... 381
- Railroads, loans to; plan to lend government funds to roads. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 13
- Secrecy of loans. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 251
- "Reconstruction," financial. S. P. Harman; S..... 313
- Record, George L.
- Missing plank in presidential plan, 1932-1936; C....313; see also February 17, section two
- Rediscount rate
- Cut by Federal reserve; EP..... 270
- "Reds." See Communists
- Regulation of business. See Business
- Reinhart, Robert
- Irish Free State, liberty in; IS..... 239
- Reparations. See War debts and reparations
- Representatives, house of. See Congress
- Repression
- Riot duty directions to Illinois national guard; EP..... 86
- Republican party
- "Contributions" by party officials and employees. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 368
- See also Presidential campaign of 1932
- Reunion in Vienna; pessimism in preface by R. Sherwood. J. W. Krutch; S..... 608
- Revenue bill. See Taxation, United States
- Revolution, guiding. A. M. Allen; C....47; see also C..... 144
- Revolution, speaking of. See Van Loon, H. W.
- Riddle me this! D. V. D.; D..... 319
- Riggs, Lynn
- Antique evening; P..... 401
- Harbor, the; P..... 288
- Riot duty. See Repression
- Ritchie, Governor Albert Cabell
- For president. C. S. Bloede; C..... 703
- Presidential possibility. G. W. Johnson; S..... 278
- Record on public utilities. S. Danziger; C..... 427
- Road to life, the. M. Marshall; MP..... 212
- Robin, Eva
- Lost boy, play, on juvenile delinquency; C..... 115
- Robin Hood. J. W. Krutch; D..... 210
- Robinson, Senator Joseph Taylor
- Favors recognition of soviet Russia; EP....499; see also..... 566
- Robinson, Doctor William J., early birth-control advocate; C..... 195
- Rochester, New York
- Pacifist girls forced to undergo mental examination by Judge A. L. Wilder; EP..... 480
- Rockefeller, John Davison, junior
- Recants support of prohibition; EP.... 692
- Rogers, Alfred T.
- Praises The Nation; C..... 21
- Rogers, Bruce
- Hoover campaign strategy predicted; C. 196
- Rogers, Lindsay
- French logic versus customs union; IS.. 179
- Rogers, William N. See Congress
- Rolland, Romain
- Meets Mahatma Gandhi.....167; see also C..... 259
- Roosevelt, Governor Franklin Delano
- Castigates J. H. Holmes and S. S. Wise on city affairs; EP..... 410
- Character and career. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 616
- Hermit of Albany; Ct..... 615
- Message, annual, to legislature; EP... 57
- Open letter to O. G. Villard; S..... 532
- Power, record on; EP..... 353
- Problems; E..... 273
- Saint Paul speech; views on control of government by special interests; EP.. 499
- Tariff, views on; EP..... 451
- Views on League of nations, war debts and tariff; EP..... 182
- See also Presidential campaign of 1932
- Rorty, James
- Radio, educational broadcasting; S..... 280
- Winter; 1932; P..... 172
- Rosenfeld, Paul
- Stettheimer, F.; paintings; A..... 522
- Stieglitz, photography; A..... 350
- Surrealism*; A..... 236
- Rosenwald, Julius
- Death; EP..... 59
- Rusk, George Yeisley
- Asks for books for Commonwealth college; C..... 21
- Russell, Bertrand
- Friendly words from; C..... 144
- Russia
- Baku, conditions and opinions. L. Fischer; S..... 134
- Beliefs about. L. Fischer; S..... 331
- Communes, agricultural; pioneers among the soviets. H. F. Ward; S..... 696
- Communists in jail. A. Most; IS..... 322
- Freedom. M. F. Gutelius; C..... 47
- Friction with Japan in far east; EP... 480
- If the soviets should fail. L. Fischer; S....219; see also C..... 342
- Jews, home for, at Biro-Bidjan. W. Zukerman; S..... 540
- Jews and the five-year plan. L. Fischer; S..... 597
- Jobs there wanted by college students. V. Bucher and R. Bloss; C..... 539
- Recognition, administration edging toward. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 539
- Recognition; benighted diplomacy. F. L. Schuman; S..... 563
- Recognition; business men's views. J. Davis; S..... 567
- Recognition; by United States; E..... 558
- Recognition; cultural; S..... 565
- Recognition; favored by Senator J. T. Robinson; EP..... 499
- Recognition; senators' views..... 566
- Religion, new. H. R. Mussey; S..... 511
- Society for voluntary technical aid, volunteers asked. P. Chusid; C..... 728
- Trade with; Ct..... 560
- Trade with. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 561
- Trade with; loss to America; E..... 357
- Wage increase. L. Fischer; S..... 8
- War with Japan not probable; EP..... 665
- Russian opera company. A. Mendel; M... 475
- Ryskind, Morrie
- Diary of an ex-president, the book, extracts from; S..... 594
- S
- Sabloff, Janet
- On Chinese-Japanese situation; C..... 342
- Sacco-Vanzetti, passion of. W. Gutman; A. 475
- Saint John the Divine, cathedral of
- Loses bequest; EP..... 665
- Salaries, federal
- Cuts, proposed; EP..... 354
- Sales tax. See Taxation, United States
- Salsberry, Pearl
- Family welfare association, Milwaukee, work relief plan; C....196; see also Dt..... 19
- Sanborn, Walter L.
- Fight against "third degree"; E..... 357
- Sandoval, Arturo; his story. P. Sifton; S.. 44
- Sanger, Mrs. Margaret
- Birth control, pope's position on; S.... 102
- Receives gold medal of American woman's association; EP..... 500
- See also Birth control
- Sapiro, Aaron
- On The Nation's honor roll for 1931.... 7
- Sauerwein, Jules
- Alarmist on European situation; EP.... 664
- Savings, postal. See Banks
- Schamberg, Doctor Jay F.
- Birth control; C..... 196
- Schlink, F. J.
- Consumer, information for; C..312; see also February 17, section two
- Laundry industry, government interest in; S..... 620
- Schneider, Isidor
- Of two eternities; P..... 140
- Windherd; P..... 261
- Schools
- New York; overcrowding threatened; C. 600
- Schuman, Frederick L.
- Diplomacy, benighted; S..... 563
- Schuster, M. Lincoln
- Commends Villard article on N. D. Baker; C..... 516
- Scott, C. P.; death; E..... 31
- Scott, Edward T.; death; EP..... 501
- Scott, Evelyn
- On The Nation's honor roll for 1931.... 7
- Scottsboro case. See Negroes
- Scripps-Howard newspapers
- Come out for Smith; EP..... 691
- Seabury, Samuel
- Open letter to; E..... 32
- Scores Tammany hall; EP..... 270
- Seabury report. See New York city
- Seattle, Washington
- Jobless enter politics. R. L. Hill; S.. 718
- Power system and politics. R. L. Hill; S 253

- Securities. See Stocks and bonds
 Seligman, Edwin R. A.
 Taxation, toward a new program; S... 484
 Sentinels. H. H.; D... 54
 Sergeant, Winthrop
 Future of opera in America; S... 389
 Shahn, Ben, passion of Sacco-Vanzetti. W.
 Gutman; A... 475
 Shanghai. See Chinese-Japanese relations
 Shanghai express. M. Marshall; MP... 267
 Sharp, Grace Hastings
 Sharp, D. L., views on war and peace;
 C... 651
 Sharp, Dallas Lore
 War and peace, views on. G. H. Sharp;
 C... 651
 Shaw, George Bernard
 Defended by F. Hackett; C... 515
 Sheep
 Slaughtered, for lack of feed; Dt... 169
 Sherwood, Robert
 Pessimism in preface to Reunion in Vienna. J. W. Krutch; S... 608
 Shipping. See Steamship lines
 Short selling. See Stocks and bonds
 Show boat. H. H.; D... 660
 Siberian patrol. M. Marshall; MP... 607
 Sidney, William
 Pasadena lights its own; S... 72
 Sifton, Paul
 Nice story; about A. Sandoval; S... 44
 Sinclair, Upton
 Pacifism at university of Southern California; C... 313
 Sirovich, Representative William Irving. See
 Theater, the
 Sky devils. M. Marshall; MP... 380
 Slack, P. P.
 Farmers' plight; C... 544
 Smedley, Agnes
 Birth control and China; S... 282
 Shanghai, horrors at; S... 369
 Smith, Alfred Emanuel
 Jefferson day address; views on tariff and war debts; EP... 479
 See also Presidential campaign of 1932
 Smith, C. R. F.
 East Saint Louis and Americanism; S... 283
 Smith, Elmer S.; death; E... 386
 Smolar, Boris
 What Polish Jews are facing; S... 99
 Snowden, Viscount
 Resignation, threatened, on tariff issue;
 EP... 128
 Socialist party
 Convention. E. Levinson; S... 648
 Society for voluntary technical aid
 Volunteers to aid Russia asked. P.
 Chusid; C... 728
 Soglow, Otto
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Solow, Herbert
 Education, modern; C... 493
 Southern California, university of Pacifism at. U. Sinclair; C... 313
 Southern commission for the study of lynching
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Soviets. See Russia
 Spain
 Alfonso asks restoration; EP... 271
 Azaña, Premier Manuel, on Spanish policy. I. M. Levy; S... 18
 Speaking of revolution. See Van Loon, H. W.
 Speech, freedom of. See Freedom of speech
 Speidel, Doctor Carl Caskey Receives prize for discovery of growth of nerves; EP... 31
 Spider and the fly. M. Marshall; MP... 380
 Sports. See Athletics
 Stark, Louis F.
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Starvation. See Unemployment
 State department. See Loans, foreign State regulation of business. See Business
 Steamships
 Passenger rates reduced; EP... 411
 Steel and iron
 Unemployment. M. A. Hallgren; S... 361
 Steichmann, H.
 Internationalism; C... 545
 Stein, Clarence S.
 Housing and common sense; S... 541
 Sterilization. H. M. Parshley; S... 569
 Sterling. See Currency
 Stettinmer, Florine; paintings. P. Rosenfeld; A... 522
 Stevens, Frank
 Commends Villard article on N. D.
 Baker; C... 516
 Stewart, Maxwell S.
 How to tax the rich; S... 339
 Stieglitz
 Photography. P. Rosenfeld; A... 350
 Stimson, Secretary Henry Lewis Appointment as head of commission to disarmament conference; EP... 128
 At Geneva armament limitation conference; E... 531
 Press conferences. P. Y. Anderson; S... 252
 Warning to Japan; E... 272; see also C... 399
 Stocks and bonds
 Bears, clipping their claws. S. P. Har-
 man; S... 287
 Bonds advance with formation of buying corporation; EP... 663
 Bonds and banks. C. T. Norris; C... 47
 Financial writers, "tips" to; EP... 528
 Gambling in; EP... 609
 Government securities, purchase by federal reserve banks; EP... 499
 Government securities purchase plan. S.
 P. Harman; S... 517
 Prices, Wall street, reading of. S. P.
 Harman; S... 116
 Report on banks' right to deal in securities was buried in 1910. P. Y. Anderson; S... 595
 Short selling; abolition, demand for; E... 246
 Short selling; control suggested; EP... 298
 Short selling; investigation by senate committee. P. Y. Anderson; S... 489;
 S... 538
 Short selling; suspension for a time suggested; EP... 270
 Taxation of stocks. S. P. Harman; S... 470
 Stolberg, Benjamin
 Letter on review by Freeman of book by Trotzky; C... 600; see also review... 314
 Strachey, Lytton
 Career; J. W. Krutch; S... 199
 Death; EP... 129
 Strawn, Silas H.
 Statement on reparations commended;
 EP... 382
 Strike, coal. See Coal miners, American
 Strikes—Textile mills, Massachusetts
 Lawrence, appeal for bread and milk.
 A. J. Muste; C... 74
 Strikes—Textile mills, southern Marion, North Carolina, rugs made by unemployed for sale. G. Elliot; C... 313 Student conference. See League for industrial democracy
 Students. See Colleges and universities
 Sugar, Maurice
 Bullets, not food, for Ford workers;
 S... 333; see also EP... 326
 Suicides of business men; EP... 327
 Sunday observance
 Baltimore abolishes law; EP... 557
 Sunderland, J. T.
 Sixty-seven years a reader of The Na- tion; suggests Nation clubs; C... 259
 Sunlight and fresh air; Dt... 398
 Supreme court, United States
 Appointment of B. N. Cardozo; EP... 213
 Surrealism. P. Rosenfeld; A... 236
 Sympathy; Dt... 311
- T
- Tammany hall
 Scored by Samuel Seabury; EP... 270
 Tariff
 French logic versus customs union. L.
 Rogers; IS... 179
 World action for world recovery. H.
 Hazlitt; S... 642
 Tariff, British. See Great Britain
 Tariff, Spanish
 Increase aimed at United States; EP... 1
 Tariff, United States
 Cause of business decline; EP... 610
 "Protection" under difficulties. S. P.
 Harman; S... 574
 Roosevelt, F. D., views; EP... 182; EP... 451
 Tariff war with Spain threatened; EP... 1
 Tax bill no place for tariff provisions;
 EP... 382
 Taylor, Myron C., views; EP... 410
 Tate, Allen
 Unnatural love; P... 314
 Tax, sales. See Taxation, United States
 Taxation, United States
 Amendments, vote on; EP... 353
 Battle in Washington. P. Y. Anderson;
 S... 489
 Bill, new; E... 329
 Bill passed by house of representatives;
 E... 413
 Budget, dishonest arguments on. P. Y.
 Anderson; S... 420
 Burden, growing. G. T. Altman; S... 304
 Capital-gains tax; E... 33
 Democratic program. P. Y. Anderson; S... 303
 Land values, taxation of. M. L. Hastings; C... 493; see also Four-year presidential plan, issue of February 17
 Mills, O. L., comments on house revenue bill; EP... 451
 Program, new, toward a. E. R. A. Seligman; S... 484
 Rich, how to tax. M. S. Stewart; S... 339
 Sales tax. S. P. Harman; C... 343
 Sales tax in congress. P. Y. Anderson;
 S... 368
 Stocks. S. P. Harman; S... 470
 See also Income tax
 Taxi. M. Marshall; MP... 150
- Taylor, Dudley H.
 Kentucky, views on; C... 571
 Taylor, Myron C.
 Appointed chairman of board, United States steel corporation; views on tariff; EP... 410
 Telephones. See New York telephone company
 Tempest. M. Marshall; MP... 378
 Texas
 Law disfranchising Negroes declared unconstitutional; EP... 556
 Theater, the
 Burlesque. J. W. Krutch; S... 647
 Burlesque; Minneapolis morals; E... 158;
 see also C... 286
 Catholic theater movement; "white list."
 J. W. Krutch; D... 633
 Criticism; Congressman Sirovich's charges against critics; E... 330 Criticism, philosophical, by R. D. Skinner. J. W. Krutch; D... 407
 Drama as a social force. J. W. Krutch;
 S... 467
 Forbidden words; E... 302
 Models and paintings, exhibition. J. W.
 Krutch; S... 525
 Plays, best, and best performances. J.
 W. Krutch; D... 707
 Plays, worth-while, at the new year.
 J. W. Krutch; D... 28
 There's always Juliet. J. W. Krutch; D... 266
 "Third degree." See Police
 Third party. See Progressives
 This is the night. M. Marshall; MP... 553
 Thomas, Norman
 Commends Villard article on N. D.
 Baker; C... 516
 Nomination for presidency by Socialists;
 support of The Nation pledged; EP... 610
 Presidential possibility. D. Allen; S... 365
 Thomson, Charles A.
 Nicaraguan elections; C... 46
 Thousand summers, a. J. W. Krutch; D... 688
 Toledo, Ohio
 Bankers and bread lines. M. A. Hall-
 gren; S... 395
 Too true to be good. J. W. Krutch; D... 477
 Toscanini, Arturo
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
 Tractenberg, Joshua
 Clergymen and peace; C... 399
 Trade, foreign Russian trade, loss to United States; E... 357 transition
 Apocalypse of the world; transition and criticism. W. Troy; S... 723
 Trapeze. M. Marshall; MP... 607
 Troilus and Cressida. J. W. Krutch; D... 734
 Trotzky, Leon
 Defended; exceptions taken to criticism of his History of the Russian revolu- tion by J. Freeman; C... 515
 Differences with Lenin and Stalin. J.
 Freeman; C... 600; see also review... 314
 Troy, William
 Apocalypse of the world; transition and criticism; S... 723
 Trusts. See Anti-trust laws
 Truth about Blyads, the. J. W. Krutch; D... 497
 Turner, Professor Frederick J.; death; EP... 355
 Turtles; Dt... 599
 Tuttle, A. M.
 Unemployment and war; C, with editorial comment; C... 703; see also... 453
 Two seconds. A. Bakshy; MP... 708
- U
- Ukraine, Polish
 Terrorism in; EP... 2
 Unemployment
 And war. A. M. Tuttle; C, with editorial comment. 703; see also... 453
 Bond issues or starvation; E... 88
 Cartoon... 560
 Chicago situation. M. A. Hallgren; S... 534
 Cox, Father, army. F. Morrow; C... 144
 Culture, effect on; EP... 129
 Davenport, Iowa. M. A. Hallgren; S... 505
 Federal relief disparaged by Secretary
 Mills; E... 665
 Funds for relief running low; EP... 452
 Government figures lacking; EP... 354
 Gravity shown by action of railway unions; EP... 583
 Hoover relief program; EP... 663
 Hunger rife, despite official optimism; E... 356
 Hungry, how many? M. A. Hallgren; S... 159
 Illinois coal miners hungry. M. A. Hall-
 gren; S... 457
 Insurance. See Insurance, unemployment
 La Follette-Costigan bill for relief. P.
 Y. Anderson; S... 139
 Mayors of Michigan program for relief;
 EP... 636
 Milwaukee family welfare association relief plan. P. Salsberry; C... 196; see also Dt... 19
 Musicians; EP... 129

No violence; E...301; EP... 326
Ohio ministers, views of; E... 158
Philadelphia, mass misery. M. A. Hallgren; S... 275
Relief, federal, problem of; E... 587
Relief; Hoover recognizes need at last. P. Y. Anderson; S... 697
Relief; 1931 style; Pinchot article in December 16, 1931, issue praised. H. T. Marshall; C... 47
Seattle jobless enter politics. R. L. Hill; S... 718
Senate vote against aid. P. Y. Anderson; S... 251; E... 244
Starvation cases, ninety-five, in New York hospitals in 1931; EP... 479
Steel towns, panic in. M. A. Hallgren; S... 361
Toledo, Ohio, bankers and bread lines. M. A. Hallgren; S... 395
Unemployed, number, in United States; EP... 29
Violence at Ford plant; EP... 326; S... 333
Williamson, bloody, is hungry. M. A. Hallgren; S... 457
United States
Coalition government suggested; EP... 609
Control by special interests; views of W. Wilson and F. D. Roosevelt; EP... 499
Economic condition, according to National economic league straw vote; EP... 58
Finances; administration plays politics. P. Y. Anderson; S... 595
Finances; budget balanced; E... 694
Finances; figures of Secretary Mills on budget challenged; E... 665
Finances; Hoover alarmist statements to senate; EP... 635
Finances; Hoover message to congress; EP... 555
Four-year presidential plan of League for independent political action, section two, issue of February 17; also E, 185; C... 312, 313, 493, 545 Government, cost of. See Government, cost of Isolation, economic; E... 89
Leadership wanted; E... 482
Nationalism, resurgence. P. Y. Anderson; S... 13
Reorganization of executive branch; EP... 242
Salaries, federal. See Salaries, federal
Way out, the; S... 638
United States steel corporation
Dividend omitted. S. P. Harman; S... 546
Taylor, M. C., appointed chairman of board; EP... 410 Universities. See Colleges and universities
Urbana, Illinois
Business suspended five days to help banks; EP... 155
Urey, Professor Harold C.
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
Utilities, public. See Public utilities
Utter, Robert Palfrey, junior, and V. MacDonald
Youth, plea, to, for averting war; C... 342
V
V., O. G.
Business, big, failure of; E... 586
Roosevelt candidacy; S... 612
Way out, the; S... 638
V. D., D.
Riddle me this! D... 319
Van Doren, Carl
Literature, American, new canon; S... 429
Van Doren, Mark
Bore, the; P... 76
What is a poet? S... 624
Van Horn, Olive
Coal miners' children, appeal for; C... 48
Vance, Ray
Business crisis; S... 724
Van Loon, Hendrik Willem
Speaking of revolution; S... 35, 63, 92, 133
Vernon, Mabel
Work for peace caravan. A. Martin; C, with editorial comment... 116
Veterans
Allowances, inequitable; E... 503
Bonus army in Washington; EP... 691
Bonus bill passed by house; defeated in senate; EP... 709
March on Washington for bonus; EP... 664
Veterans' bureau
Extravagance and incompetence, charges of; EP... 583
Villard, Oswald Garrison
Baker, Newton D.; S... 414; see also C... 516
If I were dictator; S... 67
Pity Herbert Hoover; S... 669
Roosevelt, Governor, open letter to; S... 532
To address Albany readers. H. P. Winchester; C... 372; meeting postponed; C... 400
Virginia federation of women's clubs
Saving the United States; E... 614

W

Wages. See Labor; salaries
Wagner, Senator Robert F.
For recognition of Russia... 566
Wainhouse, David W.
Disarmament conference meets; S... 137; see also C... 286
Geneva conference; America's role; S... 162
Walker, Mayor James John
Demand for removal sent to Governor Roosevelt; EP... 692
Financial transactions; EP... 611; EP... 635
Jimmy the well-dressed man. G. S. Kaufman; S... 676
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
Wall street. See Stocks and bonds
Wallace, Edgar; death; E... 218
Walsh, Frank P.
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
Walton, Eda Lou
So long it has for echoing; P... 231
Wannamaker, Olin D.
Progress in education; C... 545
War
Aggressor, difficulty in determining; EP... 556
Dictatorship in war time advocated by Hoover in 1924; EP... 584
Intellectuals called upon to register opposition in time of peace; E... 412
Munitions. See Munitions, war
Photographs show reality; EP... 327
Plea to youth. V. MacDonald and R. P. Utter, junior; C... 342; see also C... 469
War debts and reparations
Abyss, nearing the; E... 130
American committee of International chamber of commerce, statement by; EP... 325
Cancellation; E... 157; E... 503
Cancellation; why it is necessary; E... 503
European statesmen's do-nothing policy EP... 692
Germany can no longer pay reparations, according to Brüning; E... 59; EP... 585
Lausanne conference opens; EP... 709
Moratorium; administration methods. P. Y. Anderson; S... 13
Moratorium; legalized by congress; EP... 1
Moratorium; nine months wasted; EP... 410
Roosevelt, F. D., views EP... 182
Stimson visit abroad and European anxiety; EP... 452
Strawn, Silas H., statement by; EP... 382
Young plan, end of; E... 5
War, European. See European war
Warburg, Paul M.; death; E... 132
Ward, Harry F.
Pioneers among the soviets; S... 696
Warner, Arthur
Traveling with a one-man band; S... 491
Warrior's husband, the. J. W. Krutch; D... 378
Washington, George
Close-up. W. E. Woodward; S... 191
Washington-Hoover airport service station, situation. D. W. Amram; C... 116
"Washington merry-go-round"
Authors on The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
Wealth
Concentration defended by Secretary Mills. P. Y. Anderson; S... 489
Weaver, D. E.
Kentucky, views on; C... 571
Weaver, John
Asks Lancaster, Pennsylvania, readers to meet; C... 516
Welch, Marie de L.
Bar of shade; P... 471
West, survival; Dt... 143
Western Progressive
Fight against power companies; EP... 481
What I believe
Wilson, Edmund; S... 95
Wheat
Government, distribution to help unemployed; EP... 297
Whistling in the dark. J. W. Krutch; D... 151
Whitaker, Robert
Commends Villard article on N. D. Baker; C... 516
White, Hal Saunders
I taught the angel; P... 49
Light will be wisdom; P... 603
O quietly the earth is spun; P... 681
White, Kenneth
For better movies; C... 286
Whitney, Richard
Testifies before senate committee on short selling. P. Y. Anderson; S... 489
Wickersham commission. See National commission on law enforcement and observance Wild waves. J. W. Krutch; D... 294
Wilder, Judge Arthur L. See Rochester, New York
Wilkerson, Judge James H.
Appointment to United States circuit court of appeals; EP... 214

W

Appointment to circuit court of appeals. P. Y. Anderson; S... 139; S... 420
Williams, Doctor Ira
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
Williamson county, Illinois. See Coal miners, American Willingdon, Lord
Views on India; EP... 528
Willis, H. Parker
Bank control; S... 422; see also EP... 411
Wilson, Edmund
What I believe; S... 95
Wilson, Woodrow
Views on control of government by special interests; EP... 499
Winchester, Harold P.
Meeting of Albany readers; O. G. Villard to speak; C... 372; meeting postponed; C... 400
Wineberg, Abe
With family, deported from Los Angeles; Dt... 169
Winkler, Max
Kreuger, I., rise and fall; S... 589
Wisconsin
Unemployment insurance bill signed; EP... 183
Wisconsin, university of
Defended by President Frank; EP... 711
Wise, Stephen Samuel
Castigated, with J. H. Holmes, by Governor Roosevelt on city affairs; EP... 410
Woll, Matthew
Communist scare; EP... 529
Wolman, Leo
Unemployment insurance; S... 508
Women's international league for peace and freedom
On The Nation's honor roll for 1931... 7
Woodward, W. E.
Close-up of G. Washington; S... 191
Work; Dt... 46
Works, public. See Public works
World crisis. See Economic crisis, world
World war. See European war
Wormser, I. Maurice
Court reform; S... 224
Y
Yaddo festival. A. Mendel; M... 578
Yale university
Athletics, radical changes announced; E... 667
Professors' salaries; F. P. Garvan proposes reductions; EP... 453
Undergraduate Yale. R. S. Childs; S... 70
Young, Owen D.
And presidential nomination. P. Y. Anderson; S... 595
Views on leadership; EP... 663
Young plan. See War debts and reparation
Younger generation; Dt... 195
Youth, plea to, for averting war. V. MacDonald and R. P. Utter, junior; C... 342; see also C... 469
Yugoslavia. See Yugoslavia
Z
Zukerman, William
Jewish home in Russia; S... 540
Zwei menschen, M. Marshall; MP... 82

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.
The following explanatory letters are used in the index:
B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

Adamic, Louis
Laughing in the jungle; B... 472
Adams, James Truslow; R... 705
Adventures of a novelist. G. Atherton; B... 629
Adventurous Americans. Edited by D. Allen, AN... 440
Alexander, H. B.; R... 474
Alice's adventures underground. L. Carroll; AN... 521
All ye people. M. Colby; B... 376
Allen, Frederick Lewis
Only yesterday; B... 234
Allison, John M. S.
Monsieur Thiers and nineteenth century France; AN... 733
Ambler, Charles Henry
History of transportation in the Ohio valley, a; AN... 292
America as Americans see it. Edited by F. J. Ringle; B... 730
American epoch, an. H. W. Odum; AN... 266
American outpost. U. Sinclair; B... 432
American writers on American literature, Edited by J. Macy; B... 50

- America's Siberian adventure. W. S. Graves; B..... 148
 Aminta. T. Tasso; AN..... 149
 Anatomy of Don Quixote, the. Edited by M. J. Bernadete and A. Flores; AN..... 376
 Ancient life in the American southwest. E. L. Hewett; B..... 473
 Arabia felix: Across the "empty quarter" of Arabia. B. Thomas; B..... 434
 Article thirty-two. J. R. Oliver; AN..... 377
 Atherton, Gertrude
 Adventures of a novelist; B..... 629
 August, K. Hamsun; AN..... 441
 Autobiography of an adventurer, the. J. L. Trebitsch-Lincoln; translated by E. Burns; AN..... 550
 Ayres, Clarence
 Huxley; B..... 374
- B
- Babcock, F. Lawrence
 Spanning the Atlantic: The history of the Cunard line; B..... 344
 Back yonder. An Ozark chronicle. W. Hogue; B..... 656
 Baker, Newton D., biography. F. Palmer; B..... 117
 Banana gold. C. Beals; B..... 684
 Bantry bay. Ireland in the days of Napoleon and Wolfe Tone. P. B. Bradley; AN..... 550
 Barber, Solon R.
 Cross country; AN..... 25
 Barnes, Harry Elmer; R..... 78
 Bartholdt, Richard
 From steerage to congress; AN..... 80
 Bates, Ernest Sutherland; R..... 730
 Bauer, C. K.; R..... 173
 Bayle the skeptic. H. Robinson; B..... 657
 Beals, Carleton
 Banana gold; B..... 684
 Beard, Charles A.
 Navy, the: Defense or portent? B..... 630
 Ben Jonson. Volume IV. Edited by C. H. Herford and P. Simpson; AN..... 439
 Bercovici, Karl
 Manhattan side-show; AN..... 440
 Bernard Shaw. F. Harris; letter by F. Hackett..... 515
 Bernays, Robert
 Naked aquair; AN..... 496
 Biological tragedy of woman, the. A. Nemilov; B..... 403
 Birth of the German republic, the. 1871-1918. A. Rosenberg. Translated by I. F. D. Morrow; B..... 174
 Birthday, the. S. Rogers; AN..... 658
 Black mass, the. P. N. Krassnoff; AN..... 121
 Blueberry pie. T. S. Winslow; B..... 548
 Bodenheim, Maxwell
 Run, sheep, run; AN..... 348
 Boom in paradise. T. H. Weigall; AN..... 349
 Borchard, Edwin M.
 Convicting the innocent; B..... 657
 Boudin, Louis B.
 Government by judiciary; B..... 731
 Boulbee, H. C.
 Oxford lists, the; AN..... 210
 Bourke-White, Margaret Eyes on Russia; B..... 77
 Bowers, Claude G.; R..... 437
 Boy, J. Hanley; B..... 519
 Bradley, P. Brenon
 Bantry bay: Ireland in the days of Napoleon and Wolfe Tone; AN..... 550
 Brailsford, H. N.
 Rebel India; B..... 148
 Brave new world. A. Huxley; B..... 204
 Breakdown: The collapse of traditional civilization. R. Briffault; B..... 654
 Brearley, H. C.
 Homicide in the United States; B..... 605
 Bret Harte; Argonaut and exile. G. R. Stewart, Jr.; B..... 22
 Bridal gown, the. K. Gudmundsson. Translated by O. F. Theis; AN..... 209
 Briffault, Robert
 Breakdown: The collapse of traditional civilization; B..... 654
 Bright, John
 On H. Hazlitt's review of "1919," by J. Dos Passos; C..... 515; see also review..... 344
 Bright skin. J. Peterkin; AN..... 632
 Brinig, Myron
 This man is my brother; AN..... 522
 British far eastern policy. R. S. McCord; B..... 49
 Brooks, Van Wyck
 Life of Emerson, the; B..... 432
 Brothers. L. A. G. Strong; AN..... 632
 Brown, Ray C. B.; R..... 549
 Brown, W. Norman; R..... 148
 Brown America: The story of a new race. E. R. Embree; B..... 23
 Buell, Raymond Leslie; R..... 631
 Burke, Fielding
 Call home the heart; B..... 606
 Burke, Kenneth
 Counter-statement; B..... 76
 Towards a better life; B..... 289
 Burke, Thomas
 Flower of life, the; AN..... 235
 Burns, Robert, two books; B..... 732
 Butler, Nicholas Murray
 Looking forward; B..... 346
- C
- Cabell, Branch
 These restless heads; B..... 232
 Call home the heart. F. Burke; B..... 606
 Callistratus: Descriptions; Philostratus: Imagines. With English translation by A. Fairbanks; AN..... 376
 Calverton, V. F.; R..... 404
 Cantwell, Robert
 Laugh and lie down; B..... 23
 Cantwell, Robert; R..... 289, 606
 Capek, Karel
 Letters from Spain. P. Selver, translator; B..... 705
 Care and feeding of adults, the. L. Clendening; AN..... 606
 Carré, Jean-Marie
 Season in hell. a: The life of Arthur Rimbaud. H. and M. Josephson, translators; B..... 51
 Carl Schurz: Reformer (1829-1906). C. M. Fuess; B..... 575
 Carlyle. E. Neff; B..... 576
 Carlyle, Jane Welsh
 Letters to Joseph Neuberger. 1848-1862. Edited by T. Scudder; AN..... 550
 Carroll, Lewis
 Alice's adventures underground; AN..... 521
 Chaka: An historical romance. T. Mofolo. Translated by F. H. Dutton; B..... 119
 Challenge of the east, the. S. Eddy; B..... 289
 Challenge to defeat: Modern man in Goethe's world and Spengler's century. W. H. Hale; B..... 656
 Chamberlain, John; R..... 263
 Chapman, Maristan
 Weather tree, the; AN..... 405
 Chatterton, Thomas, novelized biography. E. Penzoldt. Translated by J. J. Trounstone and E. Wolf; B..... 24
 Chesterfield, Earl of Letters. Edited by B. Dobrée; B..... 547
 Chew, Samuel C.; R..... 576
 China, Japan and Korea, five books on; B..... 289
 Christiansen, Sigurd
 Two living and one dead. E. Bjorkman, translator; B..... 576
 Churchill, Winston
 Unknown war, the: The eastern front; AN..... 733
 City child. S. Robinson; AN..... 80
 Clendening, Logan
 Care and feeding of adults, the; AN..... 606
 Cleveland, Grover, biography. D. T. Lynch; B..... 263
 Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
 Portrait of an American; AN..... 120
 Colby, Merle
 All ye people; B..... 376
 Colette
 Lesson in love, a. R. Benét, translator; AN..... 688
 Recaptured; AN..... 317
 Collected poems of Elinor Wylie. Edited by W. R. Benét; B..... 682
 Coming of South America, the. H. K. Norton; B..... 628
 Concentration of control in American industry. H. W. Laidler; B..... 520
 Conquistador. A. MacLeish; B..... 655
 Contemporary thought of Germany. Volume I. W. T. Jones; AN..... 121
 Contemporary thought of India. A. C. Underwood; AN..... 121
 Convicting the innocent. E. M. Borchard; B..... 657
 Coppard, A. E.
 Nixey's harlequin; B..... 548
 Corey, Herbert
 Truth about Hoover, the; B..... 683
 Counter-statement. K. Burke; B..... 76
 Craig, Edward Gordon
 Ellen Terry and her secret self; B..... 630
 Creative criticism, and other essays. J. E. Spingarn; B..... 76
 Criminal justice in England. P. Howard; B..... 473
 Crocker, W. R.
 Japanese population problem, the; B..... 49
 Cronin, A. J.
 Three loves; AN..... 632
 Cross country. S. R. Barber; AN..... 25
 Czardas. Jenő Heltai; B..... 732
- D
- D., H.
 Red roses for bronze; B..... 264
 Dahlberg, Edward; R..... 402, 629
 Dante Alighiere
 Divine comedy. Translated by J. B. Fletcher; AN..... 80
 D'Arcy, M. C.
 Thomas Aquinas; B..... 347
 Darrow, Clarence
 Story of my life, the; B..... 261
 Darwin, C. G.
 New conceptions of matter, the; AN..... 266
 Daugherty, Harry M., and T. Dixon
 Inside story of the Harding tragedy, the; B..... 471
 David Octavius Hill. H. Schwarz; B..... 77
 Day, Clarence
 God and my father; E..... 504
 Decent fellows. J. Heygate; AN..... 149
 Decline of the medieval church, the. A. C. Flick; B..... 347
 Denison, J. H.
 Emotional currents in American history; AN..... 349
 Dennis, Geoffrey
 Mary Lee; AN..... 120
 Red room, the; B..... 348
 Descent to the dead. R. Jeffers; B..... 146
 Deserter, the. L. Zihaly. Translated by G. Halasz; AN..... 658
 Detzer, Dorothy; R..... 630
 Deval, Jacques
 That girl. L. S. Morris, translator; AN..... 522
 Devil in the flesh, the. R. Radiquet. Translated by K. Boyle; AN..... 522
 Diary of an ex-president, the. M. Ryskind; extracts..... 594
 Dickinson, Emily, Letters of. Edited by M. Todd; B..... 119
 Digging in Yucatan. A. A. Morris; AN..... 80
 Dillon, George
 Flowering stone, the; B..... 175
 Divine comedy of Dante Alighiere. Translated by J. B. Fletcher; AN..... 80
 Dixon, Thomas, and H. M. Daugherty
 Inside story of the Harding tragedy, the; B..... 471
 Doctor Kerkhoven. J. Wassermann. Translated by C. Brooks; AN..... 633
 Donne, John, a garland for. Edited by T. Spencer; B..... 316
 Doom of youth, the. W. Lewis; B..... 518
 Dorothy Wordsworth. C. M. Maclean; B..... 686
 Dos Passos, John R.
 1919; B..... 344; see also C..... 515
 Double blossoms. A. Helen Keller anthology. Compiled by E. Porter; AN..... 122
 Dream life of Balso Snell, the. N. West; AN..... 441
 Dreiser, Theodore
 Tragic America; B..... 402
 Duffield, Marcus
 King legion; B..... 604
- E
- Eckardt, Hans von
 Russia. C. A. Phillips, translator; AN..... 707
 Eddy, Sherwood
 Challenge of the east, the; B..... 289
 Edwards, Jonathan. A. C. McGiffert, junior; AN..... 550
 Ehrenbourg, Ilya
 Street in Moscow, a; AN..... 578
 Eidlitz, Walter
 Zodiac. E. Sutton, translator; AN..... 235
 Eldershaw, M. Barnard
 Green memory; AN..... 26
 Elegy and Iambus. Edited and translated by J. M. Edmonds; AN..... 376
 Ellen Terry and her secret self. E. G. Craig; B..... 630
 Embree, Edwin R.
 Brown America: The story of a new race; B..... 23
 Emergence of man, the. G. Heard; B..... 404
 Emerson, R. W., biography. Van W. Brooks; B..... 432
 Emotional currents in American history. J. H. Denison; AN..... 349
 End of desire, the. R. Herrick; AN..... 291
 Ernst, Morris L.; R..... 657
 Essays in persuasion. J. M. Keynes; B..... 288
 Essential Shakespeare, the. J. D. Wilson; B..... 685
 European caravan, the. Edited by S. Putnam; B..... 208
 Everyman remembers. E. Rhys; B..... 78
 Expression in America. L. Lewisohn; B..... 429
 Eyes on Russia. M. Bourke-White; B..... 77
- F
- Fadiman, Clifton; R..... 206, 434, 548, 656, 678
 Fair winds and foul. H. Hauser. Translated by B. S. Levin; AN..... 291
 Far eastern international relations. H. B. Morse and H. F. McNair; B..... 289 Fear and trembling. G. Wescott; B..... 684
 Fetter, Frank Albert
 Masquerade of monopoly, the; B..... 520
 Field, Bradda
 Small town; AN..... 265
 Fife, C. W. Domville
 Modern South America; B..... 628
 Fischer, Louis; R..... 346
 Fles, Barthold; R..... 576
 Flesh is heir. L. Kirstein; B..... 402

Flechner, Abraham; R.....	206	Hauser, Heinrich		Jenny Lind. E. Wagenknecht; AN.....	80
Flick, Alexander Clarence		Fair winds and foul. B. S. Levin,		Joel Chandler Harris, editor and essayist.
Decline of the medieval church, the; B.....	347	translator; AN.....	291	Writings edited by J. C. Harris; AN.....	377
Flight into darkness. A. Schnitzler; AN.....	25	Hazlitt, Henry; R.....	76, 204, 231, 344,	Jonathan Edwards. A. C. McGiffert, junior; AN.....	550
Flower of life, the. T. Burke; AN.....	235		432, 547, 681
Flowering stone, the. G. Dillon; B.....	175	Heard, Gerald		Jones, W. Tudor
Flynn, John T.		Emergence of man, the; B.....	404	Contemporary thought of Germany. Vol-
Graft in business; B.....	120	Heat lightning, H. Hull; AN.....	687	ume I; AN.....	121
Ford, Ford Madox		Heaton, John L.		Jonson, Ben. Volume IV. Edited by C.
Return to yesterday; B.....	403	Tough luck—Hoover again! B.....	375	H. Herford and P. Simpson; AN.....	439
Ford, Henry, tragedy of. J. N. Leonard; B.....	435	Heltai, Jenő		Josephson, Matthew
Forgery in Christianity. J. Wheless; AN.....	349	Czardas; B.....	732	Jean Jacques Rousseau; B.....	172
Fortune's favorites: Portraits of some		Herbert Clark Hoover: An American		Josephson, Matthew; R.....	208
American corporations. An anthology		tragedy. C. Wood; B.....	375
from Fortune magazine; AN.....	176	Herrick, Robert		K
Four frightened people. E. A. Robertson;		End of desire, the; AN.....	291	Kang, Younghill; R.....	289
AN.....	318	Herskovits, Melville J.; R.....	119, 657	Kaun, Alexander; R.....	57
Frank, Glenn		Hester Craddock. A. Gregory; AN.....	25	Keats, John, novelized biography. G.
Thunder and dawn; B.....	705	Hewett, Edgar L.		O'Neil; B.....	24
Frankenstein, incorporated. I. M. Wormser;		Ancient life in the American southwest;		Keith, Sir Arthur
B.....	520	B.....	473	Place of prejudice in modern civilization,
Free born. S. Nearing; AN.....	291	Heygate, John		the; AN.....	658
Freeman, Joseph; R.....	314; see also C,	Decent fellows; AN.....	149	Keller, Helen, anthology; AN.....	122
515; C.....	600	Hicks, Granville; R.....	50, 119; 433; cor-	Kendrick, Benjamin B., and L. M. Hacker:
Frenssen, Gustav		rection; C.....	600	United States since 1865, the; B.....	437
Pastor of Poggsee, the. K. G. Potts,		Higher command. E. Koppen; AN.....	26	Kennedy, Margaret translator; AN.....	121	Hill, David Octavius. H. Schwarz; B.....	77	Return I dare not; AN.....	54
From steeple to congress. R. Bartholdt;		Hindenburg: The man with three lives.		Keynes, John Maynard
AN.....	80	T. R. Ybarra; B.....	401	Essays in persuasion; B.....	288
Fuess, Claude Moore		History of Italian literature. F. de Sanctis.		Kim, Helen
Carl Schurz: Reformer (1829-1906); B.....	575	Translated by J. Redfern; B.....	173	Rural education for the regeneration of
		History of Palestine and Syria to the Mace-		Korea; B.....	289
G		donian conquest. A. T. Olmstead; AN.....	234	King legion. M. Duffield; B.....	604
Garland for John Donne, a. Edited by T.		History of the Russian revolution, the. Vol-		Kipling, Rudyard
Spencer; B.....	316	ume I. The overthrow of zarism. L.		Limits and renewals; B.....	548
Geiser, Karl F.; R.....	174	Trotsky. Translated by M. Eastman;		Kircheisen, T. M.
George Gershwin: A study in American		B.....	314; see also C, 515; C.....	Napoleon. H. St. Lawrence, translator;
music. I. Goldberg; AN.....	80	Hitlerism: The iron fist in Germany. Nordi-		AN.....	606
Giese, William Frederick		cus; B.....	401	Kirstein, Lincoln
Saine-Beuve: A literary portrait; B.....	471	Hogue, Wayman		Flesh is heir; B.....	402
Ginzburg, Benjamin; R.....	290, 403, 494, 694	Back yonder: An Ozark chronicle; B.....	656	Koht, Halvdan
Giastombury romance, a. J. C. Powys; B.....	474	Holmes, Oliver Wendell; representative opin-		Life of Ibsen, the; B.....	263
God and my father. C. Day; E.....	504	ions of; AN.....	149	Old Norse sagas, the; AN.....	707
Goethe: Man and poet. H. W. Nevins; B.....	678	Homicide in the United States. H. C.		Koppen, Edlef
Goldberg, Isaac		Brearely; B.....	605	Higher command; AN.....	26
George Gershwin: A study in Ameri-		Hook, Sidney; R.....	654	Korea, China and Japan, five books on; B.....	289 can music; AN.....	80	Hoover, four books on; B.....	375	Koussevitzky, Sergei, and his epoch. A.
Golding, Louis		Hoover's millions and how he made them. J.		Laurie. Translated by S. W. Pring;
Magnolia street; B.....	434	J. O'Brien; AN.....	606	AN.....	54
Government by judiciary. L. B. Boudin; B.....	731	Hoover, truth about. H. Corey; B.....	683	Knight, G. Wilson
Graft in business. J. T. Flynn; B.....	120	Hopper, Bruce		Imperial theme, the. Further interpreta-
Grattan, C. Hartley; R.....	315, 432	Pan-sovietism; B.....	346	tions of Shakespeare's tragedies, in-
Graves, Major General William S.		Howard, Pendleton		cluding the Roman plays; AN.....	175
America's Siberian adventure; B.....	148	Criminal justice in England; B.....	473	Krassnoff, Peter N.
Great Spanish short stories. Translated by		Howe, M. A. De Wolfe		Black mass, the; AN.....	121
W. B. Wells; AN.....	439	Portrait of an independent: Moorfield		Krutch, Joseph Wood; R.....	77, 172, 345,
Green memory. M. B. Eldershaw; AN.....	26	Storey, 1845-1929; B.....	706		518, 603,
Greene, Graham		Hubermont, Pierre		Kunitz, Joshua; R.....	262
Rumour at nightfall; AN.....	578	Thirteen men in the mine. L. H. Tit-		Kunitz, Stanley J.; R.....	175
Gregory, Alyse		terton, translator; AN.....	317
Hester Craddock; AN.....	25	Hull, Helen		L
Gregory, Horace; R.....	52, 316, 472, 655	Heat lightning; AN.....	687	Labor fact book; B.....	264
Grover Cleveland, a man foursquare. D. T.		Huxley, Aldous		Lady who came to stay, the. R. E. Spencer;
Lynch; B.....	263	Brave new world; B.....	204	B.....	375
Gruening, Ernest		Huxley. C. Ayres; B.....	374	La Farge, Oliver
Public pays, the: A study of power		Huxley, prophet of science. H. Peterson; B.....	374	Sparks fly upward; AN.....	25
propaganda; B.....	233			Laidler, Harry W.
Gruening, Ernest; R.....	79, 346,	I		Concentration of control in American in-
Gudmundsson, Kristmann	628	I saw Hitler. D. Thompson; B.....	401	dustry; B.....	520
Bridal gown, the. O. F. Theis, trans-		Ibsen, life of. H. Koht; B.....	263	Langdon-Davies, John lator; AN.....	209	Immortal Jew, the. A drama by S. R. Ly-		Man comes of age; B.....	290
Guedalla, Philip		saght; AN.....	407	Latin America, four books on; B.....	628
Wellington; B.....	147	Impassioned clay. L. Powys; B.....	291	Latin-American problems. T. F. Lee; B.....	628
Guenther, Konrad		Imperial theme, the. Further interpretations		Laugh and lie down. R. Cantwell; B.....	23
Naturalist in Brazil, a. B. Miall, trans-		of Shakespeare's tragedies, including		Laughing in the jungle. L. Adamic; B.....	472 lator; AN.....	176	the Roman plays. G. W. Knight; AN.....	175	Lawrence, D. H., book on, Lorenzo in Taos.
		Infants of the spring. W. Thurman; AN.....	176	M. D. Luhan; B.....	345
H		Inside story of the Harding tragedy, the.		Leblanc, Gerorgette
Hacker, Louis M., and B. B. Kendrick		H. M. Daugherty and T. Dixon; B.....	471	Souvenirs: My life with Maeterlinck; B.....	630
United States since 1865; the; B.....	437	Intercessor and other stories, the. M. Sin-		Lee, Thomas F.
Hacker, Louis M.; R.....	575	clair; B.....	548	Latin-American problems; B.....	628
Hale, William Harlan		International legal status of the Kwantung		Leonard, Jonathan Norton
Challenge to defeat: Modern man in		leased territory, the. C. Walter		Tragedy of Henry Ford, the; B.....	435
Goethe's world and Spengler's century;		Young; B.....	49	Leonov, Leonid
B.....	656	International note in contemporary drama,		Soviet river; B.....	577
Hall, Radclyffe		the. E. Newman; B.....	174	Thief, the. H. Butler, translator; AN.....	496
Master of the house, the; AN.....	707	J		Lesson in love, a. Colette. Translated by
Hallgren, Mauritz A.; R.....	50, 148,	Japan. I Nitobe; B.....	289	R. Benet; AN.....	688
401		Japan: A short cultural history; G. B. San-	377	Let the day perish. P. Padover; AN.....	578
Hamsun, Knut		som; AN.....		Letters from Spain. K. Capek. Translated
August; AN.....	441	Japan: An economic and financial appraisal.		by P. Selver; B.....	705
Hanley, James		H. G. Moulton; B.....	49	Letters of Emily Dickinson. Edited by
Boy; B.....	519	Japan, six books on; B.....	49	M. L. Todd; B.....	119
Men in darkness; B.....	519	Japan, China and Korea, five books on; B.....	289	Letters of Jane Welsh Carlyle to Joseph
Harbourmaster, the. W. McFee; AN.....	348	Japanese jurisdiction in the south Manchuria		Neuberg, 1848-1862. Edited by T.
Harding, Warren G., inside story of tragedy.		railway areas. C. W. Young; B.....	49	Scudder; AN.....	550
H. M. Daugherty and T. Dixon; B.....	471	Japanese population problem, the. W. R.		Letters of Philip Dormer Stanhope, 4th earl
Harlan miners speak. The report of the		Crocker; B.....	49	of Chesterfield. Edited by B. Dobrée;
Dreiser committee; B.....	629	Japan's special position in Manchuria. C. W.		B.....	547
Harris, Abram L.; R.....	23	Young; B.....	49	Letters of Robert Burns, the. Edited by J.
Harris, Frank		Jean Jacques Rousseau. M. Josephson; B.....	172	DeL. Ferguson; B.....	732
Bernard Shaw; letter by F. Hackett....	515	Jeffers, Robinson		Letters of Richard Wagner to Anton Pus-
Harris, Joel Chandler, editor and essayist.		Descent to the dead; B.....	146	nell, the. Translated and edited by
Writings edited by J. C. Harris; AN.....	377	Thurso's landing; B.....	433; see also C.....	E. Lenrow; B.....	549
Harte, Bret, biography. G. R. Stewart, Jr.;			600	Levin, Jack
B.....	22			Power ethics; B.....	79
				Lewis, Wyndham
				Doom of youth, the; B.....	518

- Lewis Henry Morgan: Social evolutionist.
B. J. Stern; B..... 657
- Lewisohn, Ludwig
Expression in America; B..... 429
- Lidin, Vladimir
Price of life, the. H. C. Matheson, translator; B..... 262
- Life of Emerson, the. Van W. Brooks; B.. 432
- Life of Ibsen. H. Koht; B..... 263
- Life of Robert Burns, the. F. Snyder; B.. 732
- Life was worth living. W. G. Robertson; B 52
- Liggett, Walter W.
Rise of Herbert Hoover, the; B..... 375
- Limits and renewals. R. Kipling; B..... 548
- Lind, Jenny, biography. E. Wagenknecht;
AN..... 80
- Lindsay, Norman
Mr. Gresham and Olympus; AN..... 405
- Lippmann, Walter, and W. O. Scroggs
United States in world affairs: 1931; B. 631
- Loeb classical library; four volumes; AN... 376
- Long, Ray, and R. R. Smith
Twenty best stories in Ray Long's twenty years as an editor; B..... 548
- Looking forward. N. M. Butler; B..... 346
- Lord, Russell
Men of earth; B..... 52
- Lorenzo in Taos. M. D. Luhan; B..... 345
- Lourie, Arthur
Sergei Koussevitzky and his epoch. S.
W. Pring, translator; AN..... 54
- Luhan, Mabel Dodge
Lorenzo in Taos; II..... 345
- Lynch, Denis Tilden
Grover Cleveland, a man foursquare; B. 263
- Lysaght, S. R.
Immortal Jew, the. A drama; AN.... 407

M

- MacCarthy, Desmond
Portraits; B..... 603
- McCordock, R. Stanley
British far eastern policy; B..... 49
- McFee, William
Harbourmaster, the; AN..... 348
- McGiffert, Arthur Cushman, junior Jonathan Edwards; AN..... 550
- McKeon, Richard; R..... 347
- Maclean, Catherine Macdonald
Dorothy Wordsworth; B..... 686
- MacLeish, Archibald
Conquistador; B..... 655
- McWilliams, Carey; R..... 22
- Macy, John; R..... 232
- Magnolia street. L. Golding; B..... 434
- Maisse, de. Journal, a, etc.; AN..... 176
- Makers of modern Italy: Napoleon to Mussolini. Sir J. A. R. Marriott; AN... 550
- Man and technics; B..... 231
- Man comes of age. J. Langdon-Davies; B.. 290
- Mangold, W. P.; R..... 120
- Manhattan side-show. K. Bercovici; AN... 440
- Maria Fernanda. H. Perez de la Ossa.
Translated by E. A. Peers; AN..... 406
- Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
Makers of modern Italy: Napoleon to Mussolini; AN..... 550
- Marvellous boy, the. E. Penzoldt. Translated by J. J. Trounstone and E.
Woolf; B..... 24
- Mary's neck. B. Tarkington; B..... 206
- Mason, Daniel Gregory
Tune in, America: A study of our coming musical independence; AN.... 54
- Masquerade of monopoly, the. F. A. Fetter;
B..... 520
- Master of the house, the. R. Hall; AN.... 707
- May Lee. G. Dennis; AN..... 120
- Means, Gardiner C.; R..... 520
- Memoirs of Glückel of Hameln. Translated by M. Lowenthal; AN..... 522
- Men in darkness. J. Hanley; B..... 519
- Men of earth. R. Lord; B..... 52
- Mencken, H. L.; R..... 374
- Mental healers. S. Zweig; B..... 494
- Merriam, Charles Edward
Written constitution and the unwritten attitude, the; B..... 24
- Middle ages, the: 300-1500. J. W. Thompson; B..... 347
- Midsummer night madness. S. O'Faolain; B 495
- Modern South America. C. W. D. Fife; B. 628
- Mofolo, Thomas
Chaka: An historical romance. F. H.
Dutton, translator; B..... 119
- Morgan, Lewis Henry; Social evolutionist.
B. J. Stern; B..... 657
- Morris, Ann Axtell
Digging in Yucatan; AN..... 80
- Morse, H. B., and H. F. McNair
Far eastern international relations; B... 289
- Moses, Montrose J.; R..... 174, 630
- Monsieur Thiers and nineteenth century
France. J. M. S. Allison; AN..... 733
- Mr. and Mrs. Pennington. F. B. Young; AN 265
- Mr. Gresham and Olympus. N. Lindsay; AN 405
- Mud and stars. D. York; AN..... 209
- Muldavin, Albert
Red fog lifts, the; AN..... 377

N

- Naked faquir. R. Bernays; AN..... 496
- Napoleon. T. M. Kircheisen; translated by
H. St. Lawrence; AN..... 606
- Naturalist in Brazil, a. K. Guenther. Translated by B. Miall; AN..... 176
- Navy, the: Defense or portent? C. A.
Beard; B..... 630
- Neagoe, Peter
Storm; AN..... 687
- Nearing, Scott
Free born; AN..... 291
- War; B..... 315
- Neff, Emery
Carlyle; B..... 576
- Nemilov, Anton
Biological tragedy of woman, the; B.. 403
- Nevinson, Henry W.
Goethe: Man and poet; B..... 678
- New conceptions of matter, the. C. G. Darwin; AN..... 266
- Newman, Evelyn
International note in contemporary drama, the; B..... 174
- Newton D. Baker: America at war. F.
Palmer; B..... 117
- Nine women. H. Sokolnikova. Translated by H. C. Stevens; AN..... 707
1919. J. Dos Passos; B.... 344; see also C. 515
- Nitobe, Inazo
Japan; B..... 289
- Nitobe, Inazo, and twenty others
Western influence in modern Japan; B.. 289
- Nixey's harlequin. A. E. Coppard; B..... 548
- No minor vices. E. S. Whitman; AN..... 209
- Nock, Albert Jay
Theory of education in the United States, the; B..... 207
- Nordicus
Hitlerism: The iron fist in Germany; B 401
- Normano, J. F.
Struggle for South America, the; B.... 628
- Norton, Henry Kittredge
Coming of South America, the; B..... 628
- Nuhn, Ferner; R..... 474
- Nunn, William L.; R..... 264

O

- O'Brien, James J.
Hoover's millions and how he made them; AN..... 606
- Odum, Howard W.
American epoch, an; AN..... 266
- O'Faolain, Sean
Midsummer night madness; B..... 495
- O'Flaherty, Liam
Puritan, the; B..... 315
- Old Norse sagas, the. H. Koht; AN..... 707
- Oliver, John Rathbone
Article thirty-two; AN..... 377
- Olmstead, A. T.
History of Palestine and Syria to the Macedonian conquest; AN..... 234
- O'Neil, George
Special hunger. The tragedy of Keats;
B..... 24
- Only yesterday. F. L. Allen; B..... 234
- Orpheus. A. Politian; AN..... 149
- O'Sheel, Sheamas
Sophokles: Antigone. A new redaction in the American language; AN..... 407
- Our changing theater. R. D. Skinner..... 407
- Ovid's Fasti. With English translation by Sir J. G. Frazer; AN..... 376
- Owen D. Young: A new type of industrial leader. I. M. Tarbell; B..... 729
- Oxford lists, the. H. C. Boulbee; AN..... 210

P

- Padover, Paul
Let the day perish; AN..... 578
- Palmer, Frederick
Newton D. Baker: America at war; B. 117
- Pan-sovietism. B. Hopper; B..... 346
- Paradine, Jane
Red like crimson; AN..... 25
- Parkes, Henry Bamford; R..... 232, 438
- Parsons, Alice Beal; R..... 705
- Pastor of Poggssee, the. G. Frenssen. Translated by K. G. Potts; AN..... 121
- Paterson, Isabel; R..... 435
- Peffer, Nathaniel; R..... 548
- Penzoldt, Ernst
Marvellous boy, the. J. J. Trounstone and E. Woolf, translators; B..... 24
- Perez de la Ossa, Huberto
Maria Fernanda. E. A. Peers, translator; AN..... 406
- Peterkin, Julia
Bright skin; AN..... 632
- Peterson, Houston
Huxley, prophet of science; B..... 374
- Philostratus: Imagines; Callistratus: Descriptions. With English translation by A. Fairbanks; AN..... 376
- Pinchot, Amos; R..... 233
- Place of prejudice in modern civilization,
the. Sir A. Keith; AN..... 658

- Place of the lion, the. C. Williams; AN... 658
- Planned society, a. G. Soule; B..... 681
- Poems. G. Scott; B..... 438
- Poems. 1928-1931. A. Tate; B..... 519
- Politian, Angelo
Orpheus; AN..... 149
- Porteous, S. D.
Psychology of a primitive people, the;
AN..... 235
- Portrait of an American. R. P. Tristram
Coffin; AN..... 120
- Portrait of an independent: Moorfield Storey, 1845-1929. M. A. De Wolfe Howe; B 706
- Portraits. D. MacCarthy; B..... 603
- Power ethics. J. Levin; B..... 79
- Powys, John Cowper
Glastonbury romance, a; B..... 474
- Powys, Llewellyn
Impassioned clay; B..... 291
- Powys, T. F.
Unclay; B..... 438
- Price of life, the. V. Lidin. Translated by
H. C. Matheson; B..... 262
- Psychology at work. Edited by P. S.
Achilles; AN..... 659
- Psychology of a primitive people, the. S. D.
Porteous; AN..... 235
- Public pays, the: A study of power propaganda. E. Gruening; B..... 233
- Puritan, the. L. O'Flaherty; B..... 315

R

- Radiquet, Raymond
Devil in the flesh, the. K. Boyle, translator; AN..... 522
- Rebel India. H. N. Brailsford; B..... 148
- Recent trends in American housing. E. E.
Wood; B..... 173
- Recaptured. Colette; AN..... 317
- Red fog lifts, the. A. Muldavin; AN..... 377
- Red like crimson. J. Paradine; AN..... 25
- Red room, the. G. Dennis; B..... 438
- Red roses for bronze. H. D.; R..... 264
- Replier, Agnes
Times and tendencies; AN..... 406
- Representative opinions of Mr. Justice
Holmes; AN..... 149
- Return I dare not. M. Kennedy; AN..... 54
- Return to yesterday. F. M. Ford; B..... 403
- Rhys, Ernest
Everyman remembers; B..... 78
- Rimbaud, Arthur, biography; B..... 51
- Rise of Herbert Hoover, the. W. W. Liggett; B..... 375
- Robertson, E. Arnot; AN..... 318
- Robertson, W. Graham
Life was worth living; B..... 52
- Robinson, Howard
Bayle the skeptic; B..... 657
- Robinson, Selma
City child; AN..... 80
- Robinson, Victor
Story of medicine, the; AN..... 550
- Rogers, Samuel
Deserter, the; AN..... 658
- Rölvaag, O. E.
Their fathers' god. T. M. Ager, translator; AN..... 122
- Rosenberg, Arthur
Birth of the German republic, the. 1871-
1918. I. F. D. Morrow, translator; B 174
- Rosenthal, Jerome; R..... 53
- Rousseau, Jean Jacques, biography. M. Josephson; B..... 172
- Rumour at nightfall. G. Greene; AN..... 578
- Run, sheep, run. M. Bodenheimer; AN.... 348
- Rural education for the regeneration of Korea. H. Kim; B..... 289
- Russia. H. von Eckardt. Translated by
C. A. Phillips; AN..... 707
- Ryskind, Morrie
Diary of an ex-president, the; extracts from 594

S

- Saginaw Paul Bunyan, the. J. Stevens; AN 265
- Sainte-Beuve: A literary portrait. W. F.
Giese; B..... 471
- Sanctis, Francesco de
History of Italian literature. J. Redfern, translator; B..... 173
- Sanson, G. B.
Japan: A short cultural history; AN... 377
- Schneider, Isidor; R..... 147, 173, 434, 733
- Schnitzler, Arthur
Flight into darkness; AN..... 25
- Schuman, Frederick L.
War and diplomacy in the French republic; B..... 78
- Schurz, Carl, biography. C. M. Fuess; B... 575
- Schwarz, Heinrich
David Octavius Hill; B..... 77
- Science at the cross roads; B..... 53
- Scott, Geoffrey
Poems; B..... 438
- Scroggs, William O., and W. Lippmann
United States in world affairs: 1931; B. 631

- Seagle, William; R.....24, 473, 605, 731
Season in hell, a: The life of Arthur Rimbaud. J. M. Carré. Translated by H. and M. Josephson; B..... 51
Seaver, Edwin; R.....519, 732
Sergei Koussevitzky and his epoch. A. Lourie. Translated by S. W. Pring; AN..... 54
Shaw, George Bernard. F. Harris; letter by F. Hackett..... 515
Sherwood, Robert Emmet
Virtuous knight, the; AN..... 318
Sinclair, May
Intercessor and other stories, the; B.... 548
Sinclair, Upton
American outpost; B..... 432
Singer, Charles
Story of living things, the; B..... 604
Skinner, R. Dana
Our changing theater..... 407
Small town. B. Field; AN..... 265
Smith, Richard R., and R. Long
Twenty best short stories in Ray Long's twenty years as an editor; B..... 548
Snyder, Franklin
Life of Robert Burns, the; B..... 732
Sokolnikova, Halina
Nine women. H. C. Stevens, translator; AN..... 707
Sophokles: Antigone. A new redaction in the American language. S. O'Sheel; AN..... 707
Soule, George
Planned society, a; B..... 681
South America, four books on; B..... 628
Souvenirs: My life with Maeterlinck. G. Leblanc; B..... 630
Soviet river. L. Leonov; B..... 577
Spanning the Atlantic: The history of the Cunard line. F. L. Babcock; B..... 344
Sparks fly upward. O. La Farge; AN..... 25
Special hunger. The tragedy of Keats. G. O'Neil; B..... 24
Spencer, R. E.
Lady who came to stay, the; B..... 375
Spengler, Oswald
Man and technics; B..... 231
Spingarn, J. E.
Creative criticism, and other essays; B.. 76
Spring books, list of..... 445
Stern, Bernhard J.
Lewis Henry Morgan; Social evolutionist; B..... 657
Stevens, James
Saginaw Paul Bunyan, the; AN..... 265
Stewart, George R., junior
Bret Harte: Argonaut and exile; B.... 22
Stewart, Maxwell S.; R.....375, 683
Stolberg, Benjamin; R.....261, 729
Storey, Moorfield, biography. M. A. De Wolfe Howe; B..... 706
Storm; P. Neagoe; AN..... 687
Story of living things, the. C. Singer; B... 604
Story of medicine, the. V. Robinson; AN... 550
Story of my life, the. C. Darrow; B..... 261
Strange adventures of Jonathan Drew, the. C. Ward; AN..... 405
Strange attacks on Herbert Hoover, the. A. Train; B..... 375
Street in Moscow, a. I. Ehrenbourg; AN... 578
Strong, L. A. G.
Brothers; AN..... 632
Struggle for South America, the. J. F. Normano; B..... 628
Sun Yat-sen versus communism. M. Williams; B..... 548
Sykes, Gerald; R.....23, 376, 684
- T
Tarbell, Ida M.
Owen D. Young: A new type of industrial leader; B..... 729
Tarkington, Booth
Mary's neck; B..... 206
Tasso, Torquato
Aminta; AN..... 149
- Tate, Allen
Poems, 1928-1931; B..... 519
Terry, Ellen, biography. E. G. Craig; B... 630
That girl. J. Deval. Translated by L. S. Morris; AN..... 522
Their fathers' god. O. E. Rølvaag. Translated by T. M. Ager; AN..... 122
Theory of education in the United States, the. A. J. Nock; B..... 207
These restless heads. B. Cabell; B..... 232
They that take the sword. E. Wingfield-Stratford; B..... 315
They were still dancing. E. Waugh; B.... 232
Thief, the. L. Leonov. Translated by H. Butler; AN..... 496
Thiers, Louis Adolphe, book on. J. M. S. Allison; AN..... 733
Thirteen men in the mine. P. Hubermont. Translated by L. H. Titterton; AN... 317
This man is my brother. M. Brinig; AN... 522
Thomas Aquinas. M. C. D'Arcy; B..... 347
Thomas, Bertram
Arabia felix: Across the "empty quarter" of Arabia; B..... 434
Thomas, Norman; R..... 402
Thompson, Dorothy
I saw Hitler; B..... 401
Thompson, James Westfall
Middle ages, the: 300-1500; B..... 347
Three loves. A. J. Cronin; AN..... 632
Thunder and dawn. G. Frank; B..... 705
Thurman, Wallace
Infants of the spring; AN..... 176
Thurso's landing. R. Jeffers; B....433; see also C..... 600
Times and tendencies. A. Repplier; AN... 406
Tough luck—Hoover again! J. L. Heaton; B 375
Towards a better life. K. Burke; B..... 289
Tragedy of Henry Ford, the. J. N. Leonard; B..... 435
Tragic America. T. Dreiser; B..... 402
Train, Arthur
Strange attacks on Herbert Hoover, the; B..... 375
Translation of the Orpheus of A. Politian and the Aminta of T. Tasso; AN..... 149
Trebitsch-Lincoln, J. L.
Autobiography of an adventurer, the. E. Burns, translator; AN..... 550
Trilling, Lionel; R.....24, 471
Trotzky, Leon
History of the Russian revolution, the. Volume I. The overthrow of tsarism. M. Eastman, translator; B....314; see also C, 515; C..... 600
Troy, William; R..... 495
Truth about Hoover, the. H. Corey; B.... 683
Tune in, America: A study of our coming musical independence. D. G. Mason; AN..... 54
Twenty best stories in Ray Long's twenty years as an editor. R. Long and R. R. Smith; B..... 548
Two living and one dead. S. Christiansen. Translated by E. Bjorkman; B..... 576
- U
Unclay. T. F. Powys; B..... 438
Underwood, A. C.
Contemporary thought of India; AN.... 121
United States in world affairs: 1931. W. Lippmann and W. O. Scroggs; B.... 631
United States since 1865, the. L. M. Hacker and B. B. Kendrick; B..... 437 Unknown war, the: The eastern front. W. Churchill; AN..... 733
- V
Van Doren, Carl; R..... 429
Van Doren, Dorothy; R.....438, 629, 686
Van Doren, Mark; R.....52, 656
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R...117, 344, 471, 706
Virtuous knight, the. R. E. Sherwood; AN. 318
- W
Wagenknecht, Edward
Jenny Lind; AN..... 80
Wagner, Richard
Letters to Anton Pusinelli. Translated and edited by E. Lenrow; B..... 549
Walton, Eda Lou; R.....146, 438, 519, 682
War. S. Nearing; B..... 315
War and diplomacy in the French republic. F. L. Schuman; B..... 78
Ward, Christopher
Strange adventures of Jonathan Drew, the; AN..... 405
Warner, Arthur; R.....234, 604, 684
Wassermann, Jacob
Doctor Kerkhoven. C. Brooks, translator; AN..... 633
Waugh, Evelyn
They were still dancing; B..... 232
Weather tree, the. M. Chapman; AN..... 405
Weigall, T. H.
Boom in paradise; AN..... 439
Wellington. P. Guedalla; B..... 147
Wescott, Glenway
Fear and trembling; B..... 684
West, Nathanael
Dream life of Balso Snell, the; AN.... 441
Western influences in modern Japan. I. Nitobe and twenty others; B..... 289
Wheless, Joseph
Forgery in Christianity; AN..... 349
White, Kenneth; R..... 375
Whitman, Edmund S.
No minor vices; AN..... 209
William, Maurice
Sun Yat-sen versus communism; B.... 548
Williams, Charles
Place of the lion, the; AN..... 658
Wilson, J. Dover
Essential Shakespeare, the; B..... 685
Wingfield-Stratford, Esme
They that take the sword; B..... 315
Winslow, Thyra Samter
Blueberry pie; B..... 548
Wood, Clement
Herbert Clark Hoover: An American tragedy; B..... 375
Wood, Edith Elmer
Recent trends in American housing; B.. 173
Wordsworth, Dorothy. C. M. Maclean; B.. 686
Wormser, I. Maurice
Frankenstein, incorporated; B..... 520
Wright, Cuthbert; R.....51, 291
Written constitution and the unwritten attitude, the. C. E. Merriam; B..... 24
Wylie, Elinor
Collected poems. Edited by W. R. Benét; B..... 682
- Y
Ybarra, T. R.
Hindenburg: The man with three lives; B..... 401
York, Dorothea
Mud and stars; AN..... 209
Young, C. Walter
International legal status of the Kwantung leased territory, the; B..... 49
Japanese jurisdiction in the south Manchuria railway areas; B..... 49
Japan's special position in Manchuria; B 49
Young, Francis Brett
Mr. and Mrs. Pennington; AN..... 265
Young, Owen D.; biography. I. M. Tarbell; B..... 729
- Z
Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R.....78, 403
Zihaly, Lajos
Deserter, the. G. Halasz, translator; AN..... 658
Zodiak. W. Eidlitz. Translated by E. Sutton; AN..... 235
Zucker, A. E.; R..... 263
Zweig, Stefan
Mental healers; B..... 494

1. The first part of the index is a list of the names of the authors of the papers in the volume. The names are arranged in alphabetical order of the last name.

2. The second part of the index is a list of the titles of the papers in the volume. The titles are arranged in alphabetical order of the first word.

3. The third part of the index is a list of the subjects of the papers in the volume. The subjects are arranged in alphabetical order of the first word.

4. The fourth part of the index is a list of the names of the institutions or organizations that have contributed papers to the volume. The names are arranged in alphabetical order of the first word.

5. The fifth part of the index is a list of the names of the individuals who have contributed papers to the volume. The names are arranged in alphabetical order of the first word.

6. The sixth part of the index is a list of the names of the journals or magazines in which the papers in the volume have been published. The names are arranged in alphabetical order of the first word.

7. The seventh part of the index is a list of the names of the books or monographs in which the papers in the volume have been published. The names are arranged in alphabetical order of the first word.

8. The eighth part of the index is a list of the names of the theses or dissertations in which the papers in the volume have been published. The names are arranged in alphabetical order of the first word.

9. The ninth part of the index is a list of the names of the articles or essays in which the papers in the volume have been published. The names are arranged in alphabetical order of the first word.

10. The tenth part of the index is a list of the names of the chapters or sections in which the papers in the volume have been published. The names are arranged in alphabetical order of the first word.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 6, 1932

No. 3470

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	1
EDITORIALS:
Japan the Outlaw.....	3
The Challenge of 1932	4
End of the Young Plan.....	5
Money and Elections	5
A Note on Prosperity.....	6
THE NATION'S HONOR ROLL FOR 1931.....	7
WAGES GO UP IN RUSSIA. By Louis Fischer.....	8
IS THERE WAR IN MANCHURIA? By A. E. Hindmarsh.....	10
IS UNCLE SAM "GOING NATIVE"? By Paul Y. Anderson.....	13
IF I WERE DICTATOR. By Harold J. Laski	15
THE CRITIC'S DILEMMA: II. THE JEST AND THE EAR. By Joseph Wood Krutch	16
PREMIER AZANA ON SPANISH POLICY. By I. M. Levy.....	18
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	19
CORRESPONDENCE	20
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	21
FINANCE: AID OR PREVENTION? By S. Palmer Harman.....	21
BOOKS, MUSIC, FILMS, DRAMA:
Sunrise. By Frances M. Frost.....	22
Bret Harte. By Carey McWilliams.....	22
Rx: Courage. By Gerald Sykes.....	23
Brown America. By Abram L. Harris.....	23
Two Novelized Biographies. By Lionel Trilling.....	24
The Paper Constitution. By William Seagle	24
Books in Brief	25
Music: A Change in Structure. By Arthur Mendel.....	26
Films: "Based on the Play—." By Margaret Marshall.....	28
Drama: New Year Suggestions. By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	28

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN FRED KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE WAR-DEBT MORATORIUM declared last June has been finally legalized by Congress. The Senate, following the favorable vote in the House, has recognized what was an accomplished fact. It had no alternative. By refusing to approve the moratorium it would not only have been disciplining President Hoover, but it might very easily have been wrecking Europe in the process. While we rejoice that the moratorium has at last been made legally as well as morally binding, we are thoroughly alarmed by the ugly, jingoistic attitude the Senate revealed in the course of its debate. We refer here not alone to the bitter speeches of Senator Johnson, which were of a sort to stir up hatred for Europe among the American people. The Senate as a whole was hardly less hostile. It refused to override the House reservation declaring against further interference with the debt agreements. It voted down, by 63 to 16 in each case, two amendments offered by Senator Howell of Nebraska and supported generally by the Progressives. Stated briefly, the amendments would have declared it the opinion of Congress that there should be no further adjustments of war debts until Europe had agreed to revise the peace treaties. On the whole the Senate showed itself wholly indifferent to the desperate plight of Europe.

ANY INCREASE made in federal tax rates should be applied to 1931 incomes so that the government can begin collecting the anticipated additional revenue in March of this year. The government cannot afford to wait until March, 1933. It needs to benefit by the contemplated tax adjustment at the earliest possible moment in order to meet the constantly growing deficit. The Democrats in Congress are opposed to this obvious necessity. Representative Rainey of Illinois, the Democratic floor leader, considers it regrettable that "the taxpayers of the country are to be subjected now to new and staggering burdens of taxation." It is regrettable, of course, but under the circumstances it is also unavoidable. Representative Rainey would soften the blow by postponing the new tax rates until 1933, that is, until after the Presidential election. He presumably fears that the country will hold the Democrats, who control the House, responsible for the increased taxes, and that this will react against the Democratic candidates in November. And meanwhile he appears willing to let the government worry along with its financial difficulties as best it can without availing itself of its privilege to obtain prompt relief through its taxing power. Here Representative Snell of New York, the Republican leader, is on more sensible ground when he declares that the government "will absolutely need the money in 1932."

IN THE PROHIBITIVE TARIFF just established by Spain, and deliberately aimed at the United States, we have the clearest measure yet afforded of the mischief done by the Hawley-Smoot law to our business and the comity of the world. We exported $82,000,000 worth of our products to Spain in 1929 and $57,500,000 in 1930. Now, in our time of distress, Spain retaliates for our high tariff by barring fourteen classes of imports, in ten of which, notably automobiles and telephone equipment, the United States is especially interested. This will not, of course, in the slightest degree affect the belief of Senator Smoot and Senator Watson that our latest tariff is the cornerstone of our industrial system, nor will it induce the President to recede from the position taken by him in his annual message to Congress that this is not the time for an overhauling of the tariff. On the contrary, there is talk in Washington of invoking the retaliatory provisions of the tariff, which, if it were done, would provide us with a first-class tariff war. All of which shows clearly how tariffs menace the peace of the world. Was there ever anything more insane than the conduct of both sides? When every country is suffering for lack of business, when industry after industry is prostrate—then, according to our realistic statesmen, is just the time to make it impossible to trade with your neighbor who wants to do business with you!

IMPRISONED within their boundaries—this is now the lot of the Austrian people. The government has achieved this by the simple device of refusing to sell railway tickets to would-be purchasers unless they can show that they possess sufficient currency to go abroad, and then forbidding the banks to sell to anybody more than the equivalent of seven dollars of such currency. A few exceptions are to be made—for example, with certain limitations, for journalists and commercial travelers; but hereafter in general no one wishing to visit friends or relatives or to seek health abroad can do so. It is explained that this is a desperate measure due to the desperate situation of Austria and the necessity of keeping within its boundaries every penny of its resources. It is an effort like that of Spain with its prohibitive tariff to make the nation "self-contained." The next step for these countries is to forbid the entrance of foreigners altogether, and then with all their people within their own frontiers they can do each other's washing and live happily forever after. That the Austrian financial situation is beyond description menacing is plain, especially as the promised French loan is not forthcoming. From Hungary, another danger spot, comes the news that it has virtually declared bankruptcy by postponing all payments on foreign debts for one year. As our investments in Hungary total $179,000,000, private American investors, according to the State Department, will lose, as a result, between $12,000,000 and $14,000,000 in the coming year.

THE POLISH TERROR in Eastern Galicia continues unabated. Writing from Lemberg, a correspondent of the Manchester Guardian says:

The oppression of the Ukrainian minority in Poland is growing worse every day. It would perhaps be wearisome to record the oppressive acts that are being committed in ever-growing numbers. . . . But there are certain things that cannot be left unrecorded, that must be heard by the civilized world—namely, the horrible and inhuman barbarities that are inflicted on Ukrainian political prisoners in Polish jails, and which are part of the war waged by the Polish dictatorship against the Ukrainian minority.

The correspondent then goes on to present numerous facts, gathered from eyewitnesses, to support these sensational charges. After many unsuccessful efforts the leaders of the Ukrainian minority finally managed to set their case before the League of Nations. The Assembly appointed a committee of three to investigate the reign of terror in Eastern Galicia. This committee was to have reported at the last session of the Assembly in September, but an unforeseen complication replete with irony prevented the report from being prepared. Kenkichi Yoshizawa, the Japanese delegate in the Assembly, had been chosen rapporteur of the committee, but he was too busy defending Japanese aggression in Manchuria to have any time left for the Ukrainian victims of the Polish terror! The question was put over until January.

EVERY DAY brings a more critical situation in India—critical for Mahatma Gandhi, who returned to face a task infinitely complicated by recent events, and critical for Great Britain, whose resort to extreme measures of repression in Bengal has only provoked deeper hostility. Jawaharlal Nehru already has been thrown into prison for his activities in the strikingly effective no-rent campaign; British officials, understandably resentful over the occasional cold-blooded assassinations of their fellows, are themselves casting off restraint and are thus increasing the desperation of the natives; the attempt to impose an unsatisfactory constitution promises a series of brutal black-and-tan episodes; and it seems altogether likely that Gandhi before long will again be lodged behind the bars. As during his last imprisonment, he would doubtless be an inspiring symbol of unity; but the old policy of "divide and rule" bids fair to aid the British purpose. The desertion of the National Congress program by the All-India Moslem League cannot be regarded, unfortunately, as a wholly ingenuous move; Moslem delegates at London, before their departure, held a love feast with the reactionary Secretary of State for India, Sir Samuel Hoare, and have been used, wittingly or unwittingly, by the Tories to brake the radical momentum of the Congress. The strength of Gandhi among the Moslem masses, however, must not be underestimated; and the undiminished zeal of the rank-and-file Indians, in the face of imprisonment and beatings, is a portent with which the British will have to reckon.

THE MINERS IN HARLAN and Bell counties in Kentucky have been called out on strike by the National Miners Union. We are not sure what this left-wing organization hopes to gain by this maneuver. Certainly conditions are not ripe now for a successful strike, though it cannot be denied that the underpaid and underfed pit workers of Kentucky have much to fight for. Living conditions among these people are considerably worse than the deplorable conditions found in the Pennsylvania and Ohio coal areas. Kentucky, together with Tennessee and West Virginia, has long been a stronghold of anti-unionism, and in consequence the wages paid there have always been low. Meanwhile the civil warfare in Harlan County continues unabated. A deputy sheriff was fatally wounded on Christmas Eve, his death being the ninth of its kind since the labor troubles began a year ago. The shooting occurred just a few days before the opening of the latest of the series of murder trials growing out of these disturbances. More than thirty miners, including the president of the Evarts local of the United Mine Workers, are being tried, or are about to be tried, for the death of four men at Evarts last spring. It is into this atmosphere that the leaders of the National Miners Union have plunged with their call for a strike.

THE "RED SQUAD" of the Los Angeles police department has finally run into trouble. For months this group of picked policemen has been breaking up meetings of radicals and liberals, beating up workers and sympathizers, and applying third-degree methods to persons arrested. Lately the "red squad" overreached itself in stopping a mass-meeting of liberals called to arouse sympathy for Tom Mooney and the Kentucky miners. Night-sticks, blackjacks, and tear-bombs were generously used in driving from the hall the five thousand men and women who had assembled. The reaction of the "better element" of Los Angeles was, from the standpoint of the police, rather surprising. The bar association, the Municipal League, and several religious organizations addressed a protest to Mayor John C. Porter. He promptly replied that "this communication is apparently from individuals who seem to be defending an organization that preaches the overthrow of our government, and I see no reason why I should recognize these demands." But he modified his attitude when the City Council by a vote of 11 to 4 roundly condemned the terroristic tactics of the police. A compromise was reached after a conference between the mayor, police department, and various city officials whereby it was agreed that the "red squad" should refrain from breaking up meetings until an "overt act" had been committed. But it was left to the police to define for themselves what might constitute an "overt act."

A GREAT VICTORY has been won for free speech in Detroit, where an antediluvian member of the Board of Education, Dr. B. J. Shurly, undertook to dismiss from his position in the Teachers College Dr. Walter G. Bergman for the crime of sedition, specifically for daring to criticize the Reserve Officers Training Corps in schools and colleges. Dr. Bergman happens to have been a veteran who served in France, and he is commander of the Thomas Jefferson Post of the American Legion. That did not prevent Dr. Shurly's attack, although the offending utterance was not even made in a classroom, but at a meeting of members of the League for Industrial Democracy. The result of Dr. Shurly's action is a vindication of the right of the Detroit school teacher to have opinions of his own and to express them, as guaranteed by the Constitution. At a meeting on December 8 the Board of Education passed a resolution guaranteeing free speech to teachers outside of the classroom "upon all subjects, including social, economic, and political questions, without fear of official reprimand or coercion on the part of anyone connected with the Board of Education." Dr. Shurly voted for this in order to move a reconsideration. It did him no good. On December 22 the board voted by 4 to 3 not to reconsider the resolution. At the same meeting there was a magnificent debate for two hours on disarmament, free speech, the Pact of Paris, sedition, birth control, free love, trade unionism, and other subjects, which must have been well worth a high price of admission and might even have been enlightening to Dr. Shurly.

IT IS PLEASANT to record that President Hoover has recognized the stake that women have in the disarmament of the world by appointing President Mary E. Woolley of Mt. Holyoke College to the disarmament commission. The precedent thus established is of such far-reaching importance that we are not disposed to cavil today at his selection of a woman who belongs to the conservative wing of the peace movement instead of the militant. We are, indeed, the more grateful because of the sad fact that Ambassador Dawes has now been chosen to head the delegation, Henry P. Fletcher having fortunately decided not to serve. When will President Hoover learn how personally unpopular and ineffective Ambassador Dawes is in Europe wherever he goes because of his extraordinarily bad manners? In this case the selection is all the more regrettable because, as the New York Times has pointed out, the other countries involved, notably England and Germany, are sending their highest-rank statesmen—England Premier MacDonald, and Germany its Chancellor. The failure to add Mr. Stimson to the commission handicaps it from the very start. It is further weighted down by the appointment of the big-navy and imperialistic Senator Swanson of Virginia, alongside of whom is to serve some Republican Senator, probably of the conventional type, while the fifth member is to be Hugh Gibson, who has failed so signally in previous conferences.

Japan the Outlaw

THAT is what Japan is today—an outlaw nation. In the face of increasing evidence that the leading countries of the world are entirely opposed to its war in Manchuria, Japan steadily goes ahead completing its conquest. Borrowing a leaf out of the imperialistic books of England, and of the United States in Nicaragua and elsewhere, it describes the Chinese troops as "bandits" and proposes to "clean them up." More than that, its government continues to insist that all criticisms of its actions are merely preventing the early coming of peace by misleading the Chinese into resisting—a clever, much too clever, move against the natural outburst of world indignation. Meanwhile Japan, with militarists in complete control of the government, continues to reinforce its armies; to advance; to organize a government of its own for Manchuria; and to violate freely the Nine-Power Treaty, the Covenant of the League of Nations, and the Kellogg Pact.

In other words, Japan is running amuck in the family of nations. "What are you going to do about it?" is the question it poses to the Powers. What, indeed? No more important query has been put to the League and to the United States since the World War. If the League sits by irresolute while the war goes on, it will sustain a blow to its prestige from which it may never recover. It may, of course, continue to hide behind the subterfuge that there is no war in Manchuria, but everyone recognizes the subterfuge and knows that Article 16 of the Covenant of the League clearly applies. This reads that in the event of an act of war by any member

... it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the League, which hereby undertakes immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade and financial relations . . . the prohibition of all financial, personal, or commercial intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking state and the nationals of any other state, whether a member of the League or not.

If the League cannot act under this article, it would certainly not be able to act if France in the next few months should decide to war upon Germany and again invade that country; there will be few future cases in which offending nations will not be in a position to point to this precedent in the case of Manchuria and to thumb their noses at the League.

As for ourselves, we are firmly of the opinion that there ought to be a direct expression by our government of the indignation the American people feel at treaty violation as unblushing and shameless as Germany's violation of its treaty with Belgium in 1914. Washington should publish at once the entire correspondence between this country and Japan, and in our judgment should devote itself to organizing an effective international protest—we would wish that we might, in common with other nations, withdraw our Ambassador from Tokio, precisely as the Italian government once withdrew its Ambassador from Washington in protest against the lynching of its nationals in New Orleans. Our government owes it to itself to leave no stone unturned to vindicate the violated treaties and to express its complete disapprobation of this act of indefensible aggression.

The Challenge of 1932

THE dark year of 1931 has passed into history, a year for the United States of suffering, bitterness, and increasing disillusionment. It is bad enough for a country to tumble overnight from the greatest height of prosperity ever attained; but it is worse for it to discover that it is without statesmen to guide it, that its leadership in finance, commerce, and politics is bankrupt, and that no clear-cut program is offered as the ladder on which to climb out of the pit of blackness into the sunlight of peace, comfort, and satisfactory living for all. We thought ourselves a race of supermen with prosperity our vassal for all time. We looked with contempt upon the effete nations of Europe. Had we not just shown them how to win the World War and done it in the briefest time, and were we not showing them the ideal way of life? We had read with mingled distrust and incredulity of what they had told us as to their suffering and economic misery—only to find that suffering and misery could walk in upon us in the twinkling of an eye; and we are still in the stage of incredulous amazement that this has come to us.

Yet there are some positive gains to be recorded. We have thus far shown astonishing self-control. The most lawless country in the world has not witnessed a single bread riot of importance; it has not been necessary in a single case to call out the troops as during the panic of 1877. While The Nation, as our readers are aware, believes that there must be federal aid to tide the unemployed over the crisis, it recognizes with satisfaction and gratitude the generous private response to the calls for aid—more generous than would be found in any other country, even though all the sufferers have by no means been reached. We give thanks, too, that the economic disaster which confronts us has made men and women think, has made multitudes realize that our institutions are not perfect, that there is something radically wrong with the situation under which, even at the height of prosperity, many are on the ragged edge of starvation while others literally roll in wealth.

That this thinking has not yet taken definite shape or concentrated upon any given reforms is true. But the fact that public opinion is not yet organized, that the necessary leadership is still lacking, constitutes the greatest challenge of 1932. We have far to go in making over our processes of government and we shall have to face the blind and bitter opposition of many who do not realize that the prevailing system has broken down, that the doctrine of rugged individualism is today a joke, that the kind of leadership we have had leads only to despair. They are the ones who refused to heed the warning that the period of standing still in our political and economic thought during the reign of Calvin Coolidge, which they applauded because it left them free to go their way to their heart's content, was really a grave period of retrogression. They are the ones who still indulge in talk of the largest navy in the world, who desire an imperialistic government, who daily sanction the violations of the fundamental guaranties of the Constitution, who wish to lock up or shoot anybody whose opinions and vision differ from theirs. We shall find as the depression gets more intense that we have fascists without number who can persuade themselves that fascism is really 100 per cent Americanism and quite justified in the defense of our institutions and our Constitution. They are the ones who will not give up their special privileges, their favored position, without determined effort to crush any opposition.

Now if that opposition comes to pass (William G. McAdoo, on his return to California from a trip to the East, reports that he is astonished at the "evidences of an amazing amount of unrest and discontent under the crust," and that he found "a desperate feeling among the people" that they are dominated by utterly selfish and unworthy political parties) it will be dangerous, indeed, if it is not formulated, organized, and led along liberal lines. Here again is the challenge for the coming year. To all who believe in liberalism it is an extraordinary opportunity to show to their fellow-citizens that there are ways out, that there is no need for despair if only they will direct themselves to the removal of the obvious obstacles to economic rehabilitation, and then to the consideration of reforms. The tariff is the enemy, as are the debts and reparations, the piling up of gold, the buying of elections by campaign funds, the intolerable misuse of the Presidential powers to renominate the sitting President, and all the other barriers to the full, clear, and free expression of the popular will. The foes are still the possessors of special privilege. It remains as true as when Woodrow Wilson used those words in 1912 that "our government has been for the past few years under the control of heads of great allied corporations with special interests," that "the government of the United States in recent years has not been administered by the common people of the United States" but by "this little group or that little group. . . . An invisible empire has been set up above the forms of democracy." Words which were echoed by Theodore Roosevelt when he said July 27, 1912: "This crooked control of both the old parties by the beneficiaries of political and business privilege renders it hopeless to expect any far-reaching and fundamental service from either." No one will maintain that this control has been overthrown, that it is a whit less menacing than when those two men railed against it.

We are well aware that the citizens of the United States are going to be profoundly concerned with their own affairs during the next twelve months; they will be trying to keep their families in clothing and food, to avoid the foreclosure of the mortgages on their homes. Yet we believe that in increasing numbers as the political campaign draws near and then takes its course, the multitudes will find time to think of national affairs as well as of their own immediate concerns. And if a spur is needed, it will be found in every large community in the country and in many of the rural districts, in the sight of many American men, women, and children on the verge of starvation through no fault of their own. We believe the Republic to be in jeopardy, but we have not lost faith that it can be rescued and set upon the right paths through the instrumentality of the present form of government, adequately altered to meet the needs of the situation.

End of the Young Plan

WHEN one considers the restrictions with which the Young Plan advisory committee was hedged about, the immensely relevant and important questions that it was technically prohibited from considering, the outspokenness of its report is remarkable, and is perhaps directly responsible for the crucial decision of the French and British governments to call a conference to reconsider the entire question of debts and reparations. The committee left little doubt regarding its real opinion. It concluded that "the burden of taxation in Germany has become so high that there is no margin for further increase." The unparalleled steps taken to maintain the currency and the budget show "a resolute desire on the part of the German government to meet the situation." The committee was practically forbidden by the terms of its instructions to consider the "unconditional" annuities, but declares in unmistakable terms that in spite of its efforts Germany "will not be able in the year beginning in July next to transfer the conditional part of her annuity." The committee goes on to declare that it would not consider that it had fully accomplished its task if it did not draw the attention of the governments concerned to "the unprecedented gravity of the crisis, the magnitude of which undoubtedly exceeds the 'relatively short depression' envisaged in the Young Plan," which contemplated a steady expansion in world trade, both in volume and in value. The present committee points out that the opposite of this has occurred. The burden on Germany is consequently very much greater even than the Young Plan itself originally contemplated, for not only has the trade of the world shrunk in value, but the violent fall in gold prices has added greatly to the real burden of all payments fixed in gold. The German problem, says the report finally, "is largely responsible for the growing financial paralysis of the world," and it ends with an appeal to the governments "to permit no delay in dealing with this great crisis."

Here is the conclusion of a body of economic experts with representatives from both neutral countries and Germany's principal creditors—from Switzerland, Japan, Yugoslavia, Sweden, Holland, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Great Britain, the United States, and France. They have once for all disposed of the myth that Germany is "faking," or "staging" a crisis, that she has made no real effort to pay, that she could pay if she were willing to. They have not only said that Germany's "conditional" payments cannot be met, but everything in their report implies beyond question that the "unconditional" payments cannot be met either. They have virtually said, in brief, in the teeth of the most stubborn French opposition, and with the French representative even agreeing, that the Young Plan is at an end.

What is perhaps even more astonishing than the report itself is the immediate action of the French government in agreeing with the British government to call a conference at The Hague on January 18 to reconsider the whole question of debts and reparations. This seems to mean—and if it does it is immensely encouraging news—that the French are at last ready to recognize realities and abandon the Young Plan. But it means also that France and Britain, in return for a further postponement and probable scaling down of the reparations, will demand from the United States a further postponement and scaling down of their debt to us. They have reached a temper where they seem to accept at face value Mr. Hoover's statement that we will take no lead in the matter. They evidently will have not the slightest hesitation in announcing that they will take advantage of the clause in their agreement with us which permits them to forgo payments on the debt for a period of two years. More grave than that, responsible opinion in both France and Britain has reached a point where it is seriously considering downright repudiation if our Congress does not alter its uncompromising attitude. Sir Arthur Salter probably sums up this point of view in his remark that "Congress has done its best to exempt default from dishonor." If the debts should be repudiated, it would not only mean that the United States would get nothing—that would be unimportant compared with the shock to world confidence, the economic disorganization, and the international bitterness and recrimination that would follow. By its tragic blindness to the situation, by the appalling stupidity of its recent declaration that it is "against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced," Congress has succeeded in uniting Europe against America, in making the United States, and not France, the chief barrier to any recovery from the world economic crisis.

Money and Elections

HUGE expenditures go hand in hand with election of public officials in the United States. This has been pointed out before; it needs to be discussed again and again. Critics have long sneered at democracy as being, or so they contend, simply a stupid counting of noses. In truth, democracy in this country has become hardly more than a mere counting of dollars. Every Presidential election since 1896, with one exception, that of 1916, has been won by the party that has spent the most money. Congressional, State, and local elections have with equal constancy gone the same way. Moreover, campaign expenditures have invariably been larger, in most cases much larger, than the salaries of the officials to be elected. In 1930, for example, a minimum of $5,505,712 was spent to nominate and elect thirty-two Senators, a sum fifteen times greater than the combined salaries of the Senators who were elected. This fact has just been brought out by the Senate investigating committee, of which Gerald P. Nye is chairman, in a report that strongly censures the present excessive use of money in campaigns, and that at the same time proposes certain remedies.

The Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 was designed to check corruption in Presidential and Congressional elections by requiring candidates or their managers to make known to Congress the sources of all contributions to their campaign funds, and the exact amounts and purposes of their campaign expenditures. The Nye committee has come to the conclusion that this law is defective in several major respects. It has proposed that the 1925 act be remedied by placing definite maximum limits on expenditures, by extending the provisions of the law to cover primary elections, by providing that reports of contributions and expenditures now made to Congress be given wide publicity through the clerks of the various federal district courts, and by concentrating responsibility for all expenditures made in his behalf on the candidate himself or his publicly authorized agents. Individuals or organizations who collect or distribute funds on behalf of a candidate without his explicit authorization would be subjected to severe penalties. Under a bill introduced by Chairman Nye, in which these projected reforms are incorporated, expenditures for the nomination of a Presidential candidate would be limited to $250,000; for the election of a President and a Vice-President, $5,000,000; for the nomination and election of a Senator, $50,000; for the nomination and election of a Representative, $10,000.

The Nye bill merits the immediate consideration of Congress, although many of its provisions are plainly quite impracticable. Publicity for campaign expenditures is essential. So is the provision for fixing responsibility for contributions and expenditures upon individual candidates or their agents. Most important, however, is the proposal to place a definite limitation upon expenditures, and this reform should be enacted without fail. We cannot agree to the precise limitations laid down in the Nye bill. For example, $5,000,000 appears to be an extravagant sum to allow any party to spend on the election of a President. Again, it would be unfair to permit a party in Nevada, which has a population of less than 100,000, to expend $50,000 in electing a Senator, while a party in New York State, with its population of 12,000,000, is held to the same sum. But we can hope that these inequalities will be removed before the Nye bill is finally acted upon.

While we wish to see this measure enacted because it is actually a step forward, we nevertheless wonder if it goes far enough. One factor that has escaped the Nye committee is that under its projected reforms national politics would still be a rich man's game. Wealth would continue to control the two major parties. A new minority or labor party would be placed under an immense handicap unless it could from its own ranks raise sufficient funds to compete with the usually handsome contributions wealthy industrialists and bankers make to the major parties. In The Nation of February 4, 1931, we suggested that by simplifying our election system we could make the maintenance of a permanent party organization less expensive and less necessary. We also recalled the proposal made to the New York State Legislature and other bodies "that the government bear all the election and campaign expenses. Under this system the State would print pamphlets for all the candidates of whatever party, giving each candidate for the same office the same amount of space. No other publicity or advertising would be permitted except over the radio and perhaps from public platforms. Radio time, however, would be divided equally among the various candidates in accordance with the prominence or importance of the office being sought." This proposal would have the merit of putting all parties on an equal basis and it would greatly reduce the dependence of political parties upon wealthy individuals for financial support. Until we can make the parties as nearly as possible independent of such contributions, our party organizations will continue to be dominated and our elections to be influenced by individuals and organizations whose motives are purely personal or selfish.

A Note on Prosperity

IT is treasonable, of course, but there are moments when optimism turns our stomach and when, out of pure perversity, we look on the dark side of things. To the mechanically smiling prophets of prosperity by bluff we reply with a hollow sigh, and if we met Mr. Hoover himself we should say in Shakespeare's own words: "For God's sake, let us sit upon the ground and tell sad stories of the death of kings."

In such moments as these it is our dearest pleasure to imagine what a steady unbroken decline would be like, and we find the game almost as thrilling as reading the most catastrophic pages of Gibbon himself. We begin with a thought of the Empire State Building, which now reaches its proud but empty shaft into a smiling, implacable sky, and from that we try to go on to picture to ourself a whole city hopelessly too big for its dwindling needs—to imagine Fifth Avenue lined with abandoned shops and a subway no longer crowded but reaching out into regions which have become deserted villages at last. "I can remember," the oldest inhabitant will remark, "when Central Park was in the middle of the city and when Forty-second Street was considered downtown."

We have, after all, had no experience whatever with this sort of thing. We have known only an expanding world, and we have got used to taking it for granted that each successive year would find the mechanics of life better than they were the year before. Everything gets bigger and better as a matter of course. When we move into a new apartment it is more convenient than the one we left; when we buy a new car it is faster and easier to drive than the old one we discarded. But things can go down hill as well as up and there have been nations which have got used to a gradual simplification of life; which have seen great buildings, not torn down to make room for greater ones, but gradually abandoned one after another; which have frankly recognized the impossibility of maintaining the machinery which their forefathers had set up. The aqueducts of Rome were never rebuilt after Belisarius destroyed them and from that day forward most Romans went unbathed. Can we imagine similar catastrophes overtaking us and can we imagine ourselves in a similar frame of mind? Can we imagine taking it for granted that when our electric refrigerator breaks down we shall have to go back to an icebox, that the road over which we drive will not be repaired but will get worse and worse until it is impassable at last? Can we imagine horse-drawn vehicles gradually replacing taxicabs and a day when the Bronx subway will cease to run because it has no passengers?

Such things are not—as we like to remind ourselves when we read certain utterances of certain public men—historically impossible. And in order still further to stimulate our readers into that optimistic reaction which this gloomy vision will undoubtedly provoke, we must cite the observation attributed to John Maynard Keynes. After all, he is said to have said, there is no natural or inevitable period of time during which a depression can last, although the longest one known to history is that which occurred during the Middle Ages. It lasted 800 years.

The Nation's Honor Roll for 1931

FOR the sixth time, as its roll of merit for the year just passed, The Nation presents a list, by no means a final one, of American men and women who have, by public service, contributions to art or science, or additions to the gaiety of nations, deserved in some measure the thanks of their fellow-citizens.

Public Service

ALANSON B. HOUGHTON, former Ambassador to Great Britain and to Germany, for his constructive courage in urging statesman-like policies of peace.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Senator from Wisconsin, for his exceptional record in Congress, and especially for his efforts on behalf of the unemployed.

THE WOMEN'S INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE FOR PEACE AND FREEDOM, for organizing and conducting the trans-continental peace caravan, and DOROTHY DETZER, its secretary in Washington, for the remarkable day-by-day devotion and ability with which she has directed the executive work of this organization.

THE COMMISSION ON LAW ENFORCEMENT AND OBSERVANCE, otherwise known as the WICKERSHAM COMMISSION, for its informative reports in which were revealed and denounced the brutal treatment accorded minors in prisons, the general viciousness and many shortcomings of our prison system, and the lawlessness of public officials.

THE SOUTHERN COMMISSION FOR THE STUDY OF LYNCHING, for its careful investigation of and its thoughtful and highly useful report on America's worst national crime.

MAYOR JAMES J. WALKER of New York, FRANK P. WALSH, AARON SAPIRO, GOVERNOR FLOYD OLSON of Minnesota, and every other public-spirited American who has taken part in the long and so far unsuccessful fight to secure a pardon for Thomas J. Mooney, fifteen years a prisoner in a California penitentiary.

PHILIP F. LA FOLLETTE, Governor of Wisconsin, for his constructive and provocative address to the State legislature on the economic crisis.

GEORGE W. MAXEY, Justice of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, for his courageous dissenting opinion in the case of the Kraemer Hosiery Company vs. Louis F. Budenz, in which he held that labor organizers no less than other Americans are entitled to enjoy the right of free speech.

Journalism

LOUIS F. STARK, for his sympathetic and comprehensive report on the pitiful living conditions among the Kentucky miners, and the NEW YORK Times for publishing his articles.

H. L. MENCKEN, for writing, and the BALTIMORE Sun for publishing, an article denouncing the Salisbury lynchers, a fearless and effective polemic written in the face of threats by Salisbury business men to withdraw their business from Baltimore.

THE BUFFALO Evening News, for its admirable work in improving conditions that amounted virtually to peonage in the employment and housing of laborers on State public works.

Books and Plays

EUGENE O'NEILL, for "Mourning Becomes Electra," a tragedy which is not only the best of its author's work but one which adds new dignity to the American drama.

ALLA NAZIMOVA and ALICE BRADY, for their impressive embodiment of Mrs. Mannon and Lavinia in the O'Neill tragedy.

S. N. BEHRMAN, for "Brief Moment," a suave and intelligent play which demonstrates its author's right to a place in the great tradition of high comedy.

EVELYN SCOTT, for "A Calendar of Sin," the first novel of the year, a long and highly moving story of the pitiful folly of the human race.

MORRIS R. COHEN, whose "Reason and Nature" seems destined to rank as a brilliant milestone in American thought.

EMMA GOLDMAN, for "Living My Life," a burning, partisan, and utterly fascinating chronicle of one of the world's most famous and most consistent rebels.

The anonymous authors of "Washington Merry-Go-Round," for giving us an honest and human picture of the many individuals who make up our national government.

Art and Architecture

The artists and anthropologists who assembled and presented to the public the EXPOSITION OF INDIAN TRIBAL ARTS, displayed in New York City in December and now to make a tour of the country in the interests of the colorful and appealing arts and crafts of the American Indian.

The designers and builders of the GEORGE WASHINGTON MEMORIAL BRIDGE, and particularly the Chief Engineer, O. H. AMMANN, for creating the most beautiful suspension bridge built in the neighborhood of New York City since the Brooklyn Bridge.

OTTO SOGLOW, for "Pretty Pictures" and for his Little King who shows weekly in the New Yorker how pleasant and simple it is to be a ruler if you only know how.

Music

MRS. HARRIET LANIER, who until her death on October 27 was the patron of the Friends of Music, and ARTHUR BODANZKY, the director of this organization, which for ten years has given New York some of its finest musical performances.

ARTURO TOSCANINI, Italian conductor of an American orchestra, who displayed in his defiance of and contempt for the compulsions of Italian fascism a fine championship of the ideals of artistic freedom.

Science

PROFESSOR HAROLD C. UREY and DR. G. M. MURPHY of Columbia University, and DR. F. G. BRICKWEDDE of the United States Bureau of Standards in Washington, for their discovery of the hydrogen isotope, a new atom which will prove important in the study of atomic structure.

DRS. F. B. DOWNING, W. H. CAROTHERS, and IRA WILLIAMS, for the discovery of "duprene," a synthetic rubber suitable for commercial production.

Wages Go Up in Russia

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, December 5

"COMMUNISM in Russia is dead. Stalin has introduced unequal wages and thrown Soviet principles overboard." This is often the sensational verdict of week-end visitors or summer-month tourists in the Soviet Union. They do not know that Soviet Russia was never communistic, and that the Bolsheviks never made any such claim. For some time after 1917, according to the vulgar version, communism reigned supreme in the red republic. Then, presumably, the Bolsheviks engaged in backsliding, and now Karl Marx is merely a bearded fetish. "Look at the three classes on Soviet railroads." "Some people are better dressed than others." These "discoveries" lead the uninitiated "observer" to the incorrect conclusion that the Bolsheviks have shed their bolshevism.

When the Bolsheviks depart from equality of treatment and pay they are accused of inconsistency. When they are supposed to make everything "level" they are accused of regimentation. The fact of the matter is, however, that there ~~was~~ always inequality in the Soviet state, and there always will be until it passes out of the present "almost-Socialist" stage into the millennium of pure communism. The class war, which still exists in the U. S. S. R., implies inequality.

The extremes in Russia are closer than in any other country. Very sharp variations have disappeared. The richest man in the Soviet Union probably does not earn over $25,000 a year, and he is an exception—very likely a best-selling author. The destruction of the upper classes in Russia coincided with the improvement in the lot of the "under dog." All special privileges and many comforts and luxuries are made available first or only to the worker. The degree of inequality, consequently, is smaller than in bourgeois states. But it is there.

Little over a year ago foreign newspapers heralded a tremendous change in the U. S. S. R. The Bolsheviks, they announced, had abolished equality of wages. This was absolutely wrong. The Bolsheviks had never introduced equality of wages.

What happened in 1930 and what happened again in 1931 is simply this: the distance between the best-paid and the poorest-paid workers has been increased by a more universal application of the piece-work system. The wage differential is greater now than ever before in Soviet history, and recent decrees regarding progressive piece work promise to make it greater still. But no principle is involved, for a differential existed from the first day of the revolution.

The years between 1917 and 1921 were a period of military communism, not of militant communism. Exigencies of war forced the Bolsheviks to nationalize factories sooner than they had intended. They tried to abolish money not out of radicalism but because goods were few and had to be commandeered by the state for the army. Money had no value when private trade was prohibited, when the government did not sell, and when its limited civilian supplies were distributed as payments in kind to munition workers.

Men received rations independently of the amount of work they performed, but some plants were favored over others and the population was divided into groups. Production was low. Although some leaders dreamed of planned economy, nobody had an immediate economic program. It was military communism plus chaos. That is not communism.

When the "New Economic Policy" stage was reached in 1921, trade-union leaders like Tomsy and Dogadov advocated equal pay. They thought primarily of the interests of the unskilled worker. The Supreme Economic Council, on the other hand, insisted on unequal pay. It was the employer and it wished to stimulate output. The government industrialists wanted to see a wide divergence between the lowest and highest wage; they urged a ratio of one to four. If a street-cleaner received 40 rubles a month, they would have given the mechanic 160. The trade unions, however, fought for and got a narrower ratio of 1 to 2.8; if the mechanic earned 160 rubles, the street-cleaner received about 57.

This was fitting for the early days of Soviet industrial activity. Most workers were badly paid, and they therefore needed protection against a too low minimum. In 1923, for instance, 64 per cent of the workers of Soviet Russia were receiving as little as 40 rubles or less a month. But in 1930 this figure had dropped to only 8 per cent. In 1923 a mere 1.4 per cent of the proletariat earned between 100 and 150 rubles per month; in 1930, 21.9 per cent. Similarly, workers receiving in excess of 150 rubles were only 0.1 per cent of the urban working class in 1923 but 7.6 per cent in 1930. As the state grew richer, it was more important to guarantee to the worker the possibility of an unhindered upward movement of wages than to perpetuate a system designed primarily to safeguard the interests of the diminishing body of the poorly paid.

Until the recent reforms all gainfully employed persons were divided into seventeen categories, with charwomen and errand boys in the first category and engineers in the seventeenth. Such a system obviously precluded equality of pay. But the difference between categories was small, and within each category a uniform wage existed. It is this that has now been abandoned. Categories are no more. Men on the same job, on the same kind of machine, may and do earn different incomes. Individual effort and ability determine earning power. There is no maximum wage. In other words—piece work.

Communists and radicals in capitalist countries attack piece work as a method of sweating. How, then, could the Bolsheviks introduce it so widely? I posed this question during the last few weeks to many prominent and rank-and-file Communists. Their answers followed the same line of argument.

"Piece work in the U. S. S. R. does not create unemployment as it must in capitalist countries," they said. "On the contrary, it creates more employment by producing more raw materials and machines for further manufacturing process. If piece-workers abroad were as protected by labor laws, and as well provided with free medical care, sanatoria, rest homes, and social insurance as the Soviet proletariat, if they had a seven-hour day and five-day week abroad, and if they exercised our indirect control over management, bourgeois piece work would not be an evil." One man added: "Piece work makes the capitalists richer. We therefore oppose it. Here piece work makes the proletarian state richer and does us laborers no harm. In fact, our wages have risen. We therefore favor it." If piece work spurs the Russian worker on to greater effort, it cannot hurt him. He has never exerted himself at his job. Even under the piece-work system, the energy he expends is considerably limited.

Piece work is not a Bolshevik ideal, and the Bolsheviks hope that some day living conditions, industrial conditions, culture, and social incentives will be such as to warrant a return to a flat, though not equal, wage. But this is a matter of the future. Today both the state and the workers are interested primarily in raising production.

Output has been on the upgrade in every Soviet industry I know of. Sometimes the rate of progress is mad: rubber was 48 per cent, oil 30 per cent, and locomotives 26 per cent higher in September, 1931, than in September, 1930. Production during the first ten months of 1931 was 19.4 per cent above the same period of 1930. Coal, too, has at last hit a new stride. In the coal and iron industries—the most important in the country and yet the most backward in fulfilling the cruelly exacting schedules of the Five-Year Plan—the government has now introduced a progressive piece-work-plus-bonus system which provides for income increases of from 30 to 100 per cent for workers and engineers. Other industries immediately entered loud claims for the same innovation, but the government has replied with an equally loud no. As an alternative, Piatakov, vice-chairman of the Supreme Economic Council, has ordered plant directors to raise wages by raising individual productivity and thus factory productivity and thus the factory's available funds for wage payment, instead, as has been the practice too often heretofore, of hiring new hands in order to increase output. It is held that the fulfilment of the plan by employing fresh workers not only flattens the curve of wage increases but limits the labor supply for newly constructed industrial units. The government prefers stimulated productivity per man and, consequently, higher wages per man.

Despite the intensification of effort resulting from piece work, the number of workers continues to rise very sharply. Persons working for hire in the U. S. S. R. numbered 10,990,000 in 1926-27, 12,394,000 in 1929, and 14,587,000 in 1930. If government officials, teachers, and agricultural laborers are excluded from these totals, the remainder is the industrial proletariat—Russia's ruling class. It counted 5,000,000 in 1926-27, 6,000,000 in 1929, and 7,800,000 in 1930. Estimates for 1931 put the strength of the urban proletariat at 9,500,000. The figure mounts quickly, and with hundreds of new plants beginning operations as the Five-Year Plan draws to a close, it should reach 11,000,000 to 12,000,000 by 1932. Hence the absence of unemployment. Hence the scarcity of workers and the necessity of bringing unskilled laborers direct from the village and women direct from the kitchen sink to modern factories, where their efficiency and the quality of their products must be poor. Immigration of foreign workers on an increasing scale will partially stop the gap. Despite its fabulous birth-rate (an annual excess of births over deaths of about 3,500,000), the Soviet Union may yet be another America to Europe's surplus humanity. Meanwhile, however, the dearth of skilled or semi-skilled labor severely handicaps Bolshevik industry. The government is spending hundreds of millions of rubles on training-schools for new cadres. It loses millions more when raw recruits ruin expensive equipment. But the state has no choice. This is all part of the vast expense of educating a nation to leadership and a better standard of living.

As a result of the growth of the proletariat, the state's wage bill has risen many billions. Wage raises have sent it up still farther. Ivan Kraval, a member of the collegium of the Labor Commissariat, tells me that real wages are 70 per cent higher in 1931 than in 1913. There can be no doubt about the increase of real wages between 1921 and 1927. The question is whether they improved during the Five-Year Plan period—since 1928. At first glance, many observers would reply in the negative. But investigation and thought warrant another view. The U. S. S. R. is the most difficult country in the world in which to check the realness of income. A cost-of-living index would be endlessly complicated. Every worker in the U. S. S. R. is receiving more paper currency in his pay envelope. Sometimes his monetary salary is 50 to 100 per cent higher than it was three years ago. But what can he buy with it? Two weavers earn two hundred rubles each. The factory of one has a closed cooperative store which is fairly well stocked. In it he can purchase meat, butter on occasions, manufactured articles, and vegetables at cheap cooperative prices. He seldom resorts to the free private market or to the expensive "commercial" state stores. His real wage has certainly risen perceptibly above the 1927 level. But the second weaver has no closed cooperative, and must supplement the poor supplies of the ordinary "open" cooperative with purchases at exorbitant prices. His real income suffers. Or, take another case. One factory or office has established a restaurant. For sixty kopeks an employee can eat a hearty meal which would probably cost two rubles and sixty kopeks to prepare at home. He can also carry dinners to his wife and children. Millions of persons gainfully employed avail themselves of these low-price kitchens. Their real wages mount correspondingly. Some factories and government institutions, however, have as yet organized no such communal feeding facilities. Their employees have a higher cost of living and lower real wages. The supply of food and manufactured articles has appreciably improved in the last year, and the depression in real income which followed the inception of the Five-Year Plan has consequently been largely erased as far as manual workers are concerned. Officials, however, do not enjoy the privileges of factory proletarians, and still have a hard time making both ends meet unless—as is sometimes the case with physicians, economists, and others—they hold two or three full-pay jobs.

Other circumstances must be considered in reckoning Soviet real wages. In his classic volume on "Real Wages in the United States: 1890-1926," Professor Paul H. Douglas includes many items other than direct money income. For instance, he attributes 5 per cent out of a 55 per cent increase in real wages to the drop in the number of each worker's dependents. In Russia this percentage would be much higher. The number of women in industry, according to official statistics, was 673,000 in 1927-28 and 1,276,000 in 1931. Many thousands of workers' wives, in addition, have found non-factory jobs. And when wives support themselves, the real wages of their husbands go up. Moreover, with the unsatisfied demand for labor, more youths are entering factories and thus helping their parents raise the family's income. The fact that universal compulsory education now exists for elementary and in many districts for secondary schools, and that new crèches spring up every day, means that more children are receiving at least one free hot meal a day—another item in the workers' real budget.

Apart from money the wages of the Soviet proletariat include social benefits valued at 30 per cent of real wages. Such social services are an annual fortnight's vacation with pay, free medical aid, free pharmacy, free cures in rest homes and sanatoria (a million workers stayed in sanatoria this year), six or eight weeks' vacation with pay for women before child delivery and the same period after delivery (Soviet babies now receive a little free layette of diapers, shirts, socks, blankets, and the like when they are born), free night sanatoria, sick insurance, and free or cheap burial for all trade-union members. These facilities have improved in recent years and therefore have a greater real value.

For the women who are gainfully employed for the first time, and for a million or more peasants who enter industry each year, any wage is a bigger real wage than what they formerly earned. Literally hundreds of thousands of workers, moreover, attend night schools or special courses to acquire skill. Such added qualification immediately fetches a better price. Since the possibilities for advancement within Soviet industry are unlimited, a constant movement of workers is taking place from a lower to a higher rung of the ladder, and coincidentally to a higher real wage.

It is difficult to get tickets to Moscow theaters nowadays. Why? Because whole performances are bought out by factories and workers' clubs. Some, but too few, proletarians have occupied new cooperative apartments. I have talked to workers about their incomes. "In 1927 you could have bought all the butter you wanted," I argue. "Yes, but the family was poor and we couldn't afford butter. And sometimes when we could we had no desire for it. We had not yet reached a point where we wanted butter." Even today the worker who cannot purchase butter at low cooperative prices does without it. It, and other necessities, are not yet necessities to him. The living conditions of Soviet citizens must be compared not with those of the richest foreign countries but with the way the average Russian lived before the revolution. In that light there is not the minutest doubt that Soviet workers are much better off than in 1914. And they would be still better off if they drank less vodka.

I do not know whether hours of work affect real-wage calculations. They are certainly an important factor in the standard of living. In the U. S. S. R. wages rise as the number of hours drops. The average length of the working day in Russia in 1913 was 9.87 hours; in 1931, 7.02. Reduction of the working days per month further decreases the time each worker spends at his job. The five-day week still obtains in many factories. It means that a worker enjoys six sabbaths a month instead of the normal four plus. Where it has been temporarily abandoned for complicated technical and disciplinary reasons, a six-day week with five sabbaths a month has been substituted. This, Kraval of the Labor Commissariat informs me, is only a transitional stage. Factories employing 400,000 workingmen have already been transferred to the new system—four days of seven-and-one-half-hour length followed by two complete days of rest—which the government proposes to introduce generally during the second Five-Year Plan. And the goal which Soviet Russia intends to reach by 1937 is a five-hour day for all factory workers. Office employees already have a six-hour day.

Is There War in Manchuria?

By A. E. HINDMARSH

TO the very casual observer this query may seem flip-pant because most of us think of war as organized bloodshed by armed forces of states—and that is commonly known to be prevalent in Manchuria today. After a moment's pause, however, one is puzzled by obvious contradictions. Is not war "outlawed" by the Pact of Paris? Are not both Japan and China bound by the provisions of the League of Nations Covenant to abstain from war? Has war stolen upon a world which has during the past decade more and more gloried in the increasing strength of its agencies for peace? What of these agencies, and of that world public opinion whose moral force was to be expressed through them in behalf of lasting world peace?

The average man, he whose "opinion" was to constitute a representative portion of this great moral force, is troubled; he is mentally harassed in direct proportion to the depth of his abiding faith in the potency of the world's peace machinery. If the military encounters in Manchuria do constitute war, then the League Covenant and the Pact of Paris are surely empty of effectiveness, have betrayed fond hopes. If the killing of several hundred persons, combatants and noncombatants, is not war it surely approaches wholesale murder—and should be stopped. In any event, most of us who are not handicapped in our thinking by certain legal prescriptions and definitions have come to the conclusion that the League of Nations and the Kellogg-Briand pact are certainly devoid of a large part of the "force for peace" attributed to them by smooth-spoken officials and hopeful private enthusiasts. We are sure that international peace is either broken or threatened, that the trouble is patent and undisguised, and that vaunted international agencies and a world of public opinion seem to have accomplished nothing in arrest of that trouble.

Of course if this very elementary, perhaps naive, view of the situation were presented to one of the agile-minded statesmen called upon to think of the matter, it would easily be demolished. In the first place, he would say, the struggle in China is not war in the legal sense—it may be war in fact (de facto) but it is not legal war (de jure). If you follow that and boldly ask, Is it a status of peace, then, which prevails as between China and Japan? he will answer that it is not peace either. Then comes the additional coverage—it is not peace, it is not war, it is a status midway between peace and war! If you insist on names you will find that the practice of nations for centuries has gradually condoned a relationship between states avowedly engaged in physical combat but neither at peace nor at war; this condition is called a status of "reprisals," and the measures of physical force are called acts of reprisal or sometimes simply reprisals.

The legal doctrine and the practice of reprisals have a long history. Statesmen and jurists have reasoned certain forms of physical violence out of the categories of both peace and war since early medieval times. After the end of the Napoleonic wars, however, the anomalous concept became much more useful. As the rights of neutral states became more fixed and certain and the duties of states at war became correspondingly greater, practical reasons for avoidance by bellicose states of the war status increased. Throughout the nineteenth century and into the twentieth we find major Powers availing themselves of the doctrine of reprisals to evade the legal and moral consequences which would attach to their acts if undertaken as incidents in a "war." States and statesmen were willing and able to prostitute fact to theory in order thus to acquire a certain freedom from legal obligations, indefinite and vague as these often were. Today a state which goes to war is subject to much more onerous moral and legal liabilities, especially if that state is a League member or a signatory of the Pact of Paris, and Japan and China are both.

It makes little practical difference what we call these acts of warfare. Depending upon the predominant element of force used, they have been called embargoes, pacific blockades, bombardment, occupation, intervention, and just plain seizure of property. In American practice we have chosen usually the occupation method, called it intervention, and justified it on specious grounds as a form of reprisals. More vivid minds have referred to this method of using force short of war to secure state policy or rights as "quarterdeck diplomacy." It so happens that American intervention has usually been successful without resort to widespread military operations; moreover, the grievances on which the intervention was grounded have usually been fairly clearly understood at home. American public opinion, therefore, has not been prone to question the exact nature of the anomalous situation which appears to exist today in Manchuria.

Prior to the World War the use of measures of force while refusing to recognize the existence of a state of war was a frequent practice of Great Britain, France, Germany, and the United States. During the past century the so-called pacific blockade has been employed on at least nine occasions by France and Great Britain against smaller Powers, mainly in South America; in the same period these armed forces of states have occupied strategic portions of foreign territory to enforce various state demands. From 1850 to 1907 some fifty-three revolutions occurred in the area of the Panama Canal Zone, requiring the United States on many occasions to use its naval forces to enforce treaty stipulations. The bombardment of Greytown, Nicaragua, by United States forces in 1853 is notable in this series. Failure of the Nicaraguan government to protect American citizens trading in the area brought bombardment and complete destruction to the coast city. A more recent instance was the occupation by United States forces (1,000 men) of Vera Cruz, Mexico, bombardment of part of the city, and seizure of the customs houses and control of the customs revenue.

Some twenty-five to thirty instances of the use of force during the past century by great Powers against small Powers could be cited. In each case it was denied that a state of war existed; the ground for resort to force was put on the inability of the smaller state to offer a sufficient protection to the nationals of the complaining state or on the failure of the smaller state to live up to treaty obligations.

Today Japan appears to base similar measures of force on similar grounds. Unless something has occurred since 1914 to render illegal acts condoned as legal during the preceding century, Japan's position, from a legal point of view, seems impregnable, for it was generally agreed that the practice of reprisals had, during the nineteenth century, acquired legality in international law.

At this point the inquirer will be assured generally that the past decade has included changes vastly altering the situation. He will be referred to the Covenant of the League, to the Nine-Power Treaty of the Washington conference, and to the Kellogg-Briand pact. These, we are told, legally prohibit the course of action taken by Japan and assumed by her to be legal and sanctioned by international law and practice.

If any one general belief has prompted men to support post-war peace movements, especially the League of Nations and the Pact of Paris, it is the conviction that these are means of preserving peace by eliminating war. Others of us, not quite so sanguine, have tended to believe that present peace machinery will certainly aid in eliminating the causes of war. However one may look at the matter, the belief has held that somehow or other the settlement of international disputes by resort to force of arms was now relegated to history and less enlightened days. Few of us have wondered just how far a state is legally able—if willing—to go, under existing international commitments, in the use of force short of war. The League has put this question to itself and has refused to answer. True, resort to reprisals or measures of force short of war is usually less widespread and less disastrous than formal war; but such measures often make war inevitable unless the weaker party—which may at the same time be the justly aggrieved party—is willing to concede all demands made upon it.

The facts in the Manchurian situation fit precisely into this nineteenth-century picture. Japanese troops have occupied large territorial zones on Chinese territory. The territory so occupied is beyond that area falling clearly within the scope of treaty arrangements; but Japan contends that the military occupation is justified on two grounds—namely, to protect her nationals living in the occupied territory and to protect treaty rights bearing on the Japanese-owned rail lines. Treaty rights and protection of nationals abroad were the favorite grounds for military intervention throughout the nineteenth century. The present intervention is of such a nature that China would, if her military strength were comparable with that of Japan, regard it as equivalent to a declaration of war, and war would ensue—that is, war de jure, formal, legal war, declared and duly notified to the world. But China is not in a position to do that; she has relied on the moral strength of her position; the specific source of her reliance is the Covenant of the League of Nations. Why has the League been unable to take any positive steps to bring about a settlement of a situation admittedly critical since September 18, 1931? The answer is simple: the Covenant of the League aims at the preservation of peace by the prevention of war. The use of force short of war is another matter.

This failure to recognize in the Covenant a status of international violence between peace and war is a loophole in that document apt to be far more disastrous than minor procedural lacunae concerning which volumes have been written. But Japan is not pioneering in this field. In 1923 Italy bombarded the Greek island of Corfu, killing some seventy persons, and occupied the island until her demands were satisfied. Greece appealed to the League, but Italy was able successfully to contend that such measures were not prohibited by the Covenant. At the time of the appeal both the Assembly and the Council were in session but no action was taken by either body. The moment was opportune for the Council to define its powers under the Covenant but it failed to take a decided stand. Its failure gave a certain strength to the Italian point of view—a view which Japan is able to rely upon today as a strong precedent. Before the Council the Italian representative, Mr. Salandra, pointed out that the Council acquired no jurisdiction under Articles 12 or 15 of the Covenant, for the dispute was not one “likely to lead to a rupture” as there specified. (Under the circumstances Greece, like China today, was too weak to offer more than fervid oral protest at Geneva.) Contending that these articles were founded on a danger of war, he continued: “The peace of the world is not troubled or threatened by Italy. It would more likely be threatened if responsible states were able to assume that there was a means of escaping the consequences of their own misdeeds by complaining of sanctions and endeavoring to insure that the causes which rendered these sanctions necessary should be forgotten.” Greece had already indicated the hopelessness of appealing under Article 16 (setting forth sanctions against a League member which resorts to war in disregard of its Covenant obligations) by shifting her ground from that article to Article 15. Nor could the Council have taken positive action under Article 10, for there is no ground on which to classify reprisals generally as “aggression.”

The League has rendered this criterion next to useless by its inability to decide on any general principles approaching a definition of an aggressor. The very limit of the Council's action in 1923-24 was its statement of competence to undertake an inquiry. It remains apparent that the Covenant is aimed primarily at the elimination of “war” in the legal sense; in effect this is to encourage resort to other forms of aggression, admittedly valid under the Covenant. These methods of mere incipient warfare are apt to impose adequate physical pressure on the weak state without imposing on the aggressor generally accepted legal restraints such as neutral rights and laws of war, vague and uncertain as they are.

Of course the actual situation would be different if the disputing Powers were more nearly of equal military strength. The history of reprisals indicates that it is primarily a force method employed against weak Powers by strong Powers which for reasons of policy, are unwilling to undertake a full-fledged war. The aversion of a strong world public opinion to war is more than ever likely to drive war under cover. It is likely to emerge in more expedient guises—some normal and inevitable, such as tariff “wars,” trade competition, and propaganda; others fraught with danger and verging on or involving physical combat, such as various forms of reprisals described above.

Whatever may be Japan's moral fault in the present situation her legal position before the League is impregnable in the light of the history of international law before 1920 and in view of the Council's interpretation of its own constitution in the Corfu affair in 1924. It is impossible to point to any portion of the Covenant which her military actions in China have clearly violated; on the contrary, Japan can point to a long line of precedents in which Great Britain, France, and the United States have pursued similar courses of action in similar circumstances. Legally Japan rests her case on solid ground. The fact that she rests her case at Geneva solely on legal bases cannot be held against her. In recent years the world has rarely seen a state fail to take full advantage of every legal and technical support available.

It is beyond doubt that the present apparent failure of the League to grapple successfully and authoritatively with the problem will have wide and damaging effects on the prestige of that institution. Adverse effects were noticeable in 1924 after the Italian defiance, but the relative youth of the League was offered as excuse for its impotency. The real task, however, is so to phrase the positive obligations of the Covenant as to include measures of force short of war in the same category as war in the legal sense. In short, the time is ripe to abolish the casuistic distinction between war in the legal sense and war in fact. The distinction is an invention of hair-splitting theorists who attempted, especially in the nineteenth century, to reconcile the refusal of major Powers to assume legal responsibilities of war with recurring acts of warfare. By distinguishing acts of war and a state of war it was possible to reconcile theory and fact. Today we are unable to continue this once useful fiction; the distinction is now positively dangerous in so far as it offers an expedient by which aggressive states are able to evade heavy responsibilities, both moral and legal. Moreover, the world has become so closely knit that it is no longer possible to regard acts of warfare as confined in their effects to a restricted locality. Overt acts of violence arouse national flames, and these tend to become widespread, whether such acts are referred to as reprisals of a “pacific” nature or as open war.

Until the Covenant of the League is adapted to include definite restraint on “measures of force,” whether or not such measures are subject to classification as part of war or as “likely to lead to a rupture” (after all who knows what is “likely” to follow as a consequence in international affairs?), until that revision is made, the League will continue without jurisdiction in a field of imminent danger. Unfortunately, the moral force, too, of the League's work, of its reports and recommendations, will diminish to a vanishing-point as incidents such as the Corfu and Manchurian affairs recur.

A question arises as to the effectiveness of the Kellogg-Briand pact. The fact that the parties to that agreement undertake not to wage aggressive war and limit themselves to the use of "pacific" means for the settlement of international disputes has no legal effect upon the use of such measures as are now being executed in Manchuria. Such measures, under the general classification of reprisals, have for centuries been accepted in international law as "pacific" means of settling disputes; they are held to differ from other methods, such as negotiation and arbitration, in that they are non-amicable rather than amicable.

Even if Japan were to acknowledge a state of war as existing, the Pact of Paris could hardly be regarded as of controlling effect. Its force is negated by exceptions specified in negotiations; especially is it denuded of effect by the generally noted reservation that it does not prohibit wars of self-defense. Until aggression is defined (and it has not been), every war is apt to be regarded as a self-defense war.

The merit of the pact is in its moral force; it is doubtful if it was even intended to have more than a moral effect. Probably it was intended that the League Covenant should give rise to more positive obligations; but it too, in this instance, is limited to moral influence. The only other document cited as placing legal restraint on the actions of Japan is the Nine-Power Treaty signed at Washington (1921-22). By this Japan, together with several other Powers, pledged herself "to respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China." Just what may be the legal content of this undertaking is a subject of speculation. Japan has consistently contended that her actions in Manchuria in no way violate the pledge as stated. It is to be noted that all the terms therein used—"sovereignty," "independence," and "integrity"—are very general in nature, wholly defying definition. In the recent advisory opinion of the World Court concerning the Austro-German customs union the question of what constituted the "independence" of Austria (as referred to in the Treaty of St. Germain, Article 88) was in issue. A majority of eight judges were able to agree that Austria's independence means "the continued existence of Austria within the present frontiers, as a separate state, with the sole right of decision inter alia in economic matters." But seven dissenting judges were unwilling to go so far in defining the scope of the term. The meaning of "sovereignty" and "territorial and administrative integrity" is even more vague.

The significance of the present state of Sino-Japanese relations lies in the fact that, in spite of so-called advances made since 1920 toward eliminating war and the causes of war, there exists today no legal restraint on the use of force methods arbitrarily regarded by a state as "pacific." Such methods, when directed by a powerful state against one pitifully weak, may not lead to war at once; but they do cause resentment in neighboring states, and, what is just as serious, this freedom from restraint certainly diminishes the frequency and importance of sincerely peaceful methods of settling international disputes.

Originally there was no reason why Japan and China could not have agreed on a settlement of their difficulties at Geneva, but the extent to which the civil section of the Japanese government is now committed by the military—which has acted "legally" from the beginning so far as international commitments are concerned—prevents immediate reversal of policy. Had force measures been from the start clearly contrary to solemn agreements, both the League and the Japanese government would have been strengthened in their desire to reach an early solution without further violence.

It seems apparent that modern peace-preserving efforts are glaringly defective so long as they fail to include prohibition of all force methods. Military and moral forces are probably maintained primarily for potential wars, but their use in time of peace is important. By limiting the legal scope of such use, or by eliminating it entirely, states would be induced to support arbitral and judicial methods of settling interstate disputes. In the absence of such limitation or elimination, military and naval strength still remains too important a factor in international relations.

Is Uncle Sam "Going Native"?

The Stars and Stripes Forever

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, December 26

SINCE joining the ranks of the unemployed, Santa Claus probably doesn't care much what happens, but if he again exhibits himself in the United States this year he had better wrap his emaciated form in the Stars and Stripes. Every reliable sign indicates that we are about to witness a resurgence of nationalistic spirit far more savage and intense than that which characterized the disillusionment following the World War. Unless your venerable correspondent is a trifle cracked, the average American is not merely muttering "America first" to himself, he is getting ready to yell: "To hell with Europe!" Whether this is right or wrong, wise or foolish, I do not intend to argue. The important thing is the fact itself. Political conditions shift rapidly, but at this juncture Herbert Hoover is heading surely for the fate that overtook Woodrow Wilson. Our dear old ragged Uncle Sam exhibits every symptom of "going native." It is true the House by more than three to one, and the Senate by more than five to one, voted to ratify the Hoover moratorium on war debts. But only those of us who were on the ground could appreciate the poignant envy with which scores of Senators and Representatives listened to the attacks on the proposal and secretly wished to God they were free to join in them.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■

THAT vote will produce some important political casualties. A great many honest and well-informed persons (including the editors of The Nation) believe the moratorium was necessary to prevent the economic collapse of Europe. But whether you like the moratorium or whether you don't (I don't), it is impossible to excuse the devious, insincere, and irregular methods which the Administration employed to put it through. Instead of taking the orderly course of calling a special session of Congress, President Hoover submitted his proposal to individual members of Congress by telegram, and after receiving private assurances of support from a majority, submitted to a revision of his original proposal at the hands of France, and then insisted that the majority was pledged to support the revised proposal! Hiram Johnson, in my opinion, was thoroughly justified in declaring that the issue was between dictatorship and representative government. After all, we do have a Constitution and it is just possible that the preservation of our form of government is more important than the moratorium. The sight of the President of the United States taking a straw vote of Congress on a revenue measure involving $250,000,000, and then holding the members to it, is a trifle racy for these aging arteries.

* * * * *

THE case for international cooperation has not been helped by the testimony before the Senate Finance Committee of three eminent bankers—Thomas Lamont of Morgan and Company, Charles E. Mitchell of the National City Bank, and Otto Kahn of Kuhn, Loeb and Company. Mr. Mitchell's tactics were especially damaging to the cause. It appears all too plainly that the financial houses represented by these estimable gentlemen, and their competitors, succeeded in selling to the American public a series of foreign securities on which the buyers now stand to take a loss of more than two billion dollars. Yet immediately prior to his appearance on the witness stand Mitchell sought at a private conference to persuade Democratic Senators that "undue" agitation of this subject would have dire economic consequences. His attempt to bully and patronize the committee gained nothing except the sycophantic applause of the New York financial writers who came in his train, and caused a painful impression on both houses of Congress. Lamont did better, and Kahn was infinitely more candid than either, but the ugly central fact remains that the houses which floated this paper made a profit by doing it and the innocent investors are threatened with an appalling loss. Despite the bland suavity of Mr. Lamont and the magnificent truculence of Mr. Mitchell the real question is one of good judgment and good faith on the part of our largest banking institutions. The question has not been answered.

* * * * *

AMONG the incidents of the moratorium battle, none promises more interesting consequences than the solemn decision of the Administration to put Representative Louis McFadden of Pennsylvania "on the spot" for having attacked President Hoover. During his long and industrious career in the House Mr. McFadden has been a regular and influential Republican. There is no intention here to defend or criticize him. The facts are that he made a serious charge against the President; that he offered to produce evidence supporting it; that instead of accepting his challenge the Administration took the cowardly and brutal course of depriving him of patronage, Senator Dave Reed announcing that "hereafter we will treat McFadden just as if he had died." As usual, it now appears that "Little Dave" spoke too soon. His colleague, Senator Davis, was supposed to be a party to the political crucifixion of McFadden, but Davis, whose ears are flattened from constant pressing against the soil of Pennsylvania, has sent private word to McFadden that he has no sympathy with that vengeful enterprise. Indeed, the information now reaching Washington indicates not only that McFadden will be renominated for his seat in the House, but that he would have an excellent chance of beating Reed for the Senate. Mrs. Gifford Pinchot's decision to run against McFadden on the ground that "he insulted our President" has not tended to increase her husband's prestige in this community. This is a singularly awkward time for any Pinchot to be running on a "support-Hoover" platform. I should like to have heard the conversation that took place between the Governor and Mrs. Pinchot before she announced her intention.

* * * * *

TO suggest at this stage of the depression that Hoover has any plan for curing it would be like taking a pulmotor to a funeral, which would be unseemly. His main prescription since Congress convened has been for a Reconstruction Finance Corporation—which turns out on examination to be a plan to lend government funds to the railroads. Nobody doubts that the railroads are in a bad way, and why such pains were taken to disguise the actual purpose of this plan is just another of those Hoover mysteries. The proposal is embodied in a Senate bill which abounds in allusions to banks, building and loan associations, insurance companies, and agriculture, and which finally, in the most covert manner, "also" includes railroads. The truth is that a billion dollars' worth of railroad securities will mature in the next three years. The railroads must borrow money to meet them and naturally they are eager to get it at a low rate. Under this bill the Treasury would subscribe the $500,000,000 capital of the new corporation, which on the basis of loans made by it would have power to issue $1,500,000,000 in debentures. Because of the intangible security on which they rest, debentures bear a high interest rate in comparison with bonds. Why, if the government desires to raise money to be lent to the railroads, does it not obtain that money by issuing bonds? Senator Glass has raised that question and it has been raised still more pointedly by bankers. In this instance Mr. Hoover has again reversed himself by deciding to "put the government into business" on a scale which eventually might result in government possession of railroads, banks, and insurance companies. That idea does not frighten me, but if we are going to do it, why not do it in the most economical and business-like way?

* * * * *

AT this point someone is certain to ask what became of the National Credit Corporation—born at the famous Sunday-night consultation at the White House—which was to apply the magic of private initiative to the puzzle of frozen credits. The answer is simple but sad. About $400,000,000 has been subscribed to the pool, but only $10,000,000 of it has been lent! Aladdin fumbles or the lamp has lost its power, and with sorrow and resignation Mr. Hoover will sign precisely the sort of credit measure that Senator Glass sees fit to hand him.

If I Were Dictator*

By HAROLD J. LASKI

I LACK, I fear, the disposition which loves the command of men, and were I to succeed to great place, my impulse would be to disembarass myself of its power and inconveniences. I prefer, therefore, to indicate the lines upon which, as I conceive, social policy should move, if we are to preserve and to enlarge the confines of civilization.

1. The supreme need, to me, is a democratic world, by which I mean a world where the personality of the common man has full room for self-expression. Such a world I believe to be impossible in the presence of great economic inequalities; and I believe, therefore, that the greatest urgency of our time is a policy which seeks to effect this purpose. It means, I think, that the essential sources of wealth should be socialized—finance, power, coal, transport, iron and steel. It requires the destruction of that system of inheritance which creates and makes so largely permanent a leisured class which performs no function for society in return for the gains it receives. It would seek such an equalization of income as would make men and women significant for the functions they perform and not for the property to which they are annexed.

2. An equal society of this kind seems to me the high-road to many other goods I desire. Without such a society I do not see any effective prospect of freedom of thought. For so long as thought is offensive to a given social order in which inequality exists, those who profit by the inequality will stigmatize such thought as sedition; and they will use the machinery of the law to suppress it. Yet without freedom of thought the personality of man is painfully abridged. The lesson of his experience cannot be made articulate. He is forced into silence; and it is then assumed by his governors that his silence is a measure of his content.

3. An equal society alone offers the prospect of a decent educational system. In our present unequal society we educate a few in the habits of command and most for the duty of obedience. We make financiers, salesmen, doctors, lawyers, mechanics, cashiers, laborers; we do not make men. For a true education would open to the many a direct avenue to the cultural heritage of the race. This, for the vast majority, is a closed book even in Anglo-American civilization. The creative use of leisure, which, in an age dominated by the machine, is for most the period of significance, is unattainable by men whom education has not trained to the use of the mind in speculative matters. An unequal society does not permit this training to be widespread; partly because it wants, as nearly as may be, a monopoly of knowledge for the class already in possession, and partly because a society in which men and women were educated, that is, trained to the use of mind as a skeptical instrument, would not long continue to endure the consequences of inequality.

4. I desire an equal society, further, because it seems to me the condition of international peace. The roots of war are almost invariably economic in nature. National struggles are not rivalries between peoples, though propaganda exploits the possibilities of group-hate to make them appear to be such; they are struggles between the exploiting classes among different peoples to achieve greater gain. International peace, as I think, demands the disappearance of the sovereign state and its replacement by a world order. For the sovereign state is, in all essential matters, a panoply assumed by a dominant class to use the resources of the state for its own purposes. The wickedness of armaments, the follies of tariffs, the problems caused by different standards of living are all insoluble so long as each nation state remains in vital realms the arbiter of its own destiny. Only as we attempt a world ordering of what are, in effect, matters of world concern can we meet the issues of our time realistically and in terms of deliberate plan. A world order is, in any sense instinct with serious meaning, impossible in an unequal society; for it is to the interest of the economically powerful to prevent its advent. Even where a group of these, as the international bankers, may seem to favor international peace, it is with the stabilization of their power, and not with the attainment of social justice, that they are in reality concerned.

5. An equal society is, further, the only condition upon which decent treatment of the backward or less powerful peoples seems to be possible. A capitalistic society is driven by its nature to exploit the native of Africa, or India, or the Philippines. A world order, based upon the concept of equality, would make it possible to enforce the concept of trusteeship now theoretically inherent in the system of mandates; and the road from trusteeship to freedom is a direct one. But we shall not travel that road unless we first pass by the gate of equality. The profits of the alternative routes are too high.

6. I should like, further, to see the rapid erosion of organized religions. The accusation that they are the opium of the people seems to me the more justified, the more completely their history and consequences are understood. They make men satisfied with, or complacent about, the injustice of the present social order by the prospect they offer, without a tithe of serious evidence, of a future state of blessedness. They perpetuate all over the world obsolete systems of morality and sex relations. They substitute charity for justice and thus act as an anodyne for the conscience of the rich and a plaster for the sufferings of the poor. They develop habits among their members which are a hindrance to the fuller operation of reason in social life.

7. I desire, also, to see the practice of birth control—perhaps the greatest discovery since the invention of fire—made freely available to all social classes. It is the main avenue to the emancipation of women. It is the best safeguard for a proper relationship between parents and children. It is the surest way of making effective comradeship possible between men and women. I know few things so intolerable as the fact that divine revelation should be claimed for the obsolete habits of an Eastern nomadic tribe and their consequent imposition upon a society which might otherwise open a high-road to freedom. Birth control alone makes possible the conquest by society of hereditary degeneracy. If Roman Catholics and others find its methods offensive, no one asks that they should practice them. But they ought not to make their private view of moral truth the measure of permissible social practice.

* The sixth of a series of articles on this subject. Others, by Morris Ernst and Oswald Garrison Villard, will follow in early issues.—EDITOR THE NATION.

8. Finally, if I could, I should like to suffuse all our educational systems with an insistence upon the two essential virtues of skepticism and experiment. Until we are prepared to admit that most of what we announce as necessary truth or vital institutions are, in large part, merely the truth or institutions to which we have grown accustomed, we shall ourselves place the main barriers in the way of social advance. Skepticism is essential that we may not stay unduly the prisoners of our past; experiment that we may not be paralyzed by the unwillingness to be dogmatic about matters of social constitution. Both promote the habit of tolerance; and tolerance has ever been the parent of discovery.

The Critic's Dilemma*

II. The Jest and the Ear

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN the first instalment of this discussion some emphasis was laid upon the patent fact that various significant works of art have been executed in accordance with aesthetic theories which are plainly incompatible with one another. The realm of poetry, for example, is obviously more extensive than is implied by the various great poets and great critics who have undertaken to define it, and what is true of poetry is no less true of literature in general. Tradition and taste affirm the worth of artists more varied than theories of art can find room for, and the criteria proposed by any school of criticism imply the dismissal of works which readers of discrimination are by no means willing to neglect.

A familiarity with the history of human opinion and its variability does not, however, produce skepticism—except in the minds of those who are already temperamentally inclined toward it. Hence, it is hardly to be expected that critics should cease to advance general opinions concerning the nature and function of art merely because they know how widely such opinions have differed from one another in the past, and it is, perhaps, not at all desirable that they should do so. Convictions of some sort are necessary for effective writing, either creative or critical, just as they are necessary for effective living, and life as well as literature has gone on because people have passionately believed—on quite insufficient evidence—that art, God, justice, duty, righteousness, and the rest consisted in this or that.

Human society depends upon those various artificial structures which are known as law, religion, philosophy, morality, and the rest, but what it requires is merely a law, a religion, a philosophy, and so on. It can not only exist but flourish upon the basis of the most varied theoretical foundations so long as it has genuinely accepted one or another, and what is true of the social arts is equally true of those which are representative. The convictions of Flaubert and the convictions of Verlaine each promoted the development of one sort of literature, just as the convictions of Saint Francis and the convictions of Cellini each promoted the development of one sort of life. Whole societies as well as mere individual lives or individual poems may be executed in very different manners, but successful works of literature no less than successful lives or successful societies are always faithful to some style, and the aesthetic theories which profess to define the aims and methods of literature as a whole actually do, very often, accurately define one of these possible styles—just as ethical systems which profess to define the whole duty of man actually do lay down the rules in accordance with which a style of living may successfully be achieved.

It is therefore neither surprising nor wholly unfortunate that theories of art should develop as inevitably and as variously as do theories of law, of justice, and of morality. It is not even surprising that a certain long unfashionable intransigence should now be making its reappearance among literary critics, and that a kind of authoritarianism should once more be defended—with grave dignity by the admirers of T. S. Eliot and with a bumptious truculence by the disciples of Irving Babbitt. The skeptic can reflect calmly that similar opinions have flourished before, and that they have even encouraged the production of various worthy works without having made impossible the development of other and quite interesting styles. Thus there were classicists before Mr. Babbitt who did not, nevertheless, prevent the appearance of Rousseau; and Pope no more prevented the development of Keats than the contempt of Keats annihilated the merits of Pope. But when this same skeptic is driven to defend his own unwillingness to leap upon any particular bandwagon, he may take comfort in the fact that skepticism still has the best of the argument at least, and that by logical methods it is still as difficult to establish absolutes in the field of literary criticism as it is to establish them in the field of politics or morality.

As Shakespeare has it, "The prosperity of a jest lies in the ear of the hearer," and aesthetics is concerned with the effect which a work of art has upon us. But this effect is the result of an apperception; it is conditioned by the associations set up between the various elements of the vicarious experience afforded by the work in question and our own individual memories, opinions, and experiences. It differs, therefore, from person to person, and two critics who appear to be passing different judgments upon the same poem or tale are in reality passing judgment upon two different things which may bear very little resemblance to one another. Nor is there any way to avoid this, since art is in its nature suggestive, since it can function only by calling attention to something in ourselves, and any book which we read becomes, inevitably, as we read it, a collaboration between its author and ourselves.

* The first article in this series by Mr. Krutch was printed in The Nation of December 2. The third, and concluding, article will appear in an early issue.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Even the most dogmatic of critics commonly recognize the more obvious conclusions to be drawn from the fact that the value of a work of literature depends upon the intelligibility of its symbols and upon the existence of someone to whom those symbols are, at a given moment, intelligible. Thus no one would deny that it would be useless to discuss the value of an epic composed in a completely lost language, and few, if any, would fail to recognize another aspect of the same fact by admitting that a certain maturity of knowledge and experience, a certain age in years, must be reached before "Othello" becomes a greater work of literature than the story of Jack and the Beanstalk. Yet once this fact is admitted, the whole attempt to assign an absolute value to a work of art falls heavily to the ground unless it is buttressed by the assumption that it is possible to find and use some "normal" and normally cultured man whose whole temperament, experience, and knowledge have been standardized, and whose apperception of the work to be judged may therefore be identified with the work itself. But men do differ; and this standard man who may be taken to represent the whole of humanity at its best is, of course, always that particular man, the individual absolutist himself.

Thus at the very beginning of any attempt to find an absolute standard by which to judge a work of art we are met by something relative in its value—the relativity of a jest to the ear for which it is destined. And the further we go the more clearly we shall realize that at every step in our analysis we come upon some further relativity, so that, for example, the value of a work of art is relative, not only to the individual, but to the stage which he has reached in his individual development. No sensitive person who recalls the history of the evolution of his own taste can fail to remember how at one time he was dazzled by certain writers, Shelley, for example, from whom (so far as he is concerned) the glory now seems to have departed; though it is doubtless still visible to others. It was once there because he perceived it. It is still there because others still see it. But it is no longer there for him. And again there is no escape from this relativity of judgment unless some arbitrary norm is established. Certain writers we know are appropriate to youth and certain others to age, but how shall we judge them absolutely? Surely the very oldest man yet unburied is not the most completely infallible, and it is surely difficult to say which one of the seven ages of man sees things most truly.

Nor is it, moreover, possible to consider the value of a work of art wholly apart from the society which forms its audience, though we need not, to be sure, overestimate either the rapidity or the completeness with which societies change. Dante was a great man, and by virtue of that fact much more conspicuously like than unlike a citizen of the twentieth century. The best book is not necessarily the newest or superficially the most pertinent. But if there is any connection whatever between literature and those more or less variable sensibilities, aspirations, and convictions which give their peculiar character to social groups, then the value of any particular work for that group must be in part relative to that group, and it is difficult to imagine how any judge can wholly detach himself from the group to which he belongs. The conscious urgency of the need which certain contemporaries feel for absolute standards in criticism was not, apparently, felt by the generation of critics against whose relativism they are rebelling; and hence their desire to establish such absolutes must constitute one of the characteristics which make their writings particularly valuable to their group.

Works of art are constructions serving to arrange fragments of observation and experience into patterns which are pleasing because they are understandable in terms of human thought and consistent in terms of human feeling. To a greater or less degree these patterns are usually influenced by the criticism of human experience as a whole, and for this reason they tend to represent some sort of compromise between the author's vision of "reality" and those aspirations, desires, and hopes which determine his temperament. Hence such works embody something of what this group believes concerning the universe in which it lives, while, at the same time, they both reflect and influence those particular desires, perceptions, emotions, and emphases which give to the human consciousness at any time its peculiar character.

But if all these things are true, then the central error of those who insist upon setting up absolute standards of judgment for literature is the error vulgarly known as putting the cart before the horse, of assuming that we can know what literature ought to be without knowing just what man and nature and God are. Of any particular work we may say that it represents nature as thus or so. We may say also that it is a construction gratifying to certain desires, likely to develop certain sensibilities, or even tending to encourage a certain kind of conduct. But to judge it absolutely is to maintain that one knows not only what nature is, but also which desires are legitimate, what conduct is permissible, and what sensibilities were, are, or ever could be capable of contributing valuable elements to the general experience of living. Perhaps the blind disciple of some minutely and dogmatically all-inclusive religion, perhaps the subscriber to the provisions of some inconceivably exhaustive Koran or Talmud, might venture to rank works of art in a hierarchy which he would pronounce eternally fixed. But no one else consistently could, and such a Koran or Talmud does not exist, because even the best-codified faiths permit differences of opinion and judgment concerning some of those subtle shades with which literature is frequently concerned. A dogmatically established criterion for the judgment of art presupposes dogmas which have previously settled every conceivable question concerning science, religion, philosophy, and morals.

Perhaps the poet may—perhaps the poet must—forget the logical necessity of skepticism. It is his business to devise constructions, and such constructions always involve premises which can become acceptable only if they are asserted with a confident faith. But if the critic is to be distinguished from the creator, if he is to maintain even the relative detachment and objectivity which make his art more like the art of the scientist or the philosopher than it is like the art of the poet, then this critic is bound to recognize both the element of arbitrariness in any work of art and the fact that the value of the construction made possible by this arbitrary element is relative to the audience that will contemplate it.

The proponents of "standards" are fond of arguing that without them the critic becomes no better than that "stringed lute" of Oscar Wilde's upon which—and with disastrous results—"all winds could play." In his hands criticism degenerates into the random impression, and what he produces is only a derivative work of art based upon the drama or poem or tale which he is pretending to criticize. By insisting upon the duty of the critic to judge, they propose to give him a function superior to that of mere pale recreation; and that purpose is laudable enough, but it is hardly worth while to achieve it at the cost of making him believe that he—of all people—should be the one to attempt that most stupendous of all creative acts, which consists in establishing by a fiat of the imagination some absolute standard of value.

The imagination which creates works of art is, after all, not the most powerful sort of imagination. To a greater or less extent such works always include an element of confessed make-believe, and to a greater or less extent they always recognize some distinction between the kind of "poetic faith" which they seek to inspire and that simple "faith" which is inspired by religions and philosophies. Hence the poet who calls himself "poet" and the romancer who calls himself "romancer" have neither the presumption nor the effectiveness of the poet who calls himself "prophet" or of the romancer who gets himself accepted as the revealer of some system of law or duty or morals. Hence to insist that the critic should come forth with some series of absolutes is a very strange way of preventing him from meddling with the business of "creating," since "standards" of any kind are, as a matter of fact, the supreme achievements of the creative imagination. Doubtless he should guard himself against the tendency to rest content with a merely lyrical account of his "impressions," but it is, on the other hand, when he sets up standards or proposes absolutes that he is most clearly and most actively forsaking the effort to criticize for the effort to create.

Premier Azaña on Spanish Policy

By I. M. LEVY

Madrid, December 10

ALL Spain was aware of the fact that its first President would be Alcalá Zamora, and that Manuel Azaña, former Provisional President, would be given a position of importance. He has now been chosen Premier. Azaña is one of the three pivotal men in Spain at the present moment, and for that reason the declarations which he made in an interview with the present writer are of great interest as reflecting future policy.

Having in mind the ultimatum handed to the government by the Sindicato Nacional Ferroviario, demanding action within fifteen days, under the threat of a general railroad strike, with reference to the critical situation of the railroad employees, I first asked Premier Azaña about the course the government would take in this matter. He replied that the nationalization of the railroads was an immediate necessity owing to the national exigency, inefficient operation, and the ruinous competition resulting from the existence of half a dozen major lines, and that the efforts of the government in the near future would be directed toward this end. Whether or not the demands of the railroad men for increased wages could be satisfied under government operation, with a Treasury deficit of some 237,000,000 pesetas, and the heavy drains of the more immediate agrarian and educational reforms, would be difficult to say. Asked whether the nationalization of the railroads might be construed as the first step toward the socialization of other public utilities, the Premier gave it as his opinion that Spain was not as yet ripe for such a procedure, although the general tendency of the future would certainly be in that direction, as provided for in the constitution. The fundamental social legislation embodied in the constitution, relating to the condition of the working classes, would be amplified as rapidly as possible.

Speaking of Spain's economic relations with the rest of the world, Premier Azaña expressed his regret at the trend which the economic policy of other nations is at present taking. To him it seems lamentable that, when the world crisis is calling for measures of a distinctly opposite nature, nations should be involving themselves in retaliatory tariff measures and economic reprisals. The backward state of industry in Spain demands a certain amount of protection, but every effort will be made to reduce this to the minimum compatible with the nation's economic welfare. Spain cannot remain indifferent to the economic tendencies of other nations, and must naturally, for her own safety, adjust herself to these. But in no case will she take the aggressive, and she will lend her whole-hearted support to any movement giving promise of remedying existing conditions. Thus, when France recently imposed prohibitive rates on the importation of Spanish wines, the Spanish government, before considering retaliatory measures, entered into negotiations leading toward a more desirable modus vivendi, which, if leaving much to be desired in the commercial relations of the two countries, has at least succeeded in bettering them.

Plans for agrarian reform, which constitutes one of the gravest and most perplexing problems the government must face, have already been drawn up, and the government has pledged not only its technical aid but also financial assistance, in so far as the resources of the Treasury will permit. The desperate situation of the Andalusian peasants is a result of the land abuses and absentee landlordism of the monarchy. The coming of the republic gave them new hope. It was believed that the land which had for so long been denied to them was now to be apportioned among them, giving them the opportunity to raise themselves from a state of virtual serfdom to the self-respect and well-being which is their right. Unfortunately, miracles cannot be performed overnight; the agrarian problem is of long standing, and the government has found itself in this short time unable to make any great headway toward fulfilling the promise which it means to keep. But headway must be made, for neglect or delay in attacking this problem will have disastrous consequences for the welfare of the people and the stability of the republic, as is indicated by the discontent in the south.

The question of the relations of church and state has definitely been resolved. Except for isolated attacks from certain sections of the press and the short-lived demonstrations of the Basque country, there was no opposition to the anti-clerical legislation of the constitution, and there was every support for it. The danger of civil war is unmistakably past. There now only remains the drawing up of complementary laws to the articles of the constitution to determine more specifically their execution, particularly with regard to the religious orders and the expropriation of their goods. At the present moment the secularization of the cemeteries is being effected by the Cortes, and this is but an elementary phase of the question as a whole.

The external relations with the rest of the world into which Spain will enter may be summed up in her complete cooperation with the League of Nations and her unreserved support of its activities and decisions. A clause to that effect has already been inserted in the fundamental law, for the first time in history, and its insertion was no mere gesture. Spain believes in the League as being the one organized means of promoting harmony and good-will among the nations of the world, and is determined to adhere to it under any and all circumstances. Otherwise, the internal problems which confront the government will impede, for the moment at least, the participation of Spain in international affairs to any great extent. This does not imply, however, the continuance of the isolation which marked her history prior to the republic. The intention of the Spanish republic to foster in every way possible the promotion of world peace cannot be too strongly emphasized.

Questioned as to the future status of the army, for so long the predominating factor in Spanish politics, Premier Azaña took on the semblance of a father contemplating a favorite child. The military reforms which he instituted soon after taking up the duties of Minister of War were approved too recently by the Cortes to permit of their full and necessary explanation. Obviously, the army as a state within a state has been eliminated and reduced to its proper proportion in the national defense. In addition, it has been made much more compact and efficient than was the case under the monarchy. But Spain is still carrying on her back "the corpse of an army," with insufficient equipment and suited only for internal service as an auxiliary to the police and the Civil Guard. As an instrument of national defense against foreign aggression (now, fortunately, remote) it is not to be considered. The Cortes must decide whether the Spanish army is to continue in its present state, with capacity only for dealing with internal disturbances, or become an army in fact as well as name. In the former case, it must follow the matter through to its logical conclusion by making the army an adjunct of the civil police forces; in the latter, it must appropriate the necessary funds to raise it to a state of adequate efficiency in relation to other armies. In bringing this question to the Cortes Azaña will not be actuated by militaristic tendencies. The function of the army will be merely that of supporting a necessary national policy. Spain will adapt its military forces to those of the rest of the world. Any move toward disarmament will find in the republic one of its most eager champions and firmest adherents, in theory and in practice. On the other hand, should foreign nations make no effort to limit or reduce their military programs, Spain, unwillingly, will be forced to plan her own accordingly. In the meantime, her needs will be more than satisfied by the minimum efficient army essential to her foreign policy.

In the Driftway

THE old proverb told us that the devil found mischief for idle hands. It is probably more true to say that idle hands are of no use, eventually, even to the devil. They remain folded and useless, and their owners suffer from what is certainly man's worst disease—inability to be occupied, either with hand or mind. In England, where large numbers of persons have been out of work for literally the years of their adult life, this important fact is being realized. In the London Times the Drifter reads of the activities of the Society of Friends along these lines. In various areas where work has been unobtainable for a long time, clubs have been started which are in reality workshops for the workless. Materials and tools are provided; erstwhile carpenters can turn out small objects of household use or even articles of furniture; cobblers can make shoes or mend old ones—in some cases the worn shoes of children whose fathers are out of work. The workers actually construct the club for themselves; they make the benches and tables, the shelves and chairs, they plaster and paint the walls. They repair broken utensils from their own homes, they devise all sorts of makeshift articles from strange materials. "A man who was fitting oak fronts to the drawers of a desk said that the pieces were waste from coffin lids bought for a few pence from an undertaker."

* * * * *

IT is hardly necessary to add that once the idea of possible work gets abroad in a neighborhood, the clubs are highly successful and the workers come simply because it is "more fun to be occupied than not." They understand that they will receive no pay for their work, but they may give the articles they make to whom they will. Attendance is voluntary. Once the idea of simply working to keep busy is accepted, the workers exercise considerable ingenuity in making tools to proceed with. In one club "a blower for a portable forge has been made out of the treadle of an old sewing machine and a round toffee tin fitted with an impeller made in the shop, and it is connected with the forge by a length of railway-coupling tube retrieved from the scrap heap." The forge will weld iron, and the skilled workers use it for making tools.

* * * * *

THE moral of this tale is plain enough. Man must work. If he has lost his job, if his mind is worried by considerations of rent day with no money, young ones with no shoes, babies without milk, a house with no coal to warm it, he must inevitably welcome occupation even if it is without monetary reward. If it serves to keep his hand in with his old trade, against a happier day, all the better. If it provides necessary utensils for his wife or patched shoes for his children, better still. But mainly he must work. He must keep a tool in his hand and his mind on the fruits of his toil or he is no longer a man. When the Drifter hears frivolous persons declare that an able-bodied man would rather stand on a bread line than do an honest day's labor, he becomes excessively angry. The curse of the human race, if you like, is that it cannot be idle. Or perhaps this is only the curse of the Western races. In the East it seems possible for a man to sit still and contemplate nothing with complete satisfaction to himself and to his neighbors. We have not learned that happy art. The Drifter has often laughed at those persons who, unexpectedly inheriting a fortune, announce that tomorrow will see them back at the old desk. Perhaps this is something more than a desire to impress the world with their fidelity to their tasks, or with their carelessness of riches. Perhaps they cannot think of anything else to do; and the thought of doing nothing is intolerable.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Lincoln the Bolshevik

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Talk about censorship! A Hollywood, California, newspaper cut out a phrase from the words of Abraham Lincoln. A letter from a subscriber contained the following quotation: "This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing government, they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it or their revolutionary right of overthrowing it." These words are from Lincoln's Second Inaugural Address, but the local newspaper cut out the words "or their revolutionary right of overthrowing it."

Hollywood, Cal., December 12

JEAN ELLIS

Grandi's Mot Juste

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of December 9 you praise Signor Grandi for having "coined" one phrase which you would like to see "framed and displayed in every Foreign Office": "We must fortify justice and not justify force"—an excellent formula, for which, I am sure, Signor Grandi would give credit to Pascal, who stated that it is necessary that "ce qui est juste soit fort ou ce qui est fort soit juste." The whole sentence will be found in a repertory of classical quotations which has just appeared in Paris under the title "Les Citations Françaises" and which I unblushingly recommend to some of my fellow-readers of The Nation.

Ithaca, N. Y., December 21

OTHON GUERLAC

In Short, We Disagree

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I received your circular letter of October 23. I read and reread it several times and took occasion to read portions of your program to a number of representative travelers and others and discussed some of the subjects and especially your panaceas for a "better United States." I found none who favored more than a single one of your proposals.

Free trade? All agreed that would spell ruin to labor and business generally, flood our markets with the products of cheap foreign labor, throw our American workingmen out of their jobs, and reduce our standard of living to the foreign level.

National support for the unemployed? Vote the money raised by taxes paid by all the people at large for a special class, encourage idleness, support the improvident, and reverse the purpose and functions of government which require the people to maintain their institutions and pay the expenses of government.

Disarm completely? Let the rabble and mob seize the government and run it at will. Reasonable reduction of armaments is desirable so as to reduce expenses and taxes but to be without any navy and army? Only unthinking visionaries seriously advocate this.

Not protect our nationals and their property the world over? Of what value is American citizenship if our citizens are not protected in their rights and liberties abroad? Let them be slaughtered like rats? Why should the United States care what becomes of our people and their rights and property when outside the United States? Leave them to their fate, would you? Allow the people of Haiti, Nicaragua, and so on, to run amuck? What care we so we are safe at home? The United States has troops abroad for a laudable purpose, for the protection of Americans and the welfare of the people themselves in the countries involved, who are generally incapable of maintaining order.

Form a new radical party? Made up of all misfits and incompetents? Seize the wealth of the successful? Distribute it among the proletariat and confiscate by taxation all big fortunes? Take over the railroads, utilities, and industries? Public ownership has been shown to be more expensive and less efficient than private.

Your program is, indeed, a wise one from the standpoint of the Communist, loafer, and improvident. But it would destroy individualism, the incentive to labor, and would reduce all to the level of the unsuccessful and worthless.

You can see The Nation and myself do not agree upon many fundamentals. I have read your publication in the past but it does not appeal to me. I can find more satisfaction and more profitable reading elsewhere from my viewpoint.

Denison, Iowa, November 19

CARL F. KIRCHNER

Still Pertinent

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You will enjoy the pertinence of the following passage. It is from an address by the Honorable William D. Kelley, delivered about the year 1850 before the Linnaean Society of Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, on the "Characteristics of the Age."

The spirit of commerce is essentially selfish. Voyages are projected for profit. The merchant, whose liberal gifts surprise the world, chaffers in his bargains. . . . Wealth increases; but its aggregation into few hands takes place with ever-growing rapidity. The comforts of life abound; but when the markets of the world are glutted, hunger is in the home of the artisan. Overproduction causes the legitimate effects of famine. The ingenuity of political economists is vainly taxed for the means of preventing the accumulation of surplus materials and fabrics. And while warehouse and factory groan with repletion, heartless theory points to the laboring population reduced to want and pauperism, and with dogmatic emphasis inquires if the increase of population cannot be legally restrained. The state of the market shows that there are more men than commerce requires, and a just system of economy would adapt the supply to the demand.

The Honorable William D. Kelley was a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas at Philadelphia, devoted (the man, not the court) to "the protection of the weak and downtrodden, the reformation of the ignorant and vicious, and the promotion of education." He became a member of Congress in 1860.

East Orange, N. J., November 10

A. G. BARNETT

Books for Commonwealth

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Probably every reader of The Nation has at least a few worth-while books which he ought to dispose of because he needs the space which they take for new books. At Commonwealth College, Mena, Arkansas, the students do industrial work for four hours a day for their maintenance; the rest of the time they attend classes and study or read. They have no funds with which to buy books, and so they are dependent for their study upon gifts of books from generous friends.

Perhaps the readers of The Nation might care to join the ranks of our generous friends and add new volumes to our library. Nowhere would books be more intelligently read and more deeply appreciated than at Commonwealth.

Mena, Ark., November 16

GEORGE YEISLEY RUSK

Chicago Readers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I should like to get in touch with Nation readers and other liberals in and around Chicago who would be interested in joining a group for informal discussion of current problems. My address is 5121 University Avenue; telephone, Midway 0517.

Chicago, January 1

LESTER A. LESERMAN

Holiday Greetings

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The "trimming" you gave the "Crowded Days" of McAdoo was worth the subscription cost of The Nation for ten years. The Nation has been better the past six months than ever before, and I intend that comparison as a high compliment. More power to you!

Madison, Wis., December 23

ALFRED T. ROGERS

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, is the author of "Why Recognize Russia?"

A. E. HINDMARSH is assistant dean of Harvard University.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

HAROLD J. LASKI is professor of political science at London University.

I. M. LEVY is engaged in research work at the Central University of Madrid.

FRANCES M. FROST is the author of a book of verse, "Blue Harvest."

CAREY MCWILLIAMS, a Californian, is the author of "Ambrose Bierce."

GERALD SYKES is a writer of fiction.

ABRAM L. HARRIS, professor of economics at Howard University, is coauthor of "The Black Worker."

LIONEL TRILLING is at work on a critical study of Matthew Arnold.

WILLIAM SEAGLE is an assistant editor of the Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences.

Finance

Aid or Prevention?

PROPOSALS are before Congress, in the form of bills or otherwise, to substitute government credit for private credit at a number of weak points in the country's economic structure. Government credit, judged by its going rate of about $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, is good, while private credit on the whole is somewhat worse than dubious, if we gauge it by the large number of railway and other bonds, regarded not long ago as first class, which are now selling to yield 10 per cent and more. The plan is, in this period of stress and strain, to employ government funds to meet emergencies and, if possible, to set the wheels of business to moving at a more rapid rate.

The money outlay in connection with the plans which are being considered at Washington runs into large figures. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation will apparently call for a Treasury subscription of half a billion dollars. The banks for discounting real-estate mortgages, if they are set up, will involve some $150,000,000, according to preliminary estimates. An additional investment of $100,000,000 of federal funds is scheduled for the existing land banks. Here is a total of three-quarters of a billion dollars.

Now, government credit is an extremely sensitive thing. Ordinarily it does not register its fluctuating position in the market with movements of five or ten points, like a common-stock "equity," but with trivial changes of eighths and quarters, which nevertheless convey their meaning emphatically to the initiated. It would, perhaps, be instructive if those who toss off proposals for casual billions of government bond issues to pull us out of the depression would note and interpret some of the things which have recently occurred in the bond market.

In connection with its December 15 financing, the Treasury offered \$600,000,000 of one-year $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent notes, \$300,000,000 of six-months $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent certificates, and \$400,000,000 of nine-months 3 per cent certificates. Of this total of \$1,300,000,000, the "new money" received from investors amounted to about \$300,000,000, the balance being paid for with outstanding Treasury obligations which had matured or been called in. Less than a week after these issues had been placed on the market, the two longer-term maturities were selling below par. The most recent issue of long-term bonds—\$800,000,000 of 3 per cents, 1951-55, sold last September—has recently changed hands below 87.

In the fiscal year ended last June, the Treasury deficit footed up at $902,000,000. Next June there will be another shortage estimated at $2,123,000,000, and in the June following still another of $1,417,000,000. These are merely estimates; the actual results may be less—or greater. None of the projects in aid of industry now under consideration has been budgeted; prospective deficits are to be increased by the amounts appropriated.

These rather somber facts are here placed in evidence, not with the idea of proving that the government cannot or should not intervene to avert a serious situation, but to demonstrate that the federal Treasury is not a gold mine and that it behooves private enterprise to stir itself more vigorously in the direction of self-help. Our existing troubles will eventually be overcome, in one way or another; but when we consider the amazing extent to which it is proposed that government help be invoked, can anyone seriously doubt that a more profitable exercise of government powers would consist in the relentless suppression of an incipient boom, through the banking system or otherwise?

S. PALMER HARMAN

Books, Music, Films, Drama

Sunrise

By FRANCES M. FROST

Dark in the world's great morning, this mountain rose Carved in wind, striking the weightless air
With plunging granite.

Now at the gradual close
Of the shadowless hours, when the strange high stars
Diminish and the earth moves into dawn
Slowly, this mountain, bare,
Sharp to the light, is, in the yellow skies,
Carved fiercely out.

And when the night has gone,
Is broken beneath deep sunlight poured upon
Forced westward from the bright and blowing meadows,
Driven from grooves in hills where the green waters
Descend with stony voice,

When the imperishable fire
Of morning rises above the mountain, the heart's despair
Is vanquished, the uncrying throat
The tall, glad body, the brow, the windy hair,
Which, like this mountain, are graven in luminous air.

Bret Harte

Bret Harte: Argonaut and Exile. By George R. Stewart, Jr.
Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

THIRTY-ONE years have passed since the death of Bret Harte. During this period his reputation has been dealt with rather carelessly by a number of hands. Merwin and Pemberton published biographies, and Mr. Boynton added a rather sour sketch. George Stewart, however, has written the first real "life" of Harte, and it is a book that will not be easily supplanted. In addition to being an excellent account of Harte's life, it is a model of biographical writing. Mr. Stewart has not been a close student of biography for nothing (he is giving a course on the subject this year at the University of California). "Bret Harte" is a biography in the traditional sense, and in its orderly presentation of fact and sane rationalization one will search in vain for the murky profundities of psycho-analytical "interpretation." Such a volume as Mr. Stewart's justifies the old notion that the first function of a biography is to tell the story of a human life and not to prove a thesis.

Mr. Stewart's survey of Harte's life is carefully balanced; no one period or influence is given disproportionate consideration. Harte's life falls rather naturally into three major divisions: boyhood, the California period from 1854 to 1871, and the period from 1871 until his death. The years that Harte spent in California embrace the best of his life—the beginning and end of his career as a writer. The chapters devoted to this period are of particular interest and importance. Harte's career after 1871 was strangely anti-climactic. Indeed, Mr. Stewart senses this himself, for he states that the chief problem with Harte is to account for the rise of his creative power in the sixties and its abrupt decline in the seventies. Harte, however, seems to have dated his career from the time that he visited W. D. Howells in Boston, when he was paraded as a romantic Western writer of mysterious antecedents. Thoroughly enjoying the remarkable reception that was given him in the East, Harte did nothing to dissipate the legends about his past.

Bostonians should have realized that a dandy who wore green kid gloves when he lectured was, at best, but a histrionic Westerner. Harte was not a pioneer, nor a forty-niner. He followed his mother to California in 1854, and seems to have been chaperoned on the voyage by his sister. He lived under the protecting wing of his mother in Oakland for a number of years, evincing little interest or curiosity in the life about him and devoting himself very largely to Dickens. It is extremely doubtful, despite Mr. Stewart's gallant conjuring of possible proof, that he ever visited "the diggin's." This revelation will infuriate an entire generation of local historians in California who have mapped the Bret Harte country with marvelous latter-day precision and insight. Even after he began to contribute to the magazines it took Harte sixteen years to realize that there was anything to write about in California. He had just begun to tap this rich and unexploited field when, in 1871, his career was cut short by the disastrous success of a poem that he always disliked. With the success of "The Heathen Chinee," he disappeared "over the range" and did not return. He seems to have been eagerly waiting for a chance to escape; the trip East was like returning home after a long vacation. By that time, however, he had ceased to ridicule the pioneer and miner; they had become his stock-in-trade. Afterwards, he merely tried to remember California. Trying to remember California, in fact, became his business; his one lecture was "The Argonauts of '49," and the one always marketable story, the humorous yarn with a California background.

Harte's career was at an end by 1871. Prior to that he had written, while living in the West, the half-dozen stories and poems upon which his fame rests today. With the publication of "The Heathen Chinee," he became for a brief feverish season the most popular author in America; probably no other American author ever enjoyed such popularity. But the vein was soon exhausted. He had years of frightful anxiety with process-servers waiting for him in the wings of lecture auditoriums. It is slight wonder that he never returned to America after a minor appointment in the consular service took him to Europe.

Mr. Stewart's account of Harte's life is immensely readable, carefully constructed, and elaborately documented. His fine judgment and good sense about the important issues in Harte's life deserve unstinted praise. Few literary biographies of recent years are as satisfactory or as illuminating. But Mr. Stewart is too judicious. Having spent eight years of research on the facts, he still declines the responsibilities of interpretation. The lapse of thirty-one years is not "sufficient time" to warrant an evaluation of Harte's work. This reticence is unfortunate. The task of attempting to place a final value on Harte's work and of discussing the problems which it presents will probably be undertaken by a critic less qualified than Mr. Stewart. Of late years it has been the practice to dismiss Harte's work from careful consideration by some reference to its "sentimentality." But merely as an indication that a fresh examination of his work with reference to the period is needed, it might be pointed out that "sentimentality" is not its chief fault. The truth is that the miners and pioneers were rather sentimental. Harte's Three Partners are typical:

They had risen, and standing in the doorway, by common consent turned their faces to the east. It was the frequent attitude of the home-remembering miner.

Clarence King wrote of California in the sixties that "pathos and humor so tenderly blent can rarely be found as here." He might well have been writing of the work of Bret Harte.

CAREY McWILLIAMS

B: Courage

Laugh and Lie Down. By Robert Cantwell. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

ROBERT CANTWELL is twenty-three years old. Since this is his first novel to be published, the reviewer would seem to be expected to give a synopsis of the plot, congratulate him on the remarkable fluency of his style, point out a few flaws (if only to demonstrate the reviewer's acumen), and inform the reading public that Mr. Cantwell is "promising." Such is the standard procedure on these occasions. This time let us try to do something more.

The scene is Tacoma, Washington. In the background are run-down rented houses, rotgut whiskey, half-gratified lust, dance music, and second-hand roadsters, for the main characters are young people of college age who have had to go to work and who seek to shut out the drabness of poverty by an equally drab kind of "pleasure." The outer story concerns the jealousy that William McArdle feels of his brother Kenneth, who has taken his girl from him. Criticism cannot stop on the book's objective side, however, for this is shadowy, unrealized; we must penetrate to the inner story if we are to encounter flesh and blood. The author is but dimly aware of the inner story himself. His novel is not a conscious work of art but a groping self-revelation. The inner story is that of a modest, undersized boy, used to middle-class comfort and prestige, whose father dies when he is in college, obliging him to support his mother and sisters by working at night in a factory. It is a painful situation, made worse by sensibility. Before life has really begun the boy feels defeated and unnaturally tired out. The saddest part is that owing to his extreme youth and certain college-boy prejudices he cannot face the situation squarely and draw resolution and insight from it. He hides behind a literary snicker and wastes his sensibility in perfecting a patter that is simply an advanced form of "college humor." His whole life becomes an evasion by way of witticism and acquiescence. Apparently it would be a breach of his peculiar conventions to assert himself. If he doesn't want a drink but is told to "take one anyway," he takes one anyway. So he sits on in a dingy restaurant, unhappy, bored, frightened, superior, until he is drawn finally—or so the story runs—into crime, through sheer lack of will.

There is no question of Cantwell's talent. The grace with which he writes is precocious, but it is extraordinarily even and sustained. And he shows an exceptional refinement of the senses and fidelity to detail. At the root of his grace is modesty—the same modesty, by some law of retribution, that makes him the timid prey of convention. And convention is as much his foe in writing as it is William's in life. It has robbed his novel of backbone and individuality. There are no firm, clear outlines. Everything is like the end, which is blurred and indecisive.

But there is one hopeful note at the end, when William discovers his love for his brother and the girl. In that affirmative moment may lie the seed of future faith. Cantwell's career can be a heroic one, for he carries within him the possibility of both victory and defeat. Will he slip into that convenient refuge for the weary, the well-known "despair" of our war generation? His work already shows a dangerous lack of passion. But he belongs to a younger generation that has given evidence of a new strength.

Talent dies soon without passion. Unfortunately, whoever mentions faith in America is dismissed as a "mystic." Yet from a strictly literary standpoint it is plain that what Cantwell's work needs is just that. If he believed passionately in his "message," he would not waste so much cleverness on the exact recording of trivial conversations; his similes would cease to be more important than what they illustrate; the characters would not dissolve into one another; the milieu would not fade away; the real story would be seen and told. Cantwell has been given a precocious talent and a precocious handicap. With courage—and lots of time—the two can be fused and a valuable writer born.

GERALD SYKES

The Brown American

Brown America: The Story of a New Race. By Edwin R. Embree. The Viking Press. $2.50.

THIS book, as the subtitle explains, is a story of a new race in America. But its main thesis is not new to those who are acquainted with the work of Dr. Melville Herskovits—the thesis that the American Negro, cut off from his African background, has undergone serious biological transformation. In his veins is to be found "the blood of the principal branches of man—black, white, yellow-brown." In its cultural outlook and make-up the race is also new. It has taken over almost all "the white stereotypes in religion, in labor and business, and in social organization."

While in large measure an exposition of the assimilation of the Negro to Occidental culture, the book reveals the policy which guides one of the large wealthy foundations in its relation to the welfare of a minority whose future is still a perplexing problem. The author, Edwin R. Embree, is eminently fitted to handle these subjects. He is a grandson of John G. Fee, Kentucky abolitionist and founder of Berea College, for the "co-education of the races," where Mr. Embree received a part of his early education. He is also president of the Julius Rosenwald Fund, almost the whole of whose income is devoted to Negro welfare, and as such speaks not only from first-hand observation of Negro aspiration and achievement, but as one who actually influences the drift of Negro life by virtue of his discretionary power in giving or withholding financial support to this cause or that.

According to Mr. Embree, the Negro's first contribution to American life was the part played by his labor power in developing capitalism in the new world. In politics, where his record is somewhat besmirched by the corruption widespread at the height of his power in the post-Civil War South, he served the nation by giving the South its first adequate public schools, and by opening the ballot box and the jury system to white men formerly debarred by property qualifications. In more recent times the Negro's colorful folkways and his other-worldly spiritual simplicity have caused a world made prosaic by business discipline to scintillate with new life; and his mirth and joy of living expressed in jazz music and the tap dance have broken the spell of the machine. Although restricted to occasional and side-entrance association with white intellectuals, Negro poets, artists, essayists, and scholars have given evidence of the black man's genius. Despite their handicaps the brown Americans have shown slight susceptibility to radical ideas. The only radicalism to which any appreciable number of them have given assent is the civil libertarianism of W. E. B. Du Bois. As the radicalism of this school is nothing more than the political aspect of those natural-rights preconceptions that stirred the bourgeoisie in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Mr. Embree accepts it along with its economic ideology of thrift, private enterprise, and ownership as advocated by Booker T. Washington, the conservative leader in Negro social thought.

Mr. Embree feels that because of the Negro's accomplishments the Anglo-Saxon's sense of fair play and noblesse oblige should make for steady improvement in Negro living conditions. The mortality of Negroes should be lowered through adequate hospitalization, medical education, and better sanitation. Greater provision should be made for Negro secondary and collegiate education. This work must take place largely in Southern States, where the Rosenwald Fund has already placed large sums for such purposes. Above all Mr. Embree thinks that Jim-Crowism and segregation must be gradually abandoned, if for no other reason than the exorbitant cost of maintaining a dual system of public welfare, especially in the South where it can be least afforded. He is, therefore, for admitting Negroes into free and spontaneous association with white people of like attainment. But right here there seems to be a conflict between what the author thinks desirable as an ideal, on the one hand, and as workable social policy, on the other.

Unique in this scheme of racial advancement inaugurated and financed by the Rosenwald Fund is the plan to establish four Negro university centers in the South. These institutions are to do graduate work, research, and award the advanced degrees. While it may be allowed that the separate college will be indefinitely necessary in the undergraduate training of Negro students in the South, the creation of Negro universities, involving the expenditure of millions of dollars, can be justified neither by special cultural considerations nor by social policy. So far as the reviewer has observed, no move has been initiated to eliminate Negro students from the first-rate Northern universities. And if such a move is under way, it should afford many of the Negro's friends an excellent opportunity to demonstrate with deeds their professed belief in "equal rights." If we are to build separate institutions as a means of shielding a social minority from the rebuffs and hurts commonly inflicted by the dominant majority, or of conciliating majority and minority, this institutional segregation that Mr. Embree himself says is uneconomic will go on ad infinitum, becoming more elaborate and pointless in its duplication of effort. Moreover, if these Negro graduate schools are to be something more than provincial fact-finding centers, it will take many years to equip them with adequate libraries, research materials and documents, and a personnel of eminent scholars, who are rare even in the great Northern universities. Granting that this is not a herculean task, it seems to the reviewer that the plan is hopelessly extravagant and serves no other purpose than the further intellectual segregation of the races. Instead of extending the boundaries of educational separation, the existing Negro colleges should be made into institutions of the highest undergraduate caliber, such as the old Atlanta University, Virginia Union University, and the old Fisk University were on the road toward becoming before they were smitten with research fever, professional education, and the itch to confer the advanced degrees.

ABRAM L. HARRIS

Two Novelized Biographies

The Marvellous Boy. By Ernst Penzoldt. Translated by John J. Trounstein and Eleanor Woolf. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Special Hunger. The Tragedy of Keats. By George O'Neil. Horace Liveright. $2.50.

THE heyday of the novelized biography seems to have passed. No more "Ariels" or "Glorious Apollos" head the best-seller list. But the genre, if it is no longer pre-eminent and profitable, has fully entrenched itself. It has settled down to complacent mediocrity and its production is now as established an industry as detective fiction. It is out of this mediocrity that these lives of Chatterton and Keats have come.

Ernst Penzoldt seeks to relieve his mediocrity by violence. He ruthlessly invents where the store of biographical fact is slim, filling in with whopping incidents of high-class melodramatic eroticism and the absurd trappings of the terror novels. He is perfectly willing to pervert the facts, and completely misrepresents Chatterton's parents. Anachronisms do not make him flinch—his eighteenth-century tipplers mix their brandy with uninvented soda water. In explanation of this mad and disagreeable farrago, the author with mild effrontery tells us that he has but followed Chatterton in mingling "the probable with the true"!

From the charge of invention George O'Neil is certainly free. Indeed, he veers to the opposite pole from that of Penzoldt and uses only the most commonly known facts in the life of Keats. Mr. O'Neil has a considerable reputation as a poet, and in the light of this it is a little difficult to explain the unimaginative dullness of his biography. His attempts to recreate the social circles in which the poet moved are far from convincing—the rich material of the Leigh Hunt ménage is slighted; Haydon becomes but a lay figure. The whole scene, so full of possibilities, is dull and lifeless, and, worst of all, Keats himself emerges as merely limp and sorrowful, not at all the essentially masculine and self-reliant person that his letters and the latest and fullest biographies indicate. Beside the quotations from the poems and the letters which it includes, the whole book becomes utterly feeble, and Mr. O'Neil's attempt to show how "La Belle Dame Sans Merci" was composed becomes a rather unpleasant travesty.

LIONEL TRILLING

The Paper Constitution

The Written Constitution and the Unwritten Attitude. By Charles Edward Merriam. Richard R. Smith. $1.

THE three lectures delivered by Professor Merriam at the University of Rochester which are now issued in printed form constitute an interesting and stimulating little book, although its basic argument is neither entirely new nor entirely valid. In the present twilight of constitutionalism political scientists have become particularly aware of the extent to which usage has interstitially modified, if not transformed, the American Constitution. Apart from its amendments, the Constitution of 1931 is certainly not the same as that of 1789. But the Constitution still needs to undergo profound changes if it is to be adapted to the economic and political needs of industrialized twentieth-century America, and Professor Merriam, sensing this need, urges us in effect not so much to attempt to change the fundamental law as to disregard it. The Constitution has not yet reached the limits of its possible expansion. It was a profoundly revolutionary document when it was written, and we shall only be following tradition if under it revolutionary changes are wrought in the future. Professor Merriam all but asks: "What is the Constitution among friends?" when he invites us to contemplate the changes a Socialist government would be able to introduce under it even in its present form. Surely this is subversive doctrine to be preached by a respectable political scientist. In fact, it constitutes plain nullification.

I find the provocative mood of Professor Merriam very sympathetic. His words are brave and comforting in the present season of discontent. But I am afraid that they are due not so much to reason as to justifiable impatience with the rigidity of the amending process provided by the Fathers. Instead of succumbing to the hopelessness which has generally been inspired by the experience with the Eighteenth Amendment, he beats a muffled tocsin of revolt. But was the Constitution, even when it was first framed, really a revolutionary document? Professor Merriam disposes of such scholars as J. Allen Smith and Charles Beard, who have contended that the Constitution was erected as a bulwark of conservative interests, by arguing that it was revolutionary when compared to the forms of government prevailing in European countries in the late eighteenth century. No doubt this is true, but the question is whether it was revolutionary intrinsically. I am afraid the answer must be in the negative. The conservatism of the Fathers is perhaps most convincingly shown by the very fact that they made it impossible to amend the Constitution except by a most cumbersome process, the essence of which was the rejection of majority decision, everywhere supposed to be the basis of democratic rule. The "unwritten attitudes" can thus get themselves expressed only with the greatest difficulty, when it is a question of introducing fundamental changes. Indeed, in the end, Professor Merriam is forced to admit that responsible cabinet government could not be introduced without the aid of specific constitutional amendments. But is that not tantamount to admitting that there is now no effective way of articulating public opinion even with respect to those changes which do not require constitutional amendments? So far as political science is concerned, the logical solution would seem to be in the amendment of the amending process itself. This, of course, would have to overcome the constitutional obstacles which any amendment would have to meet, but the issue would at least be fundamental. If, in some great period of unrest, constitutional changes should be discovered to be all but impossible, the Constitution may have to be disregarded even as the Articles of Confederation were in 1789. In other words, there will occur at least a bloodless revolution.

The most searching and also the soundest part of Professor Merriam's observations seems to me to be his second lecture, entitled Nation, State, and City Under the Constitution, which interprets in terms of constitutional principles the coming of age of our megalopolitan civilization. Political scientists as a rule still think in terms of States versus federal power, and mouth the outworn shibboleths of State or federal rights. Professor Merriam has a vivid realism on his side when he contends that the real struggle is rather between city and national rights. Our politically underrepresented and disfranchised cities are perhaps the best illustration of the extent to which constitutional limitations can repress natural political forces. Professor Merriam envisages the possibility of the formation of new States out of some of the great metropolitan areas. But when their terrific economic power is considered, it is perhaps just as well that they remain in at least a partial state of political vassalage.

WILLIAM SEAGLE

Books in Brief

Cross Country. By Solon R. Barber. The Hague, Holland: The Servire Press, Ltd.

This miscellany of prose sketches and poems has amazing vitality. The writer is possessed of striking individuality in observation and a unique command of rhythm. He can be objective or subjective at will. He may have learned a good deal from E. E. Cummings, but he has learned more from accurate observation of places and people and from attempting to interpret, almost entirely through rhythm, what he saw and felt in these places and people. Barber produces definitely contemporaneous patterns: he catches the rhythm of a speakeasy, a romance, Havana, a group of Negroes, Vera Cruz—people together, or people alone, himself alone—anything he touches. He realizes everything he sees emotionally. At times one catches this poet employing the imagist technique, but he is too much the individualist to stay within such rigid limits. He turns a perfect sonnet easily too, and after his own manner. But for the most part his talent is at its best when he is playing with interpretative rhythms, rhythms which convey the sense of the things directly. He employs repetition to great advantage:

Raise your dear face from your arms and listen:
I tell you all the stones of the past have spoken,
The wind is blowing, the wind is here.
There are tears in your eyes, your eyes are lonely,
Your eyes are Athens, your arms Troy.

In subject matter and in philosophy Solon Barber is a modern. His theme is chaos, but a jazz chaos scintillating with color and lights.

Sparks Fly Upward. By Oliver La Farge. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

The atmospheric content of this second novel by last year's Pulitzer prize-winner could sustain the actions of the characters if the characters were of any weight; but the young Indian who grows up detached from his ancestral traditions in a household really alien to him, and finally breaks away from the household and its lovely young mistress to become a brilliant general in a revolution, is too unemphatic, too simplified. There is a sufficient complexity in the events of the novel; but the characters are only names and descriptions of their supposed actions. They generate a charm—the young Indian particularly seems to have a gentle masculine charm—and this may very well be owing to the smoothness with which the novel is written. The novel, in fact, is too smoothly written; it flows over the characters with amazing calm and is never upheaved by any of their emotions, which, if the words are believed, are often violent and extreme.

Hester Craddock. By Alyse Gregory. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.

Laid in the English downs, this is the tale of the interrelationships of two sisters and two men who are their neighbors. Both men love one sister who is amiable, innocent, kind, and lovely; the other sister, a neurotic with well-developed delusions of persecution, loves one of the men. The other is a hunchback whom no woman can ever love. Miss Gregory has contrived her situation intelligently and she writes with decorum and with a smooth, controlled style. Her protagonist, Hester, presents a problem which is most of the time too much for her. Hester is almost continually insane, first desperate with melancholy, then equally desperate with tenderness. To depict such a character convincingly requires the highest sort of novelistic power. Miss Gregory is more successful with Nelly, who is quite credibly lovable and good. The hunchback, in his malice and his pitiful need of love, is sharp and clear. But the whole story has a foggy, unreal quality, as if its author had not quite grasped it and pinned it down.

Red Like Crimson. By Jane Paradine. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

This is a slight but charming novel of a Victorian childhood in an English country rectory. It displays an unusual skill in the delineation of characters who, like most people, are a mass of contradictions; and it is especially effective in dealing with children's minds. The story, like the little girl who tells it, is delicate, well-bred, and only innocently naughty. Miss Paradine does no more than touch upon the starker side of childhood as experienced by some less fortunately placed or less carefully guarded or more violently independent youngsters. But her study of these little denizens of a well-stocked nursery in their relations with each other and with their parents and in their conflicts with new ideas and old taboos is carefully wrought.

Flight into Darkness. By Arthur Schnitzler. Simon and Schuster. $2.

Schnitzler's last novel, or novelette, displays none of the remarkable characteristics associated with his previous plays and novels; for this story of a man who is so obsessed with the fear of madness that he makes his brother promise to kill him, and then goes mad and kills the brother, is flat and painfully machine-like. The translation does not in the least improve what seems to be quite evil writing.

Green Memory. By M. Barnard Eldershaw. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

"Green Memory," the result of a collaboration between two Australian women, is compared on the jacket to Jane Austen's work. The resemblance is singularly small, if it exists at all, but the lack of resemblance does not in the least harm the story of an Austrian family thrown out of its accustomed calm, Victorian place by the disgrace and suicide of the father. The book is spotty and formless; phrases sometimes strain too much after effect. None the less, some of the spots are brilliant, particularly the treatment of the child Mina. And the characters actually live their stiffness or weakness or strength throughout the course of the novel.

Higher Command. By Edlef Koppen. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

The only departure this war novel makes from the method of other war novels, particularly those written by Germans, is the inclusion of official documents and pronouncements within the text of the account. The intended effect is probably to show the amazing dissimilarity between the grand macroscopic program of war and the microscopic activities and feelings of one man. Once or twice the effect is gained, but eventually it is lost; for the point has been proved, and the eventual confinement of the hero in a madhouse for refusing to fight any more comes too late to have any effect on a reader long before wearied by endless repetition of horrible details.

Music

A Change in Structure

THE piano sonata of Roy Harris, which Harry Cumpson played at his Town Hall recital on Saturday afternoon, December 19, represents a quite new and original addition to the collection of answers returned by "modernism" to the question: "What's wrong with music, and what shall we do about it?" The significance of music at its best—unique and definite, yet undefinable in language—is unchanging throughout different periods and different styles. It corresponds to what Clive Bell calls "significant form." We cannot say what an organ fugue of Bach, a mass of Palestrina, a symphony of Beethoven, or a nocturne of Debussy means. But beyond and above the distinct differences in all the means they employ, and in the personalities they reflect, we feel the identity of their ultimate aim and of their final significance.

Thus the function of a composer is to reveal the reality he sees, and so to cause in us the same experience of beauty that we have had from other music, though he employs new and different means to bring it to us. The composer is, as Hugo said of genius, "a promontory into infinity." The road to the summit of each promontory is different from any other, but from each summit we glimpse the same reality. While the nature of the means employed to bring us to this point of vantage is a matter of comparative indifference to us, it is and must be of paramount importance to the composer. He must have faith that what he sees is true and real and worth revealing, and must devote all his attention to perfecting a clear and powerful medium of expression, which means—in a period like this, when old formulae have lost their power—a new medium.

This has been one side of the work of leading "modernists" all over the world: Schönberg changing the interval-formation of chords and melodies and experimenting with atonality; Stravinsky working at new rhythms, orchestral colors, polytonal effects; Haba working with quarter-tones; everyone everywhere reshaping our conceptions of consonance and dissonance and the relations between them. Roy Harris, instead of basing his work on novelty in the sensuous materials of the art, focuses his attention on the structure of music. It is not just the vocabulary of music he wants to change; it is the more fundamental questions of the order in which ideas are presented, the kind of development that is given them, and the reasons for both that he feels need reexamination.

For nearly three centuries the cornerstone of musical structure has been tonality; melody and harmony have been grouped around pitch centers, and the structure of the work has been based on the relations between these centers and on their time-proportions. We have become so used to basing our ideas of form on key relationships of this sort that we are inclined to think form is necessarily based upon tonality. But such an assumption ignores the fact that no such logical key relationships are to be found in the masterpieces of the sixteenth century, for example, which are nevertheless not by any means formless.

Roy Harris is trying to work out an idiom in which the structure shall be based on the self-determined growth of the melodic material, not on any superimposed form. In theory, he is attempting to do in music what was done long ago in poetry—to free it from limitations corresponding to rhyme, meter, and conventional forms. He is convinced that the greatness of Bach and Beethoven and Debussy lay in their triumph over the structural limitations which their training and their environment placed upon them. He feels that the composer of the future must free himself of these shackles. His music must be just as cogent and logical and structurally perfect as he can make it. But its form must be determined by its content. It must grow as a plant or an animal grows, along lines dictated by its own inner necessity, not imposed on it from above.

One does not have to agree with Harris about the inevitability of his attitude to realize that it may be a fruitful one. It is true that we are rather fed up on experimentation with musical materials, and that Harris's approach seems in some ways more direct and more fundamental than many others. But fortunately or unfortunately, a composer's music does not stand or fall with his theories. The test of his music in the end will be the same as that of all music: does it give us a clear glimpse of something we should not have seen clearly without it?

It would be less than honest for me not to state that I am inclined, even from a very imperfect knowledge of a very limited amount of his music, to think that it does. It would be less than honest, too, not to admit that the force of Harris's personality, his entirely convincing sincerity, almost fanaticism, and my friendship for him may have something to do with my respect for his music. However that may be, I think there is no doubt that Roy Harris is going straight toward his goal with more than usual earnestness, intelligence, and talent; that he is in the enviable and today unusual position of having more to say than he can possibly get said; that almost unassisted he is acquiring with prodigious speed the technique he needs; that he is one of the most interesting and most promising composers we have, with several major works of importance (I am convinced of the value of the sextet, the string quartet, and the piano sonata) to his credit, and more coming fast.

If the contemplated performances of his quartet and of his Toccata for orchestra materialize this season, those who have any interest in the future of music will have a good deal to think about.

ARTHUR MENDEL

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □ THEATRES □ LECTURES □ DEBATES □

The Theatre Guild Presents
EUGENE O'NEILL'S TRILOGY
MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA

Composed of 3 plays

Homecoming, The Hunted, The Haunted

All 3 plays will be presented on one day, commencing at 5:30. Intermission of one hour at 7 o'clock. No matinee performances.

GUILD THEATRE, 111 St., West of Broadway

GALA HOLIDAY RETURN OF GILBERT & SULLIVAN OPERETTAS
THE MIKADO FAMOUS CAST OF GILBERTIAN FAVORITES

HOWARD MARSH, WM. DANFORTH, FRANK MOULAN, HIZI KOYKE, HERBERT WATEROUS, ETHEL CLARK, ALLEN WATEROUS
ERLANGER'S THEATRE, W. 44th Street. Phone PENN. 6-7063
Nights (Incl. Holidays) 8 to 12.50.
Saturday and Holiday Mats. 50c to $2.00.
MONDAY, JAN. 4, GILBERT & SULLIVAN'S IOLANTHE

JOE ZELLI'S Production of

PAPAVERT

An Up-to-Date Comedy by CHARLES K. GORDON

Vanderbilt Theatre 48 St., E. of Broadway | Eves. Best Seats $3 | Wed. Mat. $2; Sat. Mat. $2.50

SECRETS of the ORIENT

A magnificent and stupendous spectacle of the "ARABIAN NIGHTS," surpassing "SHIRAZ" and "THIEF OF BAGDAD."

English Titles

Musical Score from

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF'S "SCHEHERAZADE"

EUROPA, 55th STREET. Just East of 7th Avenue. 35c to 1 P.M. Cont. Noon-Midnight. Circle 7-0129

THE THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS

REUNION IN VIENNA

A comedy by ROBERT B. SHERWOOD

MARTIN BECK THEA. 45 St. & Ave. PENN. 6-0100
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

LYCEUM THEATRE, West 45th Street
Every Evening 8:50
Mats. Thursday and Saturday

James B. Pond presents

CORNELIA OTIS SKINNER

in the novelty sensation of the season

THE WIVES OF HENRY VIII

Preceded by Selections from Miss Skinner's Character Sketches

GILBERT MILLER Presents

HELEN HAYES

MOLNAR'S New Comedy

THE GOOD FAIRY

HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Evenings 8:50 Matinees Thursday, Friday and Saturday 2:40

THE GROUP THEATRE presents THE HOUSE OF CONNELLY

By Paul Green, under Theatre Guild Auspices

MANSFIELD THEA., 47th St., W. of B'way.

Evs. & Sat. Mat. 50c to $2.50. Thurs. Mat. 50c to $2.

"First American play of the season of any sound quality; a play real in its character, real in its dialogue and consistently intelligent in its approach to its subject matter."—George Jean Nathan, Judge.

THE LEFT BANK

By ELMER RICE

LITTLE THEATRE, 44th Street. Telephone LA 4-0620
Eves. $1 to $3. Wed. Mat. $1, $1.50 and $2. Sat. Mat. $1 - $2.50

A Clearing House of Opinion. THE GROUP Meets at Auditorium 150 West 85th St.

Tuesday, January 5th, at 8:30 P. M.

DR. ALBERT P. VAN DUSEN speaks on:

"BIRTH CONTROL AND SOCIAL REBUILDING"

MARGARET SANGER, Honorary Guest Chairman

Sunday Afternoon, Jan. 3rd, at 4:30 P. M.

KEDAR NATH DAS GUPTA speaks on:

"My Meetings With Mahatma Gandhi."

The Institute of Arts and Sciences

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

A program of evening lectures, concerts, plays and recitals, carefully planned to cover the vital questions of the day in International Affairs, Politics, Philosophy, Exploration Science, Literature and the Arts.

A few of the lecturers are:

WILLIAM BEEBE
SHERWOOD ANDERSON
MAX EASTMAN WILL DURANT

JOHN MASON BROWN
SIR NORMAN ANGELL
WILLIAM LYON PHELPS
ALBERT EDW. WIGGAM

Member's Mid-season Ticket ($10) admits to these and to nearly 100 other worthwhile events in McMillin Theater, Columbia University, Broadway at 116th Street.

You may become a member and participate in this outstanding program.

— SEND TODAY FOR COMPLETE INFORMATION —

□ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT □

PLAYS TO SEE

Brief Moment—Belasco—W. 44 St.
Bloody Laughter—49th St.—W. of B'way.
Civic Light Opera Co.—Erlanger's—W. 44 St.
Cornelia Otis Skinner—Lyceum—W. 45 St.
Counsellor-at-Law—Plymouth—W. 45 St.
Cynara—Morosco—45 St. W. of B'way.
Louder, Please—Masque—45 St. W. of B'way.
Mourning Becomes Electra—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.
OF Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.
Papavert—Vanderbilt—48 St. E. of B'way.
Reunion in Vienna—Martin Beck—45 St. & 8 Ave.
Sing High, Sing Low—Sam H. Harris—42 St. W. of B'way.
Springtime for Henry—Bijou—45 St. W. of B'way.
The Barretts of Wimpole Street—Empire—B'way. & 40 St.
The Band Wagon—New Amsterdam—W. 42 St.
The Bride The Sun Shines On—Fulton—46 St. W. of B'way.
The Cat and The Fiddle—Globe—B'way & 46 St.
The Good Fairy—Henry Miller's—124 W. 43 St.
The House of Connelly—Mansfield—47 St. W. of B'way.
The Passing Present—Ethel Barrymore—47 St. W. of B'way.
The Left Bank—Little—44 St.
The Laugh Parade—Imperial—45 St. W. of B'way.

Films

"Based on the Play—"

HARDLY a movie has come to town these last weeks which has not been based on a Broadway play or a successful book. "Private Lives" (Capitol), which is based on Noel Coward's successful farce, has been very competently done by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, with Norma Shearer and Robert Montgomery. In the movie version the divorced wife and husband who meet on the Riviera, where they are both spending second honeymoons with second spouses, run away not to Paris but to a chalet in the Swiss Alps. This change is altogether happy, providing exciting scenery as well as some thrilling moments when the two runaways carry on one of their sprightly conversations on the edge of a very real cliff above a very real chasm. There has apparently been no censorship either of the lines or of the hilarious and often very rough action.

Norma Shearer's performance, though at times it would gain by being slightly less eager, shows an excellent sense of comedy. Robert Montgomery starts out by being a trifle slow but he picks up rapidly, and the play takes on the quality of a fast eccentric dance in which the two principals, by turns quarreling violently and loving passionately, whirl to the top of a mountain and back again. They are very ably supported by Reginald Denny and Una Merkel, who finally get caught in the rhythm themselves and quarrel almost as well as the principals.

"Tonight or Never" (Rialto) is also a reproduced play, also a farce, but Gloria Swanson is not capable of giving it the warmth and gaiety it needs. Melvyn Douglas as the supposed gigolo who turns out to be the impresario from the Metropolitan Opera is handsome, passionate, and adroit. But unfortunately, Gloria Swanson as the temperamental prima donna whose voice needs, and gets, the tonic of a love affair is not supple enough for the part. Her acting and her speech, perhaps from too long experience in posing, clothes-wearing Hollywood parts, are a drag on the spirited pace of the play.

"Private Lives" and "Tonight or Never," both being photographed stage plays, have no particular significance as motion pictures, though in "Private Lives" the shifting of the scene to the mountains does employ one of the special gifts of the camera which adds variety and a certain spaciousness to the play. But why is Hollywood, notoriously for and of the people, going in so strongly for sophisticated farce and, in "Arrowsmith," for serious drama that does not even end happily? It is true that the two farces provide a certain amount of slapstick, but the fact remains that smart New York plays have never been considered good box office in the provinces. Anne O'Hare McCormick, writing in the New York Times after a very observant visit to Hollywood, remarks that the movies are a business beginning to be worried about art. She also says that Hollywood is now engaged in photographing all the plays and books that have met with any kind of success, while it looks forward with panic to what it considers a lack of material when these sources dry up. Is "Private Lives" to be attributed to the first or the second state of mind? However that may be, it will be a good thing when Hollywood does run through all the ready-made material in the form of plays and books. Then, perhaps, it will discover, of necessity, the wealth rather than the lack of material. For instance, history and mythology, fantasy and horror were "good box office" long before the movies were invented, yet they have been scarcely touched by the camera, which alone can exploit them fully and in a fresh form.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Drama

New Year Suggestions

THE following are the theatrical entertainments now current which seem to me the most worth visiting:

"Mourning Becomes Electra" (Guild Theater). O'Neill's superb play superbly done. The finest drama and the finest performances seen in many years. Nazimova is more striking than ever and Alice Brady at last has a part worthy of her.

"Brief Moment" (Belasco Theater). S. N. Behrman's witty and intelligent play in the finest tradition of high comedy. Francine Larrimore and Robert Douglas give admirable performances; Alexander Woollcott is amusing as Alexander Woollcott.

"Reunion in Vienna" (Martin Beck Theater). Robert Sherwood's naughty and amusing if not particularly weighty farce-comedy about a too consistent psychoanalyst is raised to a very high level by the delightful playing of the Lunts.

"Springtime for Henry" (Bijou Theater). A consistently mad comedy which would be painful if the perfect style of the playing did not make it one of the funniest brainstorms it has ever been my pleasure to see. Leslie Banks and Nigel Bruce seem to have been born for their roles. Helen Chandler and Frieda Inescort give able support.

"Counsellor-at-Law" (Plymouth Theater). Paul Muni in a characteristically shrewd comedy-drama by Elmer Rice. New York types so keenly observed and delineated that they become laughably lifelike.

"The Left Bank" (Little Theater). Mr. Rice again, but this time having his say about the young Americans who find that both art and adultery flourish best in the Latin Quarter. Not so good as "Counsellor-at-Law" but amusing because of similar deft touches of character.

"Cynara" (Morosco Theater). What happened when a steady husband wandered farther afield than he ever intended. Less profound than it pretends to be but well written, well played, and consistently entertaining. Philip Merivale and Adrienne Allen do it full justice. Henry Stephenson is also very effective as a worldly-wise counselor.

"The House of Connelly" (Mansfield Theater). By far the best play of Paul Green, the young South Carolinian who once won the Pulitzer Prize. His picture of a Southern family trying to live on pride and traditions has something of the charm and beauty of Chekhov. Produced by the Group Theater—a junior branch of the Guild—which has now resumed in this, its first success, after the failure of a second offering.

"The Barretts of Wimpole Street" (Empire Theater). Katharine Cornell in a play about the Brownings which is held over from last season but is still very much worth seeing.

"The Good Fairy" (Henry Miller's Theater). Molnar's selfconsciously clever comedy irritates me but it is one of the great hits, and I agree with the general public to the extent of finding Miss Helen Hayes delightful in the role of the quixotically generous usher.

"Sing High, Sing Low" (Sam H. Harris Theater). Amusing burlesque on the opera racket.

"The Laugh Parade" (Imperial Theater). Ed Wynn in the most consistently amusing show he has ever presented. The Perfect Fool is more engagingly foolish than ever before and there is an abundance of talent in his support. Incidentally, Mr. Wynn is one of the very few producers who can put on a "clean" show without being offensive about it.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 13, 1932

No. 3471

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	29
EDITORIALS:
A Great Editor.....	31
An Open Letter to Samuel Seabury.....	32
War in India.....	33
Capital-Gains Tax	33
Grass by the Yard.....	34
SPEAKING OF REVOLUTION... By Hendrik Willem van Loon.....	35
IF I WERE A (CONSTITUTIONAL) DICTATOR. By Morris L. Ernst.....	36
KEEPING THE ALIEN IN HIS PLACE. By George Horne.....	40
THEY ARE NOT ALWAYS LYNCHED. By Paul Blanshard.....	42
NICE STORY. By Paul Sifton.....	44
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	46
CORRESPONDENCE	46
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.....	48
FINANCE: SHALL WE "DEFLATE"? By S. Palmer Harman.....	48
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
I Taught the Angel. By Hal Saunders White.....	49
Japanese Imperialism. By Mauritz A. Hallgren.....	49
False Start. By Granville Hicks.....	50
The Greatest French Poet. By Cuthbert Wright.....	51
Forty Farmers. By Mark Van Doren.....	52
Sargent's Blue Boy. By Horace Gregory.....	52
Science and Soviet Russia. By Jerome Rosenthal.....	53
Books in Brief.....	54
Drama: Westchester and Washington. By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	54

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN

FREDA KIRCHWEY

MARK VAN DOREN

LEWIS S. GANNETT

H. L. MENCKEN

CARL VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON

NORMAN THOMAS

ARTHUR WARNER

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

MORE THAN SIX MILLION Americans were wholly without employment last January, according to an estimate announced in March by Secretary of Commerce Lamont. We have no quarrel with this estimate. It seemed to us at the time to be as accurate as could be hoped for considering our lack of machinery for gathering truly reliable employment statistics. But we do not understand why this estimate is widely held to be true of conditions today. The American Federation of Labor, the American Legion, Senator La Follette, and numerous other private and public authorities continue to estimate the number of unemployed at somewhere between six and seven million. They may be correct in their assumption, but statistics pertaining to industrial activity suggest that they are not. The New York Times general business index fell from 79.4 on December 20, 1930, to 63.1 on December 19, 1931. The steel-production index dropped in the same period from 51.7 to 32.4; automobile production from 98.3 to 39.8; and weekly freight-car loadings declined from 713,865 to 581,733. Each of these indicators, as well as numerous others, points very clearly to a sharp reduction in industrial activity in the past twelve months. It may be barely possible that out of the goodness of their hearts, or for some other reason, employers of labor have kept their workers on the pay rolls although there has been no work for them to do. But our guess, supported by numerous authentic reports, is that the reduction of working forces continued apace throughout 1931. It is likely, if the above indices can be accepted as dependable, that the total number of unemployed today exceeds ten million.

JUST AS THE DISARMAMENT COMMISSION, strengthened by the appointment of Norman H. Davis, Undersecretary of State under President Wilson, is about to meet, the public is informed that it will not go to Geneva with any idea of taking the lead at the outset and presenting definite proposals. If that program is adhered to, we shall undoubtedly fall far short of the role we should play. No other nation is in so strategic a position; no other nation could achieve so much if the will to succeed were drilled into its delegates and they were themselves determined to achieve that disarmament upon which to a considerable degree rests the fate of the world during the next decade. We shall hope for the best until the end, because failure will be a world disaster; but when we read an utterance like this from Senator Swanson, one of the delegates, we must be pardoned for extreme discouragement: "When the war is concluded, this nation will be rich beyond the wildest dreams of avarice. If we have naval strength we shall be able to hold our wealth, power, and prestige. If we are weak in this respect the day of our despoilment will inevitably come." This was said during the World War; but Senator Swanson has repeatedly voiced big-navy sentiments since then. How is it possible to expect wisdom from one who looked upon the carnage in Europe and believed that the exhausted nations would at its close turn to rend the richest and most powerful? Meanwhile, we note increasing signs of public desire for real results in Geneva. It was perhaps merely a gesture that a committee of the Student Volunteer Movement representing a convention in Buffalo of six hundred universities made in asking the President to appoint a student on the commission. But if abstract justice is to be considered, those who are to be butchered in the next war ought to have some voice in preventing it.

WE LIKE ex-Senator Joseph I. France's pluck. Several months ago he boldly announced his candidacy for the Presidency. Unlike most of those Republicans who hold Hoover unfit, he did not propose to confine his rebellion to growling about the President in his club. So he has not only entered the Maryland primary but the North Dakota primary as well, and by the latter move so frightened Mr. Hoover's friends that they are proceeding at once to form a committee which shall see to it that no State is lost by default, that the President is run in all States in which there are to be Presidential primaries. People may laugh if they please at Mr. France, but he is doing a real service in reminding the country that it was intended that any citizen might enter the Presidential lists without being compelled to ask any party's permission. We are also glad to see that Mrs. Ruth Hanna McCormick has come out against Mr. Hoover's renomination. The more persons who speak out against this form of Republican suicide, the more will follow suit. It would not take much courage on the part of a few well-known men to make Mr. Hoover see the utter folly of a fresh candidacy, especially if Mr. Borah, too, should decide to run.

FOUR WASHINGTON DISPATCHES in the same edition of one newspaper show with what clarity the economic situation is being studied in the national capital. President Hoover, according to the dispatch most prominently displayed, believes that what we primarily need is "courage and confidence in the principles and institutions which this country exemplifies." With them "we can do much to promote economic recovery." Secretary of Commerce Lamont feels that it is not so much a lack of courage on our part that is holding back prosperity. He blames Europe, and although he sees "natural upbuilding forces . . . beginning to take hold" in this country, he warns us against "possible additional shocks from Europe." Getting down to more substantial facts, Secretary of Agriculture Hyde reports that the American farm income in 1931 was $6,920,000,000 as compared with $9,347,000,000 in 1930, and $11,911,000,000 in 1929. But officials of four federal land banks, taking Mr. Hoover's counsel of courage at its face value, appear before a Senate subcommittee and argue that a moratorium on farm mortgages "would hurt the farmer more than it would help him." The farmer apparently should have courage enough to get along on his depleted income without help from the government agencies which have been set up for that very purpose. But the Senate subcommittee has none the less voted to approve the bill permitting postponement of mortgage instalment payments on the ground that this measure "is a part of President Hoover's reconstruction program."

THE REACTIONARY American Federation of Labor at last has had to give way before the inevitable. Despite its long and bitter opposition to the "dole," the federation is now formally on record as favoring federal appropriations for unemployment relief. Its legislative representative testified before the Senate subcommittee of which Robert M. La Follette is chairman that the workers "are entitled not to a 'dole,' but to maintenance on the part of the government." Thus William Green, Matthew Woll, and other labor leaders have been forced to swallow their recent heated denunciations of direct relief for the jobless. The federation was, of course, in an untenable position. Its opposition to direct relief and to unemployment insurance, as registered at the Vancouver convention and upon numerous other occasions, played directly into the hands of the progressive labor leaders and the Communists. These latter groups, by supporting the plea for direct relief, were finding ever-wider audiences among the rank and file of the federation's members, at least 30 per cent of whom are out of work. No doubt it was in an attempt to reestablish themselves with these discontented elements in their own unions that the autocratic leaders of the Federation of Labor suddenly approved direct government relief for the jobless.

THE REIGN OF TERROR in Harlan County, Kentucky, has been subjected to a searching investigation by two lawyers commissioned for that purpose by the Governor of the State. Their report was recently completed.

If there is still doubt as to the motives behind this official terrorism, it should be quickly dispelled by the report. The authorities were not primarily or even chiefly interested in driving out a few radicals who had gone into Kentucky to agitate among the miners, which is what County Judge D. C. Jones and others would have us believe. The testimony of innumerable witnesses, set down in the nine volumes of the report, shows unmistakably that the unlawful and vicious tactics of the authorities were intended to break the spontaneous rebellion of the miners against long-continued starvation wages and virtually impossible working conditions. Apparently every brutal device known to police officials was used—and so far as is known is still being used—to cow the workers into complete submission. Miners have been whipped, beaten, and otherwise tortured, the report proves. They have been arrested without warrants, taken to jail, and there put through the third degree. Others have not even been arrested, but have been taken into the hills by gangs of officers and company guards, and there have had justice of the Harlan County brand dealt them. Personal liberties have been almost entirely ignored, the rights of free speech and free assemblage completely suppressed. When these measures have not sufficed, the workers have been indicted on charges of murder or criminal syndicalism.

SO MANY ACTS of repression are described in the report that it is difficult to select outstanding examples for comment. However, the case of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Appleman cannot be ignored. The Applemans, who are not mining people, had been saving their money to buy a new automobile. But so distressing were the conditions of the miners' families living all about them that they decided instead to spend their money on food for the workers and their children. They posted notices saying that on a certain date they would give away a carload of flour at the Evarts railroad station. Appleman was promptly indicted on a charge of criminal syndicalism. Mrs. Appleman went to the prosecuting attorney for an explanation. He told her that he had nothing against the Applemans personally, but the Black Mountain Coal Corporation did not like her husband. Thinking the matter over, he added: "You gave away flour. You are feeding the children. We don't like that." This clearly suggests that the mine operators and authorities have deliberately included starvation among their coercive weapons. But what the outcome of this investigation will be is not so clear. The investigators were appointed by Governor Flem Sampson. He has since been succeeded in office by Ruby Laffoon, to whom he turned over the report. Governor Laffoon has shown not the slightest disposition to act upon it—although fresh reports of disturbances and official terrorism are coming up from Harlan County.

THE TREMENDOUS anti-prohibition vote in Finland is being variously interpreted in this country. To the wets the result of the Finnish referendum has naturally given much joy. They feel that they have been reinforced in their propaganda campaign against the Eighteenth Amendment. The dries, clearly placed on the defensive, have sought to interpret the defeat of prohibition in Finland as being the result of "pressure from international organizations that sell liquor." It is probably true that the wine-growing countries of Europe tried by various means to influence the outcome of the referendum. But, viewed objectively, it seems highly unlikely that 75 per cent of the Finnish voters would have succumbed to this foreign wet propaganda if they had sincerely wanted to retain prohibition. Even the most ardent foes of prohibition were surprised by the size of the wet vote. Most surprising is the fact that the rural districts rolled up anti-prohibition majorities hardly less imposing than the majorities recorded in the towns and cities. Obviously, except as our wets will be encouraged to redouble their efforts to abolish our own prohibitory laws, the Finnish referendum can have no effect upon this country. Indeed, we fear that the dries will be more determined than ever to prevent a similar referendum in the United States.

THE LATE RICHARD V. OULAHAN, chief of the Washington Bureau of the New York Times, and for some time the dean of the whole corps of Washington correspondents, was eminently fitted to represent the Times at the seat of government. A man of great personal charm, of distinguished presence, who was at home in any assembly he was persona grata everywhere. In the course of his long newspaper career he reported a number of international conferences and all the important political happenings at home. He was especially fitted to work for the Times because he was entirely in accord with that newspaper's policy of never antagonizing those high in office, of standing in with the powers that be, and of attacking a personality only when the whole pack was baying after him, as, for instance, Senator La Follette for his opposition to the war. His own professional philosophy was that practically all reporting of governmental activities is "interpretative." As he said last April, "Interpretation does not necessarily imply reflection of one's own opinion. It is much more important, as it is more honest, to tell one's readers what is likely to happen than to insist upon one's own particular, individualistic view of what one wishes to happen." With this philosophy by no means all of his colleagues would agree, but they were delighted to honor him and to turn to him for guidance.

TWO OUTSTANDING CONTRIBUTIONS to medicine and healing were announced at the annual meeting in New Orleans of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. One was the discovery that the nervous system expands by means of outgrowths from a single cell in the central nervous system. This observation was made by Dr. Carl Caskey Speidel of the University of Virginia Medical School, and as a result of his research, which seems to disprove the earlier theory of the formation of nerve cells by an expanding chain, Dr. Speidel received a prize of $1,000 for a "notable contribution to science." To the layman, the announcement that Dr. Frederick Eberson, of the University of California Medical School, has succeeded in isolating the germ of infantile paralysis will seem an event to be hailed the world over. Candid physicians admit that they are almost entirely in the dark in the treatment of poliomyelitis; what causes the affliction they cannot say, although they recognize its manifestations; how the germ is transmitted is equally doubtful. If the organism can now be perceived and studied, progress will surely be made not only in treatment but in prevention. As it is, the worst feature of the disease today is the mystery which surrounds it.

A Great Editor

IT is a tragic fact that the death of C. P. Scott, the greatest Liberal editor in the history of English daily journalism, has occurred when the Liberal Party he knew it and so long supported it in the Manchester Guardian is at the point of extinction. From 1872 until 1929 he conducted that great newspaper and made it the world's greatest daily, greatest certainly in the development of liberal and well-informed public opinion, both at home and abroad. During those years Mr. Scott witnessed and championed the rise of William E. Gladstone, of Campbell-Bannerman, and of the reforming Lloyd George in the early days when he opposed the Boer War at the risk of his life, and supported land and tax reforms. Like him, the Manchester Guardian refused to approve the action of the government throughout the entire Boer War, declining to subscribe to the doctrine that it should uphold its country right or wrong. Faced with an imperialist and "patriotic" boycott that threatened its very existence, it came out of the struggle stronger than ever.

As is usually the case, such courage and fidelity to principle as C. P. Scott showed found recognition not only outside the ranks of his own party, but far beyond the boundaries of his own country. When Mr. Scott reached his jubilee as editor of the paper which he personally raised from a second-rank provincial daily to the front rank of the most influential papers in the world, the Conservative Lord Derby was happy to preside at the banquet given to honor him. It is true, of course, that the Guardian has not rejoiced in huge circulation. That is entirely to its credit; Mr. Scott would long ago have abandoned his pen had he been obliged to gain public favor by catering to the appetite for sensationalism, scandal, and the news of crime. Quite naturally such a man drew to himself as assistant editors or contributors the finest minds in journalism and letters, such men as Sir Arthur Evans, W. T. Arnold, C. E. Montague, John A. Hobson, and the late Professor L. T. Hobhouse, to name a few. But even more important than that was Mr. Scott's own ability to grow, and to adjust himself to the new political and economic conditions of life, while never abandoning the yardstick of the principles to which he was so unswervingly devoted. Steeped in the glorious Cobden and Bright school of laissez faire economics, he was at a great age able to realize that government action in developing and safeguarding personal, political, and economic liberty was essential to a degree that would have seemed heresy in the seventies.

If there was one blemish upon his editorship, it was that he allowed himself to be misled at the outbreak of the World War into supporting that struggle. But that did not prevent him from keeping his head when others were blinded by passion, prejudice, and the falsehoods of war. He lived to behold the practical disappearance of the Liberal Party in Parliament, in part as a result of its compromise with that war, and to see a Conservative victory without parallel in the political annals of his country. But we are bold enough to believe that until his last hour his courage was unbroken, his faith undimmed in the beliefs he championed so magnificently and for so long.

An Open Letter to Samuel Seabury

DEAR MR. SEABURY: For months past you have been ably conducting the inquiry into the courts and the government of the City of New York authorized by the Legislature of the State on March 23, 1931. This investigation has attracted attention far beyond the limits of the city; for municipal developments in the metropolis are watched the country over. What you have thus far brought out has surprised no one familiar with what is happening in New York. It has, moreover, confirmed the opinions of those who have insisted throughout all the talk of the "New Tammany," for which the rise of Alfred E. Smith was largely responsible, that there was no change in that organization whatever, save that the graft of today is far larger and more easily obtained than in the days before our recent prosperity and before prohibition. Then the chief sources of revenue were the prostitute, the gambler, and the saloon-keeper, along with the campaign contributions of business men who wished to stand well with those in power. The latter are still ready to pay heavy fees to get what they desire; witness the case of the North German Lloyd, which, it appears, greased some willing hands with $50,000 in order to obtain a pier that it should have had, and it was to the interest of the city that it have. Tammany today, as throughout its history, exists because the great business interests with their church-going and highly respectable presidents, vice-presidents, and general managers wish it to continue and refuse to come together to smash it.

How the office-holders have grown rich you, Mr. Seabury, have clearly brought out. The sheriff, Thomas M. Farley, banked $360,660.34 in six and one-quarter years, during which time his salary ranged from $6,500 to $15,000 a year. James A. McQuade, Registrar and a Democratic leader of Brooklyn, deposited between 1925 and 1931 $547,254.03, of which $349,196.60 went into the banks in cash. The chief clerk of the city court banked $135,061.50 in the same period; his best explanation was: "I probably won some bets." The city clerk "saved" $143,758; an assistant deputy sheriff deposited $20,000 in four months on a salary of $2,700; an under-sheriff, who is also president of the Tammany club in the Fourteenth Assembly District, deposited $662,311.11 in six and three-quarter years—pickings that make the similar sums revealed in the Lexow and other official inquests of previous decades seem small indeed. For the rest the picture has been the old one of sales of favors, of the buying of political influence, of the calling off of the police when they were unwise enough to raid clubs, or lawless friends, of the ruling powers, of their enrichment through the speakeasies, and so forth. You have even shown that the Mayor shared a safe-deposit box with one Russell T. Sherwood, who, though subpoenaed, has refused to appear as a witness and has been fined $50,000 for his recalcitrance.

Now, have all your revelations stirred the citizens of New York to mutiny and rage? Obviously not. At the last election they elected the Tammany candidates with overwhelming majorities. They have not risen to demand that these get-rich-quick office-holders resign their jobs and leave town. We recall only one mass-meeting to demand that the Mayor prefer charges against these men or remove them; none that he produce his missing partner in that safe-deposit box and himself voluntarily explain that partnership. The Mayor has persistently acted as if in no wise affected, and if you, Mr. Seabury, had not forwarded recommendations to the Governor for the removal of the sheriff, not one step would have been taken toward the purging of the list of office-holders, and the voters would not have protested. The reason for this apathy is partly that you have failed to impress the public because your greatest sensations have been succeeded by weeks of less interesting matter, because the investigation itself has of necessity run into months, because you have as yet shown nothing that the public did not know to exist in general though without detail, and because no one has as yet been convicted, with the exception of certain of the magistrates. No stamp of criminality has as yet been placed upon any of the big men in Tammany Hall. In a city in which some of the biggest rackets in the world are going on untouched by justice, the public is less interested in the punishment of men who are merely following higher examples.

What, then, is to be the net outcome of your investigation? Obviously, if it is only going to result in a few convictions and the bringing out of more of the same kind of testimony, it will not advance the cause of good government a whit. But the charter granted to the Hofstadter Committee of which you are counsel went farther than the mere authorization of an inquiry. The legislature specifically voted that the committee might review any matter "relevant to the general question of ascertaining and improving the administration, conditions, and conduct" of government and courts as the committee might desire. Now, mere revelations will not lead to any permanent improvement, unless there are presented to the legislature and to the people suggestions for governmental reorganization and reforms. Are you, Mr. Seabury, thinking of these further and permanent aims in the midst of your extremely tedious and difficult task of unearthing official misconduct? If not, you are merely wasting time. If, on the other hand, you, with the aid of the innumerable volunteers who will come to your assistance the moment you express the wish, will plan for the future, you will have served not only your city and your State but the whole country. As long as Tammany remains in charge of New York the entire system of city government in America is disgraced. Shall we work toward a city-manager system? Shall we ask the legislature for a complete reorganization of the government and a decrease of the elective officers to two or three? Can we as a result of your labors point to some weakness in our machinery which enables rascals in office to profit at the expense of the taxpayers? These and a multitude of other questions suggest themselves. Upon how you answer them, and whether you will undertake to answer them at all, depends entirely the outcome of your inquiry, whether it is to be merely a passing bit of fireworks or something of lasting value to your fellow-citizens.

THE EDITORS OF THE NATION

War in India

WAR is on in India. The harassed and despairing world is now to be the scene of another bitter and, we fear, bloody struggle which can have only one outcome—the end of British control in India. With Mahatma Gandhi in jail, Nehru sentenced to two years of hard labor, and more drastic measures of repression daily being applied, the British government is trying in 1932 to rule by force and violence an unwilling people. The issues are substantially the same as in the previous clashes; but this time Gandhi enters upon his campaign morally strengthened. No one now can say, as many said during the last crusade of civil disobedience, that the Indian leader has shown unwillingness to discuss controversial matters, for he sat through weary weeks at the Second Round Table Conference, steadily more convinced that British promises of autonomy were meaningless and would not be carried out except under conditions so guarded as to nullify them. The final break came over the refusal of the Viceroy, the Earl of Willingdon, to discuss with Gandhi the stern enactments recently instituted in Bengal, the United Provinces, and on the northwestern frontier. These measures, ostensibly set in action to prevent assassination or lesser crimes of violence, were so extreme that every vestige of freedom could be denied to Indians and every kind of Nationalist assertion ruthlessly put down.

It is clear as crystal that after the demise of the Labor Government, which left an unenviable record on India, the National Government intended to resort, if "necessary," to the sternest expedients in order to quell the expected uprising following the fiasco at London. Gandhi points out, with justice, that the pact he consummated with Lord Irwin, the previous Viceroy, tacitly permitted the continuance of civil disobedience and the boycott during negotiations. But no such mood is now discernible among the British leaders, even that erstwhile champion of Indian self-government, Prime Minister MacDonald. The absolute outlawry of the Indian National Congress, the barring of Nationalist literature and messages from the mails and wires, the confiscation of property and contributions to the cause of swaraj are threatened and doubtless will soon be in actual operation. Well may Gandhi predict a reign of terror. During the civil disobedience of a year ago the innumerable annoyances by the Indian crusaders brought ferocious floggings, torture, even at times the actual caging of demonstrators.

It seems to us that Gandhi, whose inconsistencies have been more than a few, has maintained throughout the present conflict a straight and unassailable position. During his first public address on arriving in London he said: "The Congress wants freedom"—and his voice underscored the word. Continuing, he declared: "The Congress has chosen as the method of winning this freedom, truth and non-violence. If the dumb millions are to win freedom, it can be secured by these means and none other." His frequent hesitations, his kindness to the English when in England, his patient willingness to wait as long as any hope of a genuine settlement remained were not recessions but were all in keeping with his way of life. There is a damning contrast between this frail but mighty rebel and the Empire that he challenges. The official pomposity of a Willingdon fades into insignificance beside the nobility of the man who, smiling into the faces of those sent to carry him away to prison, declares in transparent sincerity: "We are prepared to sacrifice all. We shall forget families and friends, we shall sacrifice our property, we shall bear the utmost privation and greatest oppression, including lathi and machine-gun. But we shall bear no hatred toward the British." In this spirit and by this sign will India conquer.

Capital-Gains Tax

NO taxation problem now before Congress is likely to prove quite as difficult to solve satisfactorily as that of the tax on capital gains. Democratic Congressmen are being rapidly won over to the view that the provisions of the revenue law applying to capital gains and losses ought to be abolished entirely, and that the abolition should apply to taxes on 1931 incomes. The removal of these provisions, certainly, is essential if any substantial revenue is to be derived from the individual income tax next March. If they remain in force, the deficit that the federal government will confront at the end of the present fiscal year will be far greater than the official Treasury estimates. For with the unparalleled collapse in all security values in the last two years, there are few wealthy men indeed who will not be able to show capital losses for either the year or the two-year period that more than cancel their year's income from interest and dividends, and in many cases even from salaries. This is equivalent to saying that from the standpoint of revenues to be received next March it is much less important whether the maximum individual income-tax rates are raised to 40, 50, or 60 per cent than whether the capital-gain-and-loss provisions are repealed.

It may be regarded as extremely unfair that individuals who were taxed heavily on their gains in 1927, 1928, and 1929 should not be permitted to make corresponding deductions for their losses in 1931, particularly when many of them have already sold their securities for that purpose. The only reply that could be made to such a view—aside from that concerning the pressing need for revenues—is that if the capital-gains provisions of the law are unsound and ought in any case to be repealed, then the government is certainly as much entitled to repeal them in a year when it stands to gain heavily by doing so as in a year when it stands to lose by doing so.

But if Congress now repeals the capital-gain-and-loss provisions, it should be prepared to accept the full consequences of its action. There can be no defense whatever of a cat-and-mouse policy of repealing these provisions in every year in which the government stands to gain by repeal and restoring them whenever the government stands to gain by restoring them. If Congress refuses to allow deduction for losses, then no principle of equity or ability to pay can justify it in taxing capital gains. And the receipts from the capital-gains tax in the past have been rather high. In 1929 the income tax on net gains of individuals amounted to $285,000,000, or 28 per cent of the total income-tax receipts of $1,002,000,000; and Professor Seligman estimates that when account is taken of capital gains not separately entered for the sake of a lower tax rate, the receipts from the capital-gains tax amounted to at least a third of those from the entire individual income tax.

These large revenues do not in themselves mean that it is inadvisable now to repeal the capital-gains provisions. It is quite possible that in the long run the gains and losses of the government through these provisions would tend to balance each other. That at least appears to be the theory of practically every European government with an income tax. The British income-tax law ignores capital gains and losses, though the government offsets this to some extent by its high inheritance taxes, which enable it to receive the benefits of accretions to capital over a lifetime. Probably the best solution at present would be some compromise between our own policy up to now and the British policy. Our present law is itself the result of a compromise. Originally all capital gains were taxed as ordinary income. When this was seen often to work inequitably, the existing provisions were adopted, which impose a maximum tax of 12½ per cent on capital gains made in a period of more than two years and allow a maximum deduction of 12½ per cent for capital losses incurred in a similar period, while capital gains or losses for a shorter period are added to or deducted from ordinary income. A year ago Albert H. Wiggin made the interesting suggestion that capital gains be taxed a maximum rate of 7½ per cent, disregarding the time between purchase and sale, and that offsets for capital losses be applied only against capital gains. Such a plan would certainly be free from one of the most serious objections to the present capital-gains provisions—that they increase the violence of the long-run swings of the stock market through the reluctance of wealthy individuals to sell and record profits in a rising market and through the anxiety of these same individuals to sell and record losses in a falling market.

Grass by the Yard

THE astonished residents of Queens Borough in New York City woke up the other morning and discovered that on the sides of one of the main highways, which they had been wont to see littered with bits of paper, weeds, and a spear or two of wretched dry grass, a carpet of green, smooth and clipped, lay before their eyes. Did grass grow overnight? Was modern science responsible for this miracle? Or was the Genie of the Lamp also in the pay of Tammany Hall? The answer to all these questions was a simple negative. The explanation was equally simple. The strip of verdure was not grass at all but a combination of slate and asphalt, colored green and so cunningly constructed that at a distance of a few feet it appeared to be the real thing.

The merits of the new invention are that it looks enough like grass to pass easy muster; that it requires no care—no cutting, no watering, no raking; and that the spots along the city streets which ought to be grassed but are actually mere eyesores, will shine with a new beauty. In other words, the great trouble with artificial grass is not that it is inferior to the plant itself but that it is so superior, so good. In this respect it could very well serve as a symbol for modern American life. The imitation is so much better than the original that the original is no longer worth while. More and more we live vicariously—in the radio, the movies, the tabloids. We move mechanically—by the motor car, the subway, the innumerable substitutes for the human foot. We actually look forward to the day when a pill containing all vitamins and all proper nourishment values can be swallowed three times a day in place of eating. Why should we be horrified by the prospect of buying our grass by the square yard and cementing it down over the humble and inoffensive earth?

If this artificial living were carried to its logical extreme, we should have the sort of life pictured by Bernard Shaw in his "Back to Methuselah," life deprived of every necessity for bodily function. There would, however, be this important difference. Mr. Shaw's play pictures the ideal life, once the compulsions of the body are removed, as one of rapacious thought. "One moment of the ecstasy of life as I live it," says the Female Ancient to one of those beings not yet raised to the heights, "would strike you dead." But those persons who live in the newsreels and the love movie do not occupy the time thus spared from the labor of living in thought. They go to the movie because they cannot think. They fumble through the tabloids, looking hastily at the more revealing photographs, because they are incapable of sustained occupation with an idea, with facts, with simple information about the world in which they live. They must receive information by means of shocks to their nervous systems—pretty girl, bare leg, love-nest, tot murderer. They spend a certain number of hours of each day in sleep, in eating, in working at a monotonous task. When they are free of these, they live—in the life of some louder, brasher, bawdier person than themselves; or one more beautiful, more dashing, more successful. The shopgirl, buying her clothes on Fourteenth Street, watches Gloria Swanson sweeping around a richly furnished room in satin and sables, and sees not a movie actress but herself, suave, perfumed, irresistible.

This release from a drab life into romance is by no means peculiar to our age. But the mechanical manner of doing it we can perhaps claim title to, a dubious honor enough. When the peasants of France escaped from a hard life into the sublimities of the church, they went themselves and in person to take part in the miracle. Each one of them saw the bread and wine changed to the Body and Blood; each one looked at the Mother of God and knew her for queen and comforter. And their hard lot became somehow not only more bearable but in a sense glorified thereby. With their hands they made a life; with their hearts they made a heaven. Not a heaven sent them ready wrapped and guaranteed free from adulterants, not grass by the yard, but turf sown in the earth they had worked, freshened and tended not only with water but with sweat.

There is no plant more sturdy or more faithful than grass; its roots actually spread under the very ministrations of the knife. It lives more fully because it dies so often. It requires, however, to achieve complete fulfillment, air, sun, food, and water. Yet in the cities in which the majority of our population elects to live, grass cannot grow. This might perhaps be the epitaph of our civilization: Our way of life kills grass. It is not entirely discouraging that we still feel the loss of it, even to the extent of inventing an artificial substitute. Only when we refuse to be interested even in synthetic grass shall be wholly lost.

Speaking of Revolution . . .

By HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

I SPENT the day looking at pictures. It is a nice way to spend a day soon after Christmas and the pictures were very interesting. They were photographs of the new Russia—smokestacks and turbines and bearded mujiks worshipping pieces of cast iron with the same reverence and awe with which a few years ago they worshipped their icons of St. Nicholas and St. Michael.

It was a most imposing collection and rather startling for those of us who only knew the old Russia of squalor and genius. Then, from the pictures, I wandered to the text and read all about the plans to turn the plains from the Baltic to Kamchatka into one vast Pittsburgh—factories on this side of the Urals and factories on that side of the Urals, factories in Bokhara and factories around Lake Baikal, and all of those factories puffing and hammering and grinding and turning things out—billions of tons of millions of things—sold dirt cheap to all the world—take 'em away—order new billions of tons—we can make them—let the factories puff and hammer and produce. And then suddenly I was reminded of the words of one of our two great philosophers and I asked myself the question, "Suppose they can produce those billions of tons of millions of things, then what in Heck are they going to do with them?"

Since this is an article on Russia, a little metaphysical detour will not be out of place. According to the best of my knowledge and belief, there are only two really great philosophers in our country. One is Rube Goldberg and the other is Professor Doctor Herriman, author of the epoch-making volume "Über das kategorische Benehmen der verrückten Katze-Krazy, im Lichte der allerneuesten Forschungen über die Herkunft des Ignatius Mäuschen."

Those two scholars have been able to interpret the American soul for me as no professional philosopher of the last twenty years has succeeded in doing, no matter how diligently I have ransacked their learned tomes. Yes, there is a man here in New York by the name of Cohen, and once in a while I get a glimpse of what he means. I have now given up reading the more popular philosophies—those that have entirely revolutionized thought and those that have put thought into revolution. I shall patiently wait until those books have been translated into the English language.

But to return to Russia and those lovely pictures of factories and power-houses in Magnetopolis and Steelgorod and Bicarbonas Veliki—not to forget Stalinville, which reminds one incidentally of the vainglorious and absurd custom of the ancient rulers of Russia of giving their cities such names as Petersburg or Alexandropol. Suppose they all begin to hammer and puff and grind and turn out tons and tons and tons and still more tons and thousands of tons and millions of tons and billions of tons of goods—suppose they are able to turn out millions and billions of tons for a million or a billion years—suppose they are, and I am not the one to claim that they are not—then what in the name of the Ten Thousand Virgins (they are now in heaven but they perished miserably crossing the Rhine. French papers please copy!) are the Comrades going to do with them?

No, I am not trying to start an argument. I would like to discuss the true nature of the Trinity with the general of the Society of Jesus as to argue with a disciple of Lenin about a single comma in the immortal works of that member of the Marx family who married into the house of Argyle. (This little aside will flatter the pride of the Marx Brothers. One has got to be nice to one's cousins once in a while.) I will even overlook the somewhat perplexing problem of how to finance the sale of these billions of tons of articles or to provide the billions of customers with the necessary cash. But who in the name of a merciful heaven will want to buy all this truck?

That question is unavoidable in the after-Christmas season. I am a poor man and I spend a great deal of my time riding on top of a bus. Whenever the stenographers and shopgirls who are my faithful traveling companions light a fresh cigarette, and stop smoking the old one, I am given a momentary opportunity to study the contents of the shop windows. Since The Nation, like Ballyhoo and the Congressional Record (why don't the latter two merge? They print about the same stuff right now), carries no commercial advertisements, we can say many things which are on the reportorial black list of magazines like the Mercury and the Sunny Side, that admirably edited publication devoted to the interests of the Morticians. But contemplating the wares I saw offered for sale on my last bus trip, I felt grateful that the depression had definitely deprived my friends of the wherewithal to buy me any more Christmas presents.

And that, if you please, was on the Avenue. For fairness's sake I made a pilgrimage through the less favored sections in search of some cheap but charming Italian products which used to be for sale there before we got the quota system and the foreigners became Americanized. It was terrible. It was so terrible that Noodle refused a piece of salami, against a background of such statuary.

And now we are invited to contemplate the hour when all these Slavic mills will start to grind and flood the planet with their products. The prospect is terrible. It is too terrible for words. The lovely photographs of all those power-houses have suddenly reminded me of those incredible interiors which the old Russians used to consider the height of elegance. And now we shall see our fair planet deluged with their proletarian counterparts.

These products, of course, won't look the least little bit bourgeois. They will look like the furniture of the ancient imperial palaces or the Christmas cards of the English royal family.

By the millions and billions of tons—O Lord, have mercy upon us! By the millions of tons!

If I Were a (Constitutional) Dictator*

By MORRIS L. ERNST

THE cloak of a dictator slips easily over any pair of shoulders. Under such a garment the dictators in this series have glided off into delightful realms of fancy, into lands barren of warning lights. I shall keep within the four corners of the Constitution and obey even the mandates of the nine venerable men who sit in the United States Supreme Court as ultimate-veto dictators. No inference should be drawn from the order of presentation or the arrangement of subheadings, and it must be assumed that I am acting as President, Congress, governors, legislatures, selectmen—in fact, all duly constituted governmental servants of the people. If I were dictator, under the Constitution, therefore, I should proceed as follows:

IN PURSUIT OF JOY

1. Repeal all legislation giving the state power to censor ideas by control of mails, customs, movies, and so on, or by forbidding free discussion of obscenity, sedition, birth control, et cetera. Only a constitutional dictatorship can afford to allow free trade in thought and wait to act until the commission of an overt deed.

2. Repeal the Volstead Act and the prohibition amendment in toto, leaving that problem to the separate States to handle by process other than injunctive.

3. Cancel all radio licenses, paying nothing for permits because no vested right has been transferred to broadcasting companies. Then establish governmental broadcasting companies with decentralized control in order to prevent all of our culture from flowing through Manhattan.

4. See that cities and States pepper each community with adequate playgrounds and park spaces. Enact legislation so that the various government agencies may condemn less than the fee of land, that is, condemnation on lease basis. This is temporarily necessary because of previous unwise extension of borrowing capacities.

5. Open up and expand the Bureau of Standards so that it gives service directly to the public, and amend the libel laws so that freedom of criticism of commodities is as generous as the latitude allowed dramatic critics and book reviewers. This would end most of the waste of advertising.

6. Establish the public-health service on a basis of actual public service so that physical comfort would be considered a governmental activity.

7. Abolish all private hospitals, raising the necessary funds through taxation rather than through charity.

8. Organize a federal educational department but only for the purpose of distribution of information, with complete protection against the freezing into our life of any single educational concept, even my own.

9. Organize departments of arts and culture for the perpetuation and spread of those elements of life which, added to a full stomach, make it worth living.

10. Instruct the various governments to conduct or indirectly subsidize music, opera, theater, movies, and other forms of entertainment as they now handle playgrounds and parks. I will also want bowling alleys and hurdy-gurdies to satisfy a personal weakness.

11. Direct each community to set aside attractive, convenient areas as gathering places for debates and open-air meetings held by any and all groups in the community.

12. Assure academic freedom, both in and out of the classroom, for teachers and pupils.

13. Liberalize and modify divorce laws so as to prevent chicanery and hypocrisy. We will still continue forty-eight separate divorce systems because we are not finished with experimentation on this kind of social problem. Divorce courts, however, will collate their experience so that it will be of advantage to the half-million or more spouses who split up every year.

14. Adopt accident insurance for automobile cases, along the lines of workmen's compensation insurance with fixed awards, limitation of defenses, and great relief to the courts.

15. Procure advice from the medical profession, and on its judgment legalize abortions within that period which the profession reports as medically safe. I will thus stop at once thousands of needless deaths and the present enormous practice of stealthy operations. I will relieve hundreds of thousands of women from disturbing fears. After our economic reforms are established, our birth-rate will increase—but only of wanted offspring born into adequate economic surroundings.

16. Immediately take steps to minimize many of the public nuisances, such as noise, litter, smoke, insects. Some of this will be done through the research laboratories, some through education, and the remainder through enforcement of existing laws.

17. Immediately prepare legislation for conscription of males and females for peaceful purposes such as extermination of pests, cleaning up cities, and so on. The burden of the more disagreeable but unavoidable labors of communal life will be spread among the qualified persons. I estimate that two months out of each person's life will be enough.

18. Increase all the budgets of educational departments and reduce the outrageous disproportion of teachers to pupils.

19. Immediately place all property abutting on public highways within the public domain to the extent that signboards, litter, and so on will be banned.

20. Immediately raise the age limit of children in industry to eighteen, thus spreading employment and increasing education.

IN PURSUIT OF JUSTICE

21. Provide that all laws hereafter enacted expire after ten years unless previously reenacted. Thus do we establish lawmaking as a growing process, subject to stock-taking each decade.

22. Repeal at once thousands of laws (more than 10 per cent of the New York State penal laws, for example) so that nullification shall be diminished. We are lawless because we have too many laws.

* The seventh of a series of articles on this subject. The eighth, and last, by Oswald Garrison Villard, will appear next week.

23. Abolish all injunctions of every kind, including liquor padlock, labor union, et cetera. The use of the injunction breaks down the ordinary process of the law—to wit, the police and the criminal courts. The penal laws written into the statute books by elected officials will be the only injunctions to the people.

24. Abolish the process of contempt of court except for those obstructive acts committed in the courtroom, and even for those provide trial by jury. This includes the closing of our last remnant of a debtors' prison, the alimony jails.

25. Take away from all courts the power to impose sentences in criminal cases, leaving to the judge and jury only the determination of the fact of innocence or guilt. The imposition of the sentence will reside in boards of educators, psychiatrists, and penologists. Criminal process will no longer serve as a drain for national sadism. Capital punishment will be abolished.

26. Recognize the fact that the prison population requires our greatest expenditure of energy for rehabilitation, and provide a five-hour day for all prison officials, and salaries on a scale higher than those paid to the staff employed in the education of bond salesmen at the leading universities of the land.

27. Analyze the prison population so that the major portion will be treated as health, hospital, or educational cases. In time, our art of education, once infected with this point of view, will be expanded so that we shall recognize the curable possibilities of nearly every prison patient.

28. Establish public defenders in criminal courts and impose upon prosecutors the duty of calling all material witnesses and a prohibition against concealing testimony of innocence.

29. Reappraise the position of the American Indians so as to relieve them of the stigma of an inferior minority, continuing the subsidies previously allowed but applying these toward health and rehabilitation. Restore their full and equal civil rights.

30. Put into actual effect those civil rights which many persons thought were obtained for the Negro as a result of the Civil War, including right to serve on jury, discontinuation of segregated areas, right to vote, equal and impartial distribution of tax funds for Negro schools, and abolition of Jim Crow customs.

31. Abolish all private police and privately subsidized public protection, such as the Coal and Iron Police and private deputy sheriffs. Public peace should be paid for out of public funds without any privilege to class.

32. Put the courts, at present operating without an administrative head, on a business basis, with business administrators, either individuals or councils, in charge of the administration of this, our most defective branch of government.

33. Expedite trials, modify limitations on rules of evidence, grant judges broader powers, and maintain jury trials. Each case will be tried within six weeks instead of possibly three years as at present.

34. Immediately call constitutional conventions so as to allow the people to restate basic provisions of our Constitution, and provide for automatic constitutional conventions every ten years. I will urge ■ reconsideration of our present wasteful theory of checks and balances.

35. Enact a lame-duck amendment to the Constitution so that we shall not be ruled by discredited representatives.

36. Force all public officials by contract to waive immunity in any investigation or criminal proceeding. The most serious of all criminal offenses shall be that of betrayal of ■ public trust by a public official. Severe punishment for such offenses will be necessary for a short time in order to overcome the present general corruption of government. My entire program rests on the development of honesty in officialdom, for through this program additional duties will be placed upon the state as such. No system can work with corrupt or lethargic prosecutors, as at present. On the other hand public service will be better rewarded by proper systems of promotion.

IN PURSUIT OF INTERNATIONAL GOOD-WILL

37. Compel all the activities of the State Department to be arrived at by open covenant, and by all, I mean all. There is no valid reason for a servant of the people, called ■ Secretary of State, ever to deceive the people by silence.

38. Join the League of Nations, the World Court, the international economic boards, and practically all international movements tending toward an international point of view. This, irrespective of whether or not we have a definite conviction that any particular program of this era will be lasting and definitive.

39. Restore the country to its former proud position ■ ■ haven for political outcasts from abroad.

40. Liberalize the immigration laws so as gradually to restore us to the position of open door. This means for Japanese, Chinese, and all other peoples. The sole basis for restriction will be the ability to assimilate by trades. After a decade we shall be able to assimilate all who want to enter because all workers then will be able to buy back the amount they produce.

41. Encourage all international cartels, because we are convinced of the dire results of competition and because we wish to save our great industries from the painful effects of "rugged individualism."

42. Adopt the policy of recognition of all countries. I am not too proud to bow to anyone. This, of course, includes Russia, which country we have only recognized at our counting-houses when gold was carried as ■ passport.

43. Withdraw immediately all our troops and controls from all foreign countries—Haiti, Nicaragua, the Philippines, and the like. In no case will we go into any country except on a plebiscite of the people themselves, and only if they ask for advice or assistance. We have given too many small nations an inferiority complex.

44. Immediately cancel all moneys owed to us on war debts. I will attach no conditions thereto but will merely urge other countries to do likewise.

IN PURSUIT OF OUR COMMUNAL BUDGET

45. Abolish all commodity taxes of every nature. They are not based on ability to pay, and they increase the cost of living.

46. Increase income taxes, if necessary, to the level of the highest rates established by us during the war for the purpose of killing Germans.

47. Increase inheritance-tax rates, coupling therewith ■ graduated gift tax in order to prevent evasion of death duties. The rates will be made commensurate with governmental budgetary needs, so that each annual budget will be made to match.

48. Create ■ graduated tax on labor turn-over as ■ partial throttle on ill-advised and still uncontrolled expansions.

49. Pass legislation to eliminate the tariff at the end of ten years and intrust the formula for gradual restoration to ■ free-trade basis to a commission of pronounced free traders. They will realize that our past errors of protective policy will of necessity require ■ gradual withdrawal of economic subsidy or support.

50. Abolish all military appropriations but retain airplane manufacture and transportation, to be conducted by the government for mail, passenger, and freight purposes.

51. Open all income-tax returns for public inspection.

52. Secure tax relief for the general community in part by removal of exemptions now granted to special interests such as churches. It costs at present $22 per seat per sermon at any fashionable church in New York and this burden should be placed on those directly benefited rather than on the general public.

IN PURSUIT OF PEACE OF MIND

53. Establish "federal-State-city" public employment agencies, on a federal-to-State and State-to-city subsidy basis. Thus we shall insure uniformity of practices and adequate interstate movement of productive power. This is a prerequisite for all forms of worker insurance.

54. Abolish all private employment agencies, including newspaper advertising for Help and Situations Wanted, thus saving hundreds of millions of dollars, the second largest item of easily preventable waste in the land. Public employment facilities must be ■ monopoly like the Post Office.

55. Establish health insurance on the same basic theory ■ that on which workmen's accident insurance is conducted now. The social implications of a leg cut off by a machine are identical with phossy jaw, radium poisoning, or appendicitis.

56. Establish old-age insurance on the same basis—i. e., a worker to receive support as a matter of right, not as a hand-out.

57. Establish unemployment insurance and thus abolish the dole system now carried on in most cities and States through soup kitchens.

58. Abolish all war pensions, the needy recipients to be taken care of under accident, health, unemployment, or old-age allowances.

59. Reduce the work day to six hours and treat the hours of labor on a barometer basis, decreasing them as a surplus of supplies is created and increasing them in the event of an impending shortage.

60. Promptly abolish, in view of the improved working conditions, all legal or economic preferentials between men and women except as actual health conditions create immediate and clear variable factors.

61. Impose, as a temporary measure, ■ minimum-wage scale, but this would have a definite period of termination, possibly five years, because after that time it would be unnecessary.

IN PURSUIT OF A USABLE PLENTY

62. I will take over the telephone, telegraph, and express lines and combine their administration with the Post Office Department. This can be accomplished by purchase, at present depressed values, or by operating ■ competing service.

63. The government will acquire, own, and operate and will have the right to distribute all power arising from streams and rivers. The right to distribute may not be used but it is necessary in order to place the government in a bargaining position.

64. The government will encourage the elimination of slums and the development of decent housing either by direct construction, tax relief, or government financing.

65. The Patent Office will be reorganized so that all new inventions will vest in the United States ■ such, the government to license and to make fair compensation to the inventor and to all those who have contributed to the improvement of the device. This will be one of the many methods of controlling production and price.

66. The pooling of all the railroads will be accomplished at once, to the end that competitive waste may be eliminated.

67. As a temporary measure, all of the real estate and farms repossessed by banks, insurance companies, and other lenders will be pooled so as to provide economic cheap management and the proper further treatment of these assets. Farm reorganization will be initiated through the back-door method of existing mortgage controls.

68. Out of the farm holdings repossessed or about to be repossessed by insurance companies and other lending institutions, the largest farm corporation in the history of the world will be formed for the cooperative development of the farming industry and for the abandonment of those farms which in our economic situation should no longer be worked.

69. Milk, bread, coal, and other necessities of life will be declared public utilities because they are more essential to a decent life than gas or electric light. These basic commodities will immediately come under the control of regulatory bodies.

70. I will immediately make plans for a five- and ten-year basis of public works, arranging a program of delaying public works for possible periods of depression.

71. As a temporary measure, to reduce the distress caused by our previous stupidities, I will float a five-billion-dollar bond issue for public works.

72. I will forbid the erection of any new building of any kind without a certificate of reasonable necessity from the proper city, State, or federal planning commission. We now restrict the right to the development of property by fire, health, city zoning, safety, and other laws. It is equally important to restrict on the basis of a social necessity, to prevent the waste of community wealth.

73. I will place the banks in the limited-income category along the general lines of other public utilities. This result can be obtained through Federal Reserve Board powers or through taxation.

74. I will restrict the issuance of securities sold to the public as the issuance of public-utility securities are now restricted, but the restriction will be made effective. This is essential to prevent undue overexpansion. Also the disastrous competition of banks, lending for projects of slight social value, will be minimized through consolidation of lending facilities by trades or localities.

75. I will immediately cause every community to create city-planning boards with wide powers and clearly conceived programs, so that communities will no longer grow in Topsy fashion.

76. I will merge all non-profit-making insurance companies, savings banks, et cetera (a large proportion are mutual and so-called cooperative institutions). If there is no other way to save the present overlapping and competitive wastes in these fields, I will use the power of taxation.

77. I will limit the Sherman Law, the Clayton Act, and all other legislation which endeavors to make competition compulsory so that they will apply only to offending companies which fail to submit to complete regulation (including fixing of price and expansion policies), on the theory of railroad-rate regulation, before an enlarged Federal Trade Commission. This is what the Swope plan indicated but didn't dare say.

78. I will revamp our regulatory system. At present it operates as an inducement to waste and a penalty to thrift. The commissions should have the power to disallow unwise and unnecessary expenditures. They must be given power over holding companies, affiliates, and subsidiaries. The present position of regulated companies is one of "heads I win, tails you lose," because the contests of companies now carried on against commissions' findings are at the expense of consumers and not stockholders.

79. I will reorganize the regulatory bodies so as to remove them from their present paradoxical position of being both a judicial body and the representative of the consumers. They will all be constituted as judicial bodies but, in addition, attached to each there will be the office of a People's Counsel, to represent the consumers' interests as opposed to the attorneys of the companies, representing the stockholders.

80. I will immediately legalize broad extension of government-owned utilities by mergers, consolidations, and so on, in the fields of power, water, et cetera.

81. I will lay great stress upon the development of cooperatives, particularly in the farm field, appreciating throughout that these cooperatives are not bona fide cooperatives but are merely cooperatives for the producers. With proper regulatory control, however, the consumers will be protected by regulation rather than by domination of the producing entities.

82. I will promptly adopt most of the suggestions made by the Congressional commissions in the last eight years in respect to the coal industry, including particularly the elimination of the "snow-bird" high-cost mines, the improvement of labor and marketing conditions, and ultimate incentives to further consolidations.

83. I will encourage, induce, or compel the development of business into separate large trusts, so that each major section of American business will become "one big office." We shall thus eliminate many of the wastes of competition and, through the offices of the government and the powers mentioned above of the Federal Trade Commission, be able more accurately to tie up consumption with production. To this end I will encourage labor organizations on the basis of industries rather than of distinct occupations, thus eliminating most of the jurisdictional deficiencies of present labor organizations. To this end voting in employers' and employees' organizations will be protected by secret ballot and honest impartial counting. Duress at economic voting booths is greater today than at political ballot boxes.

84. I will immediately procure ample appropriations so that the Federal Trade Commission can really gather all the facts in regard to trade associations now in existence and project programs for the building up of such associations within definite groups. This is necessary particularly during the interval of transition to large-scale regulated trusts.

85. I will extend our forestry program and adopt a strict conservation policy. This problem will diminish in importance as we progress in the field of proper planning of industry.

86. In all fields of business I will insist on full publicity—for example, in all banking matters and the Stock Exchange. As a temporary measure, I will abolish floor trading on the Stock Exchange and encourage by legislation the development of the profession of financial advisers, pending such time as the government will open its own bureau of financial advice to those who invest. Open disclosure will not be satisfied by the present rule of "all that is said must be truthful." I will insist on the theory that if any representation as to a commodity or a security is made, all the facts must be disclosed.

87. I will abolish all private trusteeships and executorships of estates and arrange for a government trust following roughly the New Zealand program. This will rest in the Federal Reserve Board and act as a partial stabilizer.

WHEN IN DOUBT REMEMBER:

88. This entire program is directed not toward restriction of output as is our present policy (note 26 per cent copper limitation), but rather toward wider distribution of purchasing power. I will aim at higher payments for productive services, lower costs, and distribution of wealth in proportion to social functions performed.

I feel that law is only a translation of community desires, and the program enunciated above is as much as our community will accept at this moment. As a keynote for the next program, I indicate:

(a) I will provide that courts of final jurisdiction may not declare statutes unconstitutional. If necessary, as a temporary compromise I will establish a three-quarter or four-fifths rule for such purposes.

(b) I will pass legislation for proportional representation, direct primaries, simplicity of independent nominations, initiative, referendum, and recall.

These are a few of the steps that I would take as a constitutional dictator. They by no means represent my ideal or my ultimate plan for the organization of mankind. They are only a springboard for action which will lead to a fuller life of joy for all people.

Our present troubles arise not from scarcity but from overabundance. After this program is adopted, we shall no doubt have periods of abundance when we shall go bowling, fishing, and sailing until our supplies are used up. Plenty will not spell suffering. In the meanwhile we may develop a spiritual crusade for a more exciting adventure in this interval we call living.

Keeping the Alien in His Place

By GEORGE HORNE

A FEW years ago all that was required of one wishing to enter the United States was mental health, soundness of limb, a dislike of anarchism, and a ticket entitling the immigrant to a crowded corner in the stable-like bowels of third-rate ships; with, in addition, enough money for rail passage to Upper Sandusky.

Try to get in now! The great human movement which began more than a century ago and continued with force enough to populate the country from Liberty Street to Arizona is ended. We have seen our last large immigration figures. Migration westward is comparatively nothing, and steamship lines are lean and hungry.

From distant history's standpoint observers will see that, as time is reckoned, the population of a new and wild continent was incredibly swift, and that it ended with apparent suddenness in the twelve years following the Great War. This is for historians. As for us, we see our government, often accused of bluntness, staging many a little drama in the consular offices where Hans Svenson and Willy So-and-So apply timidly for admission to the great New World. What power has been given the consul abroad who sits in judgment on visa applications? What chance has a man when he steps into the consular office, hoping for an opportunity to come to America? And even though fortune smiles upon him and he sails away toward America with a visa and a smile, are his troubles ended?

The majority of aliens reaching these shores today are not prospective residents, but visitors, here for one purpose or another, and most of these latter have been granted sixty-day visitor's permits. One would suppose that after consuls had granted these visitors permission to enter the country and had carefully scrutinized their credentials in Europe, they could pass into the country without trouble. As a rule they are met with the same suspicion accorded immigrants, and are frequently detained on Ellis Island awaiting possible exclusion. The principle of selection, which any up-to-the-minute business man would apply in a similar situation, is an unknown quantity in our immigration policy.

American consuls are little czars. Their clerks, their stenographers, their doormen and employees of whatever status who have come under the influence of the consular policy are little czars. Even American citizens entering many of their own consular offices have to identify themselves as such before they are accorded courtesy. This is not true everywhere. I met a consul in Canada who was soft-spoken and a gentleman; but in his outer office a mouse-faced, bitter-tongued young lady snapped and growled at every alien who entered the office. It was, "Well, what d'ya want?" and then, "Aw right, sit down till you're called." I wondered if it could not be arranged some other way.

Students of the immigration problem are inclined to believe in the present system as the best solution under immigration laws which are antedated, prejudiced, and intolerant. It began in 1929, five years after the act of 1924 shut down European immigration. There were and are now no quotas in the Western Hemisphere. Canada and Mexico, for instance, are permitted to send in aliens without limit, subject naturally to "other restricting clauses."

As a result of the vacuum created by the rapid decreases in European entries, immigration from Western countries suddenly increased and it was impossible to cut down the numbers by law. Thus evolved the new consular policy by which it is now possible to deny anyone a visa. Carrying the phrase "other restricting clauses" like a battle-ax, the consuls have performed major operations on the stated quota numbers. A consul can jolly well turn down any applicant he pleases, muttering behind his whiskers (the consul's) that the applicant "is likely to become a public charge." Thousands have gone down under this blow. And there is no answer to it, because it is true.

Unfortunately, this system has not worked out in a straightforward way, thus adding another charge to the world-wide criticism leveled at the United States by millions who have felt the humiliation which is a part of contact with immigration procedure. So this is why your friend in Europe cannot join you here, even though he has funds in an amount which, five years ago, would have been more than sufficient. That is, also, why Ole Oleson, applying at the consulate in Stockholm, was asked how much money he had.

Ole replied: "Two hundred fifty dollars."

"Hmmm," hummed the vice-consul. "Have you your ticket, besides that?"

"Yes."

"Where are you going, Ole?"

"To Racine, Wisconsin," Ole replies.

"Why do you want to go there?" The consul does not mean this as a slap at Racine, for Racine is a very nice city. The question is a tricky one, as may be seen.

"Because my Uncle Ben lives there." This seems reasonable enough, but it doesn't help Ole.

"Have you a job waiting for you in Racine?"

"No, but my uncle will help me get one."

"Hmmm. So you have no job, eh? Too bad, too bad. Well, I'm afraid we will have to defer your case. Your money will not last long in America, Ole. You might become a public charge. No, you'll have to wait a while, get more money." And Ole departs, cursing his stupidity.

"Why didn't I say I had a job?" Ole kicks himself.

Ole's cousin, Sven, is applying for the quota on the following day and is benefited—or so he thinks—by Ole's mistake. He sits at the vice-consul's table and the first part of the conversation is quite similar to that in which poor, luckless Ole engaged, except that Sven is going to Minneapolis. This, again, is a cause of wonderment to our vice-consul.

"And why are you going to Minneapolis, Sven?"

"I got a brother there, sir!" returns Sven, sure of his ground.

"Have you a job waiting there, or has your brother secured work for you, Sven?"

Sven remembers Ole's error. He is ready. Poor Sven. "Oh, but yes sir," he replies. "My job is waiting. 'I'm to get a good salary each week, so will never become ■ charge of your public, sir." Sven settles back in the chair with the air of a man who has done well by himself. But the consul looks grave.

"Tsk, tsk," Ole hears. The consul shakes his head, in sympathy with Sven's sad fate.

Sven cannot go to America because, if he did, it would be in violation of the contract-labor section of the immigration law. Ole cannot go because he hasn't a job and Sven cannot go because he has. There you are; and there also are Ole and Sven.

But the consul at Glasgow, Scotland, raised the ante in the quota game. A few weeks ago a resident of a nearby town inquired at the consulate regarding quota requirements. This applicant was informed that she must promise to accept no form of employment if admitted to the United States; and further, that she must show proof before sailing that she had funds sufficient for from five years' to ten years' residence in New York City.

What does this mean? The answer is that very few are receiving quota visas at the present time. In most cases, persons desiring to settle in the United States are not moneyed; those who have fortunes would prefer to live abroad, anyhow. It means that nearly all applications are being rejected and that those whose applications are approved are of the non-quota or quota-preference classes. Perhaps this system is not so abominable as it may seem. However, the only apparent virtue must lie in the fact that ■ small degree of selection may be employed. But it is a question if this can ever be ■ successful method.

A talented young lady who had held important posts with the Rockefeller Foundation in the Far East applied to a consular officer, requesting a quota number. She was asked for everything but ■ ticket to Ziegfeld's "Follies," and was finally refused. The consular officer asked how much money the young lady had. She told him her present cash supply was approximately $350, and that she had her ticket. This was not nearly enough, she was told. For admission to the United States she would be required to possess sufficient money to live in a New York hotel for ■ year, and would have to have her father's pledge of support in case her funds ran out. A scrutiny of available visa procedure fails to reveal a basis for such requirements.

A young German was brought to the United States last year for the purpose of rejuvenating ■ mill plant after the combined efforts of several local experts had led only to deterioration. He had a visitor's permit, remained for sixty days until he had put the mill on ■ paying basis, and was then forced to return because his time was up. He would have been an asset to the state. His employer needed him, but he will have to go back to his native land and wait for a quota number. Even then the chances are that he will be denied.

Several years ago a young farmer, born in Canada, was smuggled into the United States as part of ■ wagon-load of vegetables. He obtained employment on a farm in a Northern State and after a year or so married his employer's daughter. A child was born, but the mother died, leaving the young farmer an added responsibility. He managed for a few years, and then, in 1929, Congress passed a law providing that an alien expelled from the United States or ordered deported can never under any circumstances enter the country again. Frightened, this alien left the country voluntarily, leaving the child in the keeping of friends. His purpose was to obtain a visa legally and enter the country with sanction. He succeeded in obtaining the visa but as he approached the border he was excluded as an alien contract laborer on the ground that he was going to employment secured while unlawfully in the country. He carried the fight to the highest authorities, with, incidentally, the support of several immigration officials. After the department had discussed the problem from every angle, a special dispensation was ordered and the man admitted. This is one case, among many decided otherwise, where the letter of the law was disregarded for humane purposes.

What happens to the European alien who manages miraculously to obtain a visa as a prospective resident of the United States, or a visitor's permit to tarry in American cities for sixty days? What is the matter with American officials that they should so maltreat foreigners with a tentative foot on the American shore?

Our largest immigration station, located on an island in the center of New York harbor, is an unfortunate combination of ■ prison and the dunce's corner. In the last few years, as ■ reporter of ship news, I have very frequently made the trip from the United States quarantine anchorage to a New York pier, and have watched with amazement the lack of consideration meted out to those unfortunates who happen to be in the alien class. Leading industrialists, artists, merchants, lawyers, educators, men of high standing in nearly every field of endeavor come to this country on every ship. By a dozen means they are made aware when the ship has entered American waters. First, they are herded apart from other human beings. Stewards stand in foyers and classify them in loud voices. They call out to bewildered visitors: "Are you an alien?" The word "alien" thus has acquired the same pleasant quality attached to "fever," to "plague," and to "thief." An alien is not allowed to associate with regular passengers until he has been cleansed of his ills by the immigration fire.

Perhaps there should be no serious criticism of this system, but a shrinking from the methods used is surely admissible. Other countries separate aliens from citizens in a similar manner, but possibly with more delicacy. Here immigration inspectors arrange their papers and manifests at tables in the public rooms and the aliens pass before them in single file. Few of the inspectors ever remove their hats. Naturally there are some gentlemen in the service, but in all honesty the general tone of the service as the visiting foreigner sees it is one of arrogance, discourtesy, and unconscionable disregard of the feelings of others. One wonders if most of the immigration inspectors do not have indigestion. They so frequently are in such bad humor, and one observes foreigners gazing at them contemptuously for their uncouth speech and generally uncultivated demeanor. Must foreign visitors be ushered into the country with an initiation designed to impress them with the fact that we know what they are and they needn't try to get away with anything?

Obviously, it becomes necessary to detain certain prospective visitors and other aliens. But this is no reason for treating them as live stock. If not like animals, they are treated like prisoners. They are held in detention rooms. They are given no freedom, although it would be ■ physical impossibility for them to leave the island if the authorities wanted to initiate a simple system of checking the passengers on the ferry to Manhattan. Even without that it would be feasible to fence off a part of the large island where aliens could move about freely. Still as prisoners they are marched to their meals, and by complaints issuing from the governmental table one judges the meals are pretty third rate. The aliens are not allowed to communicate with their friends by telephone, but may send a telegram, which is never so satisfactory to one in trouble.

Even were it granted that this treatment is right for lower-class immigrants, it is certainly unjustified in the case of cultured men and women; yet they are given the same mental lashing as the less sensitive characters. A few days ago an educated man who owns and directs a museum in Spain was "given the works" on the island. Bound for a few weeks of research in a large private library here, he arrived on a ship which docked on a Friday afternoon. He was detained without any substantial reason and taken to Ellis Island on the following day. He had no American money, but plenty of cash in foreign notes. He could not exchange these on Saturday or on Sunday. After borrowing a coin from a fellow-inmate he was refused permission to use the telephone to communicate with friends here. He could not eat the food placed before him at the prisoners' table, and although he was told he could purchase better food, this was impossible, for his money could not be passed. He tried to leave the table because the food was distasteful to him, but a guard would not allow him to leave the dinner bench and told him he would have to "sit there" whether he wanted to eat or not. He hoped that his case would be called on Saturday, but the board of inquiry on the island was very busy that day, as officials later explained. Sunday, being a holiday, was simply another twenty-four hours. On Monday he succeeded in reaching officials of an art association in the city and on Tuesday his case was called. He was released after posting $500 surety bond. The reason for detaining this visitor was given as follows: He had visited the United States last year and remained here longer than his original sixty-day permit allowed. However, it was later admitted that on this occasion he had obtained an extension of his permit, and had tarried here in perfect accordance with rules and laws. In further support of the treatment of this alien, an official on the island said that there had recently been a revolution in Spain and the examining inspector had probably been on that account "a little nervous."

It is more difficult to visit a detained alien on Ellis Island than to slip a jigsaw to a Sing Sing convict. So far as I know, no one in the detention pens has ever had an opportunity to tell his story to a newspaperman. No one knows what goes on on Ellis Island except what is gleaned from those who manage to escape its hospitality after detention. Frankly then, this information is second hand, but too many visitors have protested bitterly of identical treatment to reject their view as prejudiced.

It is only fair to emphasize that not all our immigration agents are boors. Some treat our visitors kindly and with the greatest courtesy, but the visitors do not remember them at all because they naturally expect such treatment. Why not? Courtesy is no especial virtue. What they do remember is the offensive crudity of United States officialdom. They remember that someone humiliated and shamed them when they reached America.

They Are Not Always Lynched

By PAUL BLANSHARD

THE electric chair at Kilby prison is made of plain wooden timbers painted yellow and it stands in a tiny stone room of the new model penitentiary near Montgomery, Alabama, where the Negro boys convicted of rape in the Scottsboro case are now confined. The prison warden was kind enough to show me how the chair operated after I had visited the death house.

"You see," he said, "I pull this handle here in the next room. I don't see the men die at all. I look at that little hole in the wall and I pull the handle when one of the guards holds up that black disk marked Ready."

The warden did not realize that his yellow-timbered chair has become the focal point of the race struggle in the United States. In that chair, when the white leaders of Alabama say "Ready," ten Negroes may die this winter, the nine boys of the Scottsboro case and Willie Peterson. Of these the most important is Willie Peterson. His case is little known in the North but he has become a symbol of the fight of intelligent Southerners for more even-handed justice to the Negro. This is his story.

On an afternoon last August three white girls from well-to-do families in Birmingham were driving in an automobile along a road in Mountain Brook, a suburb of the city, when a small car containing three Negroes drove up from behind. One of the Negroes jumped on the running board of the girls' car, held a pistol to the head of the girl who was driving, and ordered her to give him any money that she had. Then he directed her to drive the car off the main road into a wooded area, where he held the girls three hours, ranting to them about justice, religion, and race oppression. When he finally became "insulting," one of the girls attempted to take his gun from him, whereupon he opened fire, fatally wounding two of the girls and shooting the third through the arm. The third girl, Miss Nell Williams, survived because she fell to the ground and pretended to be dead. After the Negro had gone, she drove her car with one arm to a nearby house and summoned help. Her sister died that day; the other girl died nine days later from a bullet-shattered spine.

Birmingham the next day was in a craze of excitement. Special posses scoured the country preventing all suspected Negroes from leaving the region and taking servants bodily out of scores of suburban homes for examination. One Negro employee of the Birmingham Electric Company who was alleged to have belittled the crime was taken out that night by two white men and shot through the head. Civic groups offered $3,000 for the apprehension of the murderer, and the following description based upon Nell Williams's recollection was broadcast for use in the search:

The Negro is black, about 35 years of age, between 5 feet 8 and 10 inches tall, and weight between 135 and 145. He has straight long hair, parted on the left side, large brown eyes, lower gold tooth, sunken cheeks, medium voice with Southern accent, pimple below the right corner of mouth, and a staring gaze. He was wearing blue coveralls with thin white stripes, the sleeves were torn at the elbows, and a gray felt hat badly worn.

A score of Negroes were rounded up and paraded before Nell Williams. She declined to identify them. Then seven weeks later, on September 24, while driving down one of the main streets of Birmingham, she saw Willie Peterson walking on the sidewalk and positively identified him as the murderer. He was arrested and rushed to safety in Kilby prison, but death almost claimed him a few days later when he was secretly brought to the Birmingham County jail and Dent Williams, brother of Nell Williams, who had smuggled a pistol into the prison, shot him through the lung. For this offense young Williams has been indicted.

The trial of Peterson came in December. Here was a perfect setting for swift retributive justice. A Negro charged with a crime against Southern white women had been positively identified by one of his victims. The identification was made deliberately, long after the period of hysteria was past. The girl herself, as I heard her testify from the witness stand, appeared calm, poised, and intelligent. Her testimony stood up well under cross-examination. The alibis of Peterson were not very impressive, although he had a good reputation.

But the miracle happened! Willie Peterson was not convicted because there was a reasonable doubt that he was the right man. A white Southern jury did not blindly accept the white woman's word against the black man. It weighed the evidence and disagreed. Rumor has it that the verdict was seven to five for acquittal and that Peterson will get a new trial in January, with the chances for acquittal greater than in the first trial.

The credit for this astonishing result must go not only to Peterson's attorneys but to a young Southern judge, J. Russell McElroy, who was scrupulously fair during the trial, and to the newspapers of Birmingham, which have studiously refrained from appeals to mob hysteria. During the trial no machine-guns were in evidence and no uniformed officers were in the court. Half of the main floor of the courtroom was given to Negroes and half to whites.

Miss Williams had said upon the night of the murder that her assailant was about 5 feet 8 or 10 inches tall and that he weighed 135 to 145 pounds. Peterson answered that description pretty well. Miss Williams said that the murderer had sunken cheeks and a gray, ragged hat. Peterson had thin cheeks and a gray, ragged hat which the police found in his house and which Miss Williams flatly swore was the hat worn by the murderer at the time of the crime. When the prosecuting attorney pointed his finger at Peterson during the trial and asked, "Is that the man who murdered your sister?" Miss Williams's positive answer, "I know it is the man," seemed to seal his fate.

But when Peterson's lawyers, Roach and Johnson, brought on the defense witnesses, three important discrepancies in Miss Williams's testimony became apparent. The police said that she had described her assailant on the night of the murder as a black Negro with straight long hair and a lower gold tooth. The murderer, it is reported, kept pushing his hair back from his forehead. Now, Peterson has no gold filling in his teeth, he is a dark brown rather than a black Negro, and his short closely kinked hair is the kind that even if allowed to grow long would not be described as straight unless it had a huge quantity of Harlem hair oil poured upon it. And if it were heavily oiled it would not keep falling in his face!

The report also persists in Birmingham that Jennie Wood, one of the murdered girls, gave to Wade Wood, her father, shortly before she died, a description of the murderer that would not apply to Willie Peterson. Mr. Wood was not permitted to appear as a witness for the defense and quote this description because of our peculiar laws of evidence.

Apparently these discrepancies in identification have saved Peterson temporarily from the electric chair. A Southern white jury has dared to consider the evidence on its merits and weigh the word of a destitute Negro workingman against a socially prominent white woman.

The full meaning of this event can only be appreciated against the background of race prejudice and sex hysteria which still manifests itself whenever crimes of Negroes against white women are committed. When the recent report upon lynching was made by the Southern Commission on the Study of Lynching, headed by George Fort Milton, the leading Southern newspapers gave it reasonable display and considerable comment, but bitter counter-attacks upon the commission were launched by the Woman's National Association for the Preservation of the White Race. This association has recently issued one of the most stimulating documents of contemporary history under the slogan "God must be the Father and the White Race the Sire of Civilization." It says:

The white race is threatened with extinction. It has become necessary for the white women of the American nation to organize for self preservation. . . .

The white woman has bent her back to the burden of service for her Negro friends and for the race generally. Before and since the war between the States she has ministered to the Negroes in sickness and in health without compensation. The white sister has led in every helpful, uplifting movement, sharing every privilege of hers with the Negro race, helping them in every endeavor, sharing their sorrows, encouraging them onward and upward, and now that same white sister has to sit and listen to bitter denunciations, abuse and hatred of the white woman and her child at every interracial meeting that is held, and read it in every scrap of literature that is in circulation and published by the Negro race. Negro magazines and newspapers for years past have been full of bitterness to white women, and in the past two or three years no insult has been too great to hurl at the white woman and her daughters. The only apparent reason being the desire of the white woman to live her own life, in her own way, without molestation from Negro men, and a desire to keep her descendants the pure strain which God created. . . .

At all these things and conditions we most solemnly protest. We protest at teaching socialism to Negro men, if it teaches them that they have the right to intercept young white women on the highway, as was done in Birmingham, Alabama, and force them into relations to which death is preferable, but to which they must submit or be slain.

No one has a right to force a possibility of unwelcome motherhood upon any woman, or to violate the sacred rights of the human body. We protect our fine chickens, our animals, our birds. We even protect our dogs. In the name of our Heavenly Father let us protect our girls. We select a pedigreed sire for our animals. Future America must not be sired by ■ mongul [sic] black race.

To our law-enforcement officials let us say that the sacred honor of a pure, good woman is as dear to her as is the life of any man. . . .

Let the Negroes stop their determined efforts to corrupt the white race, and their encouragements of assaults upon white women, in their papers, their magazines, in their interracial meetings, and among themselves. . . .

This is the answer of one section of the white population of the South to the long, patient labors of the Interracial Commission. Fortunately it is not the answer of the dominant groups in the cities, for these groups are becoming increasingly sensitive to national criticism.

Nice Story

By PAUL SIFTON

WHEN and if the sentimental halo about the late New York World becomes too thick, I'll remember Arturo Sandoval. Arturo Sandoval got his name in the papers one dull Monday morning after he had snatched ■ purse from a woman as she was leaving St. Malachi's Church. It just happened that a cop was in the crowd descending the steps after mass. Sandoval was arrested on the spot; the woman's pocket-book was returned before anyone could find out whether it contained more than carfare, and Sandoval was hustled to the West Forty-seventh Street Station.

This was some years back, while Coolidge was still jacking up prosperity until he could get from under. Consequently, when Sandoval said he took the purse because he had a wife and four starving children who were due to be put out on the street, the city editors thought it was news. The papers gave Arturo ■ break: "Jobless, Wife, Four Babies Hungry, Snatches Purse on Church Steps."

The presiding genius of the Sunday side needed a "popular" story. He read about poor Sandoval and proceeded to get hot. "It has everything. It sums up modern society. There you are, out of ■ job, family starving, evicted; you steal! Instinct to survive, first law of nature—he's dumb, gets caught. Now they'll soak him! God damn it, let's get on this—maybe they'll let him off easy. Page one, editorial section."

He had a girl reporter at his desk. "Ask the first twenty-five people you meet what they'd do in his place. Do they blame him? Do they think he ought to be punished? Why? Get names."

"Names?" said the girl. She wasn't so dumb.

"Hell, yes, names and addresses. Don't you know you can't use quotes in this paper unless you have names?"

The girl delivered. Twenty-five citizens ranging from lawyers to housewives and an airplane mechanic (he was ■ friend of the girl) bent their minds to the problem. Sandoval was exonerated, by a big majority, of everything but stupidity. To be sure, he could have arranged a murder-and-suicide pact, or gone to the Charity Organization, but he hadn't thought of either. The piece looked so good that the editor, who was a congenital radical anyway, decided to give it another whirl the following week. He called me over.

"Let's get twenty-five names out of 'Who's Who' and put it up to them. They can't get around it. What would they do? They've got to say something. Make 'em talk. We'll get 'em on record as—or else they've got to okay what he did. See?"

I saw. Half his day's work was done. Omitting the painful details of hunting up twenty-five assorted inmates of "Who's Who," making them listen while I told them all about Arturo Sandoval, aged thirty, jobless, wife and four babies starving, landlord hourly threatening eviction, snatches purse from woman as she leaves St. Malachi's Church, it may be said, briefly, that I didn't do as well as the girl.

What would you do if you were a struggling, earnest young reporter who had to ask twenty-five people what they thought of a man with a wife, etc.? Probably about what I finally did—get up a list of persons who had been exposed to reporters before, the good old reliable Leading Citizens.

One was Francis Sisson, the vice-president of the Guaranty Trust Company who dealt with the press. I had interviewed him on some banking subject and could get in. Now, in whimsical desperation, I went to consult him about the man who, etc. At first the proposition rather staggered him, but after I had explained Sandoval's dilemma and my own, he lit a cigarette, leaned back, and philosophized.

"It's curious how it works—this instinct of self-preservation," he said, in effect. "You never can tell how it will come out. You say he'd been sick, couldn't get work, wife sick, four babies, starving, rent overdue, going to be dispossessed. He'd let life get him down. But he had to do something. We're most of us like animals. We can't lie down and starve to death. We are driven to do something. Now, take this Sandoval; he grabbed that pocket-book. Probably he didn't know what he was doing, consciously. Who knows, perhaps the working of his instinct will do something for him; save him, in a roundabout way. What are they going to do with him and his family?"

I said there had been offers of aid and there was a chance that Sandoval might get off easy in court. Sisson put out his hand, palm upward, as if the answer proved his point. It was a nice interview. He knew what he was saying and of course the story did not draw the explicit moral that direct action sometimes had its practical and immediate reward.

Encouraged, I tried to get to Max Steuer, but he was in court. The office of Charles S. Whitman, former District Attorney and Governor, was nearby, so I tried him. The World name admitted me. Whitman couldn't believe his ears. He looked from me to the door and back. I explained the social significance and importance of the problem. He decided not to throw me out. After all, the World was still more or less the World and you never could tell.

"I didn't quite get it straight—the circumstances."

I told him again about Arturo Sandoval. He listened carefully.

"I don't believe it," he said. "Things don't happen that way. Have you seen this Sandoval? How do you know this story is straight?"

I told Whitman I would check on the story. But while I was here I'd get his quotes anyway. "Supposing it is straight, what would you do?"

"It just didn't happen, not that way," said Whitman. "There's always some explanation—"

"But he was broke, the kids—"

"No, I mean something else that made him do it, some unique circumstance, something in his character, his record."

"I'll look him up," I said, and left, minus quotes. I could have ignored Whitman's objection, but by this time I was sore about the assignment. Who was this Arturo Sandoval anyway? Was there a catch in the story?

The address was in West Twenty-third Street, four hundred something. It was a slum building, no names in the hall. I raised the janitor. He didn't know the name. Somebody had been pinched—oh, yes, the cops had been in the basement. A family lived down there in the back. Wops or Spaniards. I could go down.

By lighting matches to get through the basement, I found the door. Cracks of light showed here and there in the thin board partition. When I knocked, all sound stopped inside. I knocked again. After awhile the door opened. A girl not more than twenty-five years old looked out through the half-opened door. She was very pretty.

"Is Arturo Sandoval here?"

Her answer was simply to open the door wide to show me he was not at home. It was a dark, damp place, but clean, a scrap of white curtain at the one blind window and an electric lamp on the low ceiling. Three boys, all under four, were on the floor. The baby was lying on the sagging white iron bed.

I wanted to talk to her husband. Important. Where was he? I made out that he was at the police station. He'd be back at six, she said. I told her I'd be back.

The sergeant at the West Forty-seventh Street Station didn't know me. He kept his lip buttoned. A police card cracked him a little. Sandoval's case had come up. Suspended sentence. I went back to Twenty-third Street.

Sandoval hadn't come home yet. I tried to tell the girl that he had got off. She wiped off a chair and I sat down. In about five minutes Sandoval came. He was short, about five feet four, probably 145 pounds. Maybe less. His wife pointed to me without a word. His excitement sagged and he was tired and hunted. We sat down. I asked him how it happened. With the meek, helpless obedience of the shamed poor, he told me from the beginning. The published account was straight, as far as it went.

Sandoval's story went back to the time when he had a good job making coffee in the window of a restaurant in Canal Street, five years ago, when he came from Venezuela. His father had money, not much, but a big house and a business in Maracaibo. He wrote out the name. If he could get back, his father would help him. Well, after the job on Canal Street, he had a couple of others, then he got a good job in a chocolate factory on Ninth Avenue—seventeen dollars a week.

His English was very sketchy. I had to make him repeat. Now he seemed to get excited and it was harder to follow him. Last summer he had an accident. His leg, he was in a hospital—very bad, six weeks. When he got out he couldn't go back to work at the chocolate factory, no job for him. At first I had the impression that the accident occurred in the factory. Possibly it was his fault and that was why he couldn't get back. No, it wasn't that way at all. The factory was nice place, but no jobs. No, he had been hit by a truck. He tried to demonstrate. He pulled his trouser leg above his knee to show me the scarred flesh, still blue and livid, streaked where it had been stitched.

It began to look like a good story: genesis of a crime, ambitious young immigrant, works hard, loyal wife, healthy children, steady job, contented; hard luck, hit by speeding truck, hospital, no wages, loses job—what else? Why didn't he go home? He would if he had $300. He said it as if it were a million. I led him to tell of the time between his discharge from hospital and his arrest. He couldn't get a good job. He washed dishes—dollar and a half a day—working nights, too—but he couldn't pay the rent, buy food. Four weeks ago the baby had come.

I asked him why he grabbed the purse. He looked at me and stopped talking. "I don't know. Why you ask me? How should I know? On Saturday the landlord he say 'Pay me or you get out.' I can't sleep. I go out. Then I do it. How should I know?"

That was all right. It could be worked up. I went back to the accident. That was the key. If he hadn't been hurt he would still be making chocolate.

Didn't he get damages? Who paid for the hospital? The company. What company? The truck. What truck? What about damages, how did it happen, anyway? Was it his fault? No, no, it was like this. He showed me, diagramming a street crossing with his hands. They hit him. It was the truck's fault.

I wanted him to stick to the point about the truck. Perhaps there was a hook-up—maybe the people who owned the truck could be made to cough up damages. Use a little publicity on them. The World had come out strong against reckless driving, the death toll of the automobile.

Had he tried to get damages? Yes, he had a lawyer. The lawyer said $200. He would get half, but it took a long time. Sandoval had just been to see him again. Better and better—an ambulance chaser! Fifty per cent! The Evening World was death on those birds. I got the lawyer's name. This was getting hot. It hooked up all the way round. Nice story!

Now I wanted the name of the truck. Whose truck was it? I hoped it was some big firm. He was very excited, as if he didn't want to give me the name. He said something, as far as I could make out, about me and the World. Sure I was from the World. Maybe we could get some money for him—I had an idea—make the company that owned the truck kick through with enough money to ship him back to Venezuela. Was he sure $300 would cover the whole family? It sounded incredible. Yes, he was sure. Three hundred and he could go home. All right, now what was the name of the company, the truck, you know, that hit you? We'll make them tickled to death to put up!

Three words emerged from a stream of talk, mostly in Spanish: "New York World."

"Yes, I'm on the World," I said, impatiently. "I told you that before. What was the name of the company? I'm trying to help you. Who owned the truck?"

"New York World."

"Yes, sure, but—" I stopped and he repeated.

"New York World truck. He hit me."

The Sunday impresario was shocked. He agreed that something should be done. The World could put up another hundred, together with the damages, and generously ship the Sandoval family back to Venezuela—before Hearst, or the Daily News, or Sandoval's lawyer should start exploiting the fact that the man the World had been jerking tears over had been driven to purse-snatching as the direct result of being hit by a World truck and because he had to wait months for settlement of his claim for damages.

The Sunday editor went down to hit up Ralph Pulitzer for the money. He came back shortly and told me to take the matter up with the Bureau of Accuracy and Fair Play. Pulitzer, it seemed, just couldn't do anything about it. The Bureau of Accuracy and Fair Play, after telephoning the lawyers to make sure Sandoval had a claim, explained the impossibility of doing anything for him. Trucks were insured against such claims. The surety company settled everything. The World couldn't interfere. It would set a bad precedent. As I understood it, to have made any move to give Sandoval a cent would have been practically immoral and legally indecent. As for the ambulance chaser getting half of the $200, well, it was too bad, but such contingent fees were not so unusual as one might think.

And so Arturo Sandoval didn't get $300 compensation for being knocked out of his good job in the chocolate factory, and the World passed up a chance to shrive its soul while performing a small but spectacular act of decency that would have added up in the cash register in respect, goodwill, and the public's blind faith, without which no newspaper can long endure.

Oh yes, in the story the following Sunday the circumstances of the accident and its results were included, but the name of the company owning the truck was not given.

In the Driftway

"MAN must work." Last week the Drifter stated his credo, in spite of the fact that his own profession is drifting. As if in support of his thesis, he received a letter from a Chicago lawyer. It quoted the following sentence from the memorial services for a deceased justice of our Supreme Court:

Judge Farmer in his early youth acquired the habit of industry. He appreciated the importance of constant employment and never indulged in any form of idleness. He never acquired the habit of taking an occasional rest from his work for the purpose of recreation. To him, to be happy was to be engaged in some useful occupation.

From this melancholy picture the Drifter turns away. He need hardly say that such a life of bee-like industry was not what he meant. In the lively New Yorker he remembers reading a sketch of Herbert Hoover which described the President's day as one that began with a serious game of medicine ball at 7 a. m. and proceeded by regular stages of labor to his retirement at a late hour. He read his mail from 9 to 9:15 a. m. He ate his lunch from 12:40 to 1:10. Even after he had gone to bed he kept on working, for he would often—or so the article declared—rise from his couch after midnight and read some instructive and uplifting tome.

IF this is true of President Hoover, the Drifter is sorry for him. Quite the opposite, so the legend runs, was the case with his predecessor. Mr. Coolidge, it seems, wandered down to the Executive Offices around ten o'clock in the morning and beat a leisurely retreat about four. When documents were handed to him for consideration, the rule was that they should be accompanied by an abstract prepared by a secretary, who, being a wage-slave, had nothing to do but read them through. Mr. Hoover reads them himself. The sad part about this heavy industriousness is that it rarely produces appropriate results. Mr. Hoover might read his days and nights through, and he would still lack the acumen that makes a successful politician. Politics, however, are far afield from drifting. When the Drifter declares that man must work, he does not mean that he must be blindly and owlishly occupied at a desk eighteen hours a day, that he must eschew leisure, shun vacations, and despise play. The ideal life of toil, of course, is drifting. Let no one imagine that a drifter spends his days rocking on the back porch. He must get out and see the world; he must walk, ride, swim, fly; he must read books, papers, billboards, and advertisements; he must talk to the butcher, baker, candlestick maker, and editor; he must taste all foods, sip all drinks; try his hand at all occupations. He must be always busy but never at work.

THIS is as far as possible from the poor unfortunates who have no work to do and therefore no money on which to live. Their lack of occupation leads to hunger, cold, and suffering. Nor does it cover the listless and pointless inactivity of those whose hands are idle because their brains are dead. Man must work. He must work to eat and be clothed; he must work for shelter, for love, for his children; he must work for his immortal soul. But as soon as he lets himself be ruled by pure busyness for its own sake, he is lost. He is forever rolling the stone uphill and never reaching the top.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Hands Off Nicaraguan Elections

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The plan announced by the State Department to withdraw all United States marines from Nicaragua before the end of 1932 makes it particularly important that the presidential elections of October, 1932, which apparently will be supervised by United States forces, shall see as candidates the country's strongest men—men who if they attain power can command some considerable measure of popular support. Prominent members, however, of both the Conservative and the Liberal Party, as well as Americans long resident in the country, informed me during a recent visit that State Department approval must necessarily be one important factor in determining the choice of candidates. It is common opinion in Nicaragua that the parties there will not be left free in making their nominations, but must select a candidate who is known to be persona grata to the United States legation.

In the past, unfortunately, State Department approval has fallen on men like Adolfo Díaz, to cite only one example, who in spite of, or perhaps because of, a pro-intervention attitude amounting to servility did not command sufficient support in Nicaragua itself to maintain himself in power unaided. Consequently, when threatened with opposition, he called for the landing of United States marines, involving the United States in an intervention which has proved costly in lives, money, and prestige. Past experience, therefore, suggests that the injection of State Department influence in the choice of Nicaraguan candidates has not proved ultimately beneficial either to Nicaragua or to the United States, and that in the 1932 campaign also it may have unfortunate results.

For these reasons, many Nicaraguans feel that a declaration from the Department of State (to which of course the policy of the Managua legation would conform) making clear the interest of the United States government in the complete freedom of party nominations, those of minority political groups as well as of the two historic parties, would materially forward the possibility of candidates being selected for their ability and political strength in Nicaragua, rather than for their supposed skill in courting the favor of the United States legation in Managua.

Many with whom I talked during this last visit—Conservatives, Liberals, and Nationalists—believe that to permit a more accurate expression of the popular will in the 1932 presidential elections, more reasonable provisions should be adopted relative to the formation of third parties, eliminating the literacy provision for petitions, and probably reducing the required percentage of signatures from 10 per cent to 5 per cent, which latter figure was that fixed in the 1923 electoral law, drafted by the American expert, H. W. Dodds. In the determination of these points State Department influence, through the machinery of election supervision, is expected to be decisive.

CHARLES A. THOMSON

San José, Costa Rica, December 1

On to Russia!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: This is a protest against the useless practice of dragging our feet because the train is going the wrong way. In my opinion every progressive-minded individual interested in world advancement should migrate to Russia and work for the only system which has discarded the profit motive. There is now a definite best to be chosen among the governments of the world.

It is an atrocious waste of energy in this country to plan and work constantly for palliatives that go unheeded. The profit motive and big business are entwined in an inextricable manner in every phase of our life—education, literature, art, government, law, medicine; even incorruptible science, according to F. J. Schlink, has become a myth. What good does it do in progressive education for us to develop the social motive when the children are surrounded by a competitive world? The system must go first. All thinking and informed men agree pretty well on what should be done if one of them became dictator. However, the Hoover Administration goes right on raising the tariff and preparing for war. Ramsay MacDonald could not do much in Great Britain; Norman Thomas as President would be sunk in the maelstrom of politics. You can't buck the system! Why don't we act on this principle. Let's all join hands and go to Russia.

Today freedom and democracy are phantoms. Russia has the greatest freedom possible, namely: You can say what you like as long as you keep on working for us. Bertrand Russell has shown in his latest book that a scientific society—or any competent organization, for that matter—cannot allow internal discord if it is to keep on running. It is the duty of a citizen of the world to support the most enlightened oligarchy, the most efficient and humanitarian system. The best to be found is in Russia, a country run by trained experts, and one where the moving power is cooperation.

Ross, Cal., December 22

MARGARET F. GUTELIUS

Let's All Guide the Revolution!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The height of the absurdity to which the liberal attitude can lead individuals is amusingly—no, tragically—illustrated in the advertisement of the L. I. D. Student Conferences in The Nation for December 23. "Guiding the Revolution"! Oh, yeah? The "superior brains" of the country, now living softly at Harvard or Vassar or Union Theological Seminary, will spend some of their leisure in determining in which direction it is best that the "revolution" should go. Fortunately, they are kidding themselves. The international bankers are guiding the revolution. Ramsay MacDonald, the liberal, kids himself into thinking that he is, but he only succeeds in postponing the day of its coming. Think of Gandhi asking the intelligentsia of Bombay and Calcutta to attend a conference with that for a topic; or imagine Lenin in 1916 issuing an advertisement calling a conference during "Christmas vacation" with the topic for discussion "Guiding the Revolution"!

Troy, N. Y., December 31

ARTHUR M. ALLEN

Banks and Bonds

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is a felony for a borrower to make a false statement to a bank for the purpose of securing credit. Why shouldn't it also be a felony for a bank to make a false statement to a depositor for the purpose of securing deposits? It seems to me that the ruling of the Treasury Department permitting banks to carry bonds on their books at par instead of market value is dishonest, since the bank statement would not present a true picture of the condition of the bank.

We are told that confidence is the crying need just now and the way to gain that confidence is to put all the cards on the table.

Zanesville, Ohio, December 12

CLARK T. NORRIS

Thanks for Looking Your Wife in the Eye

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I read Mr. Amos Pinchot's article in The Nation of December 16 with much satisfaction and some glee. It is encouraging and refreshing to have someone speak out as plainly as The Nation does. These are parlous times. Keep up the good work.

New York, December 23

HARFORD T. MARSHALL

"Saw Children Barefoot in Snow"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I ask you to publish the inclosed telegram from James Myers, Industrial Secretary, Federal Council of Churches, regarding the urgent need of clothing and food in the bituminous coal fields:

TOUR OF INSPECTION COAL FIELDS WEST VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY REVEALS ALARMING NEED AT LEAST TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND CHILDREN FOOD AND WARM CLOTHING. THOUSANDS UNABLE ATTEND SCHOOL. SAW CHILDREN BAREFOOT IN SNOW. SOME EVICTED FAMILIES LIVING IN TENTS. SICKNESS WILL TAKE TOLL UNLESS CLOTHES FOR ALL AGES SUPPLIED AT ONCE ESPECIALLY CHILDREN'S CLOTHING AND SHOES ALSO WARM BLANKETS QUILTS. HOT LUNCHESES SERVED BY QUAKERS MANY SCHOOLS ALREADY SHOW RESULTS IMPROVED HEALTH. THOUSANDS PRE-SCHOOL CHILDREN AND BABIES WITHOUT MILK. MORE MONEY NEEDED AT ONCE AS WINTER WEATHER GRIPS MOUNTAIN REGIONS. PLEASE SEND OUT WIDE APPEAL URGENT.—JAMES MYERS.

Clothing should be shipped (prepaid) from the East to American Friends Service Committee, 1515 Cherry Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and from the West to American Friends Service Committee, Morgantown, West Virginia.

Checks should be made out and mailed to Olive Van Horn, Treasurer, Coal Areas Relief, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City. All funds will be forwarded to the American Friends Service Committee (Quakers) for relief in the field.

New York, December 29

OLIVE VAN HORN

Contributors to This Issue

MORRIS L. ERNST, ■ New York attorney, is the author of "America's Primer."

GEORGE HORNE is ■ ship-news reporter on a New York paper.

PAUL BLANSHARD is the executive director of the City Affairs Committee of New York.

PAUL SIFTON is coauthor with Claire Sifton of the play "1931," recently produced by the Group Theater.

HAL SAUNDERS WHITE is in the English department of Washington Square College, New York University.

GRANVILLE HICKS is assistant professor of English at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute.

CUTHBERT WRIGHT is the author of "The Story of the Catholic Church."

MARK VAN DOREN is the author of "Jonathan Gentry."

HORACE GREGORY is author of ■ translation of Catullus.

JEROME ROSENTHAL has contributed articles on philosophical subjects to the Bookman, Current History, and the Thinker.

Finance Shall We "Inflate"?

STUDENTS of the depression and of the government measures for relieving it now under discussion are commenting with guarded approval on the "mild inflation" which most of these measures contemplate. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is expected to provide some half-billion dollars of Treasury money to aid distressed railroads and banks, while additional amounts are to be appropriated, according to present plans, for easing the pressure on existing mortgage institutions, urban and rural. In this program of government aid are discerned the seeds of a moderate and hence beneficial inflation.

The word has numerous definitions, but its present use conforms to none of them, nor to the practical probabilities of the case. Since a considerable number of people are apparently pinning their hopes of business recovery and an advance in stock-market prices on this so-called inflationary policy, it will be worth while to consider the term with some care and note wherein it differs from the kind of credit emission now proposed. Without attempting to be over-precise or all-inclusive, it may be said that inflation connotes the creation of credit at a more rapid rate than the output of commodities and services, resulting in a rise in prices. The essential point is that the credit created shall be used directly as purchasing power.

It seems to be plain enough that the credit which it is proposed to create under the various relief plans would have no such direct use. What is intended, thus far, is that government obligations, in one form or another, shall take the place of corporate or other private obligations. Thus, a bank owning "frozen" but presumably sound foreign bonds will present them to the government lending institution and obtain a loan on them, the funds for that loan having been obtained through the sale of government bonds or notes to other banks or the public. The fact that no new purchasing power is directly created is plainly shown if we assume that the frozen foreign bonds thus disposed of by the distressed bank were purchased from an individual, who uses the funds thus obtained to buy the government bonds involved in the triangular transaction. The money loaned to the bank could become purchasing power, but is far more likely to become merely additional reserves.

This is something very different from the inflation which raises commodity and security prices. Inflation of this sort, it may be said, flows from one of two sources—confidence or fear. We are familiar enough with the type which springs from confidence, the latest example of it having occurred in the period of several years culminating in October, 1929. The confidence underlying such a movement consists in the feeling of certainty that business profits or speculative gains will prove sufficient to pay off the debts incurred. When such a mass of credit is created that payment become difficult or impossible, we have collapse and "deflation." The other type, originating in fear, comes into play when increasing numbers of people become convinced that the currency passing through their hands is headed for depreciation or ultimate worthlessness through the issue of increasing amounts of irredeemable paper money by the government. The old German mark furnished ■ classic example.

In the United States, as 1932 begins, we are displaying neither of the two opposite symptoms of incipient inflation and a rise in prices. Considerable doses of credit are apparently to be administered to business, but they will differ from the great voluntary drafts we have known in the past, much as the teaspoonful of whiskey given to a sick man differs from the potatoes of a festive evening.

S. PALMER HARMAN

Unusual people with unusual tastes

MEET IN THE NATION

Unusual Shops with unusual things to sell

Write for rates.

20 Vesey Street

Books and Drama

I Taught the Angel

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

I taught the angel of my will
To walk upon this sunny hill.

Trailing the fire of his wings
Disdainful over juniper
He dainty stepped for nettle stings
And beggars'-lice and dock-weed burr.

I coaxed him with wild strawberries
And the white roots of grass to eat
And though he was not full at ease
For memory of worlds unwon
I led him to a grassy seat
And he sat down like anyone.

I taught the angel of my will
To sit in sunshine on this hill.

For he was weary of his wings
And only half resented me
When I unstrapped the silly things
And buckled on humility.

Japanese Imperialism

Japan: An Economic and Financial Appraisal. By Harold G. Moulton. Washington: The Brookings Institution. $4.

The Japanese Population Problem. By W. R. Crocker. The Macmillan Company. $4.

Japan's Special Position in Manchuria. By C. Walter Young. The Johns Hopkins Press. $3.

The International Legal Status of the Kwantung Leased Territory. By C. Walter Young. The Johns Hopkins Press. $2.25.

Japanese Jurisdiction in the South Manchuria Railway Areas. By C. Walter Young. The John Hopkins Press. $3.

British Far Eastern Policy. By R. Stanley McCordock. Columbia University Press. $6.

HERE are six excellent volumes dealing directly or indirectly with the Japanese problem in the Far East. There is a Japanese problem. Let there be no doubt about that. And history may show that it is far graver and more portentous than the Chinese or Manchurian problem. Each of these four writers makes a substantial contribution to our understanding of the background and development of Japanese imperialism. Each approaches his special field in a wholly objective manner. There is no attempt in any of these books to prove or disprove the existence of a Japanese imperialist policy, or to attempt to criticize or justify that policy. Indeed, it is clear that not one of the writers had Japanese imperialism especially in mind when he set to work in his particular field. But we have nevertheless obtained from them a comprehensive, yet simple, explanation of the factors behind Japan's Drang nach Westen. In addition, we have in Dr. Young's three volumes an accurate survey of Japanese operations and the Japanese position in Manchuria.

For the general reader Dr. Young's three volumes are a great improvement over his earlier work, "The International Relations of Manchuria," which was a specialized digest of the various negotiations, agreements, and treaties affecting the Three Eastern Provinces. Unhappily, he pays only scant attention to the economic background of either the Manchurian or the Japanese problem, which, of course, is the key to Japanese activities on the mainland of Asia. He sometimes forgets that the endless quarrels over the railways, the Kwantung lease, political jurisdiction, the 1915 treaties, and the rest are merely surface quarrels, arising from what Mr. Crocker in another connection has called the "accidents of strategy." These controversies are but outward expressions of the real imperialist contradiction that lies far deeper than any dispute over the financing or operation of a railway in Manchuria.

In the work of Professor Moulton and Mr. Crocker we get that economic and social background which is necessary to a more complete understanding of Dr. Young's splendid survey. Professor Moulton regales us with innumerable statistics concerning Japanese economics and finance, a goodly proportion of which are presented here in print for the first time. His book is without question the best reference work of its kind at present available. It is especially valuable for the analysis of Japan's international debt and investment position (which will largely control the lengths to which Japan can go in enforcing its policy in Manchuria) and for the numerous statistical tables contained in its two appendixes. After a most unfortunate opening chapter in which he absurdly attempts to play the role of political prophet, Mr. Crocker discusses clearly and convincingly the pressure of overpopulation upon Japan's food supply, industry, foreign trade, and social relationships. He sees in the overpopulation of a country with as meager economic resources as has Japan the danger of a social explosion should there be no effective relief by way of steady emigration during the next several decades. His work has also an excellent bibliography on the general subject of Japan.

At first glance it would appear that Dr. McCordock's book has little to do with the Japanese problem. But it must not be forgotten that Japan, besides having aspirations of its own, has inherited the British imperialist policy in the northern Pacific area. When England allied itself with Japan in 1902 it confessed that it was unable to check Russian aggression without assistance. Twenty years later, at the Washington conference, the British formally surrendered their imperialist policy in the northern area to the Japanese. Thus Japan in a large sense is carrying forward much of the British policy discussed here by Dr. McCordock.

It is relatively simple to explain Japanese imperialism. It is based in minor part upon the comparative scarcity of home-grown foodstuffs which are needed to keep an already large Japanese population from starvation—Japan proper, with an area approximating that of West Virginia, and with a good deal of that area untillable mountain land, has a population of more than 64,000,000. But in greater measure Japanese imperialism finds its motivating force in a lack of domestic mineral resources, particularly iron ore. Without an adequate supply of iron and fuel, or without free and immediate access to such a supply, Japan can never hope to become or remain that great industrial state of which her leaders have dreamed since 1868, and to which position she must attain (she has not yet reached the goal) if she would have the capitalist states of the West regard her as one of themselves. Hence she has set out upon the high road of exploitation and colonization that Karl Marx called the "brute-force" route to capitalist accumulation. Marx pointed out that Spain, Portugal, Holland, France, and England all employed "the power of the state, the concentrated and organized force of society, to hasten, hothouse fashion, the process of transformation of the feudal mode of production into the capitalist mode, and to shorten the transition." But if this was true of the earlier imperialist Powers, it has been more especially true of Japan, as its history in the last sixty-three years so pointedly shows.

Unlike the United States, where colonial exploitation has been left to private initiative, although with the full understanding that the exploiters would have the support of the government whenever necessary, but very much like France, a country that closely resembles Japan in its intensely nationalistic outlook, Japan has exercised virtually complete governmental control over colonial exploitation and investments abroad. Private greed has not been without its influence on this policy, of course, as Dr. Moulton suggests on pages 304 and 305 of his book. But on the whole individual entrepreneurs and investors have had to subordinate their own ends to the larger goal of the state. Particularly with regard to minerals has this been the case. In "World Minerals and World Politics," C. K. Leith declared that the "Japanese government keenly realizes its lack of raw materials, and the acquirement of minerals is one of the cardinal features of its foreign policy." The government is very active in the development of the domestic iron-and-steel industry. It is directly associated in the exploitation of the mineral resources of Japan proper, certain sections of China, Formosa, and Sakhalin Island. It owns and controls the South Manchuria Railway, and by virtue of the collateral privileges attaching to the original Russo-Chinese railway agreement it controls the coal and oil deposits in the Fuchun district and the iron ore in the Anshan district of Manchuria. Thus it may readily be seen what emphasis the government places upon iron ore and fuel as essential factors in Japan's imperialistic development. It is unfortunate for the political and territorial integrity of China that Japan has had to go to Manchuria for so much of its iron and fuel. The present controversy in Manchuria, though ostensibly a dispute over railway rights and political treaties, is actually a consequence of that compelling economic necessity.

There is still another angle of Japanese imperialism that needs careful exploration. No writer has yet attempted the task of inquiring into the purely military aspects of Japanese policy in such a way as to make the program of the militarists really intelligible. In speaking before the Council on Foreign Relations last winter, Secretary Stimson sought to excuse American activity in Central America and the Caribbean area partly on the ground that the present position of the United States in that region must be maintained in the interest of national security. The same excuse can be advanced with regard to Japan's position on the Asiatic mainland. The military problems here involved are tremendous; all of Northern Asia as far west as Lake Baikal is level and open; this section offers no natural defenses whatever for Japan or for Japanese holdings in Korea and Manchuria; it would be but logical, from the standpoint of the Japanese nationalists, to desire to have this stretch of territory brought under Japanese control. A military program with this in view must exist. There was a hint of it in various public utterances of the later Premier Tanaka, and again in the infamous Twenty-one Demands. There was more than a hint of it in Japanese activities in Siberia during the Allied intervention of 1918-20. The Japanese poured 72,000 troops into Siberia; they spent more than $450,000,000 on this adventure; their forces reached all the way from Vladivostok to Lake Baikal—but their aggressive interest stopped short of the mountains in the vicinity of Lake Baikal. Beyond these mountains, beyond this natural defense, they did not care to look. Let someone inquire into this question and we may learn that there is something more than economic pressure behind Japan's Drang nach Westen.

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

False Start

American Writers on American Literature. Edited by John Macy. Horace Liveright. $5.

MR. MACY has collected thirty-seven essays on American literature. That is all the book is—a collection of essays. Though "all the more important figures in American letters are treated," the book presents neither a comprehensive account nor a consistent interpretation of American literature. Mr. Macy has merely brought together "a diversified group of collaborators" and "left them free to treat their subjects in their own ways."

As is inevitable in such a collection, the essays are uneven, some good and some bad, some fresh and some familiar, some objective and some personal. Most of them are fairly good, but Louis Bromfield's Hawthorne, Llewellyn Jones's Contemporary Fiction, and one or two others are downright bad. Most of them are reasonably fresh, but a few of them, like Raymond Weaver's Melville and Louis Untermeyer's Contemporary Poetry, merely rehearse facts and opinions that their authors have published elsewhere. Most of the writers are objective, but Hamlin Garland delivers a lecture on the state of literary morals, William Allen White makes a plea for the writers of the eighties, and James Oppenheim airs his rather bizarre views of psychology. If one were to announce an honor roll, it would certainly include Rupert Hughes's essay on the Revolutionary writers, Alfred Stanford's Cooper, Robert Morss Lovett's Lowell, Robert Herrick's Henry James, and George F. Whicher's Poetry After the Civil War. But by far the greater number of the contributors are competent or better than competent, though those who discuss the literature of the twentieth century seem less obviously adequate than the majority of the others.

In short, the book is, of its kind, as good as could be expected. What one objects to is the kind. The truth is that we have had enough essays and collections of essays on American literature. What we need is a comprehensive and consistent interpretation of that literature. Parrington has come closer than anyone else to giving us one; but "Main Currents in American Thought" suffers because it is so much more than a history of literature, because the author's literary taste was by no means reliable, and because his liberalism frequently blurred his vision. Nevertheless, Parrington showed the way, making clear the value of finding a point of view and sticking to it. That is why his "Main Currents" is so much more valuable than the "Cambridge History." That is, indeed, why Mr. Macy's own bit of pioneering, his "Spirit of American Literature," has a kind of historical importance that this collection of essays can never have.

On the other hand, it must be admitted that Macy is right when he says in his introduction that no individual can master the entire field of American literature. That is why we must expect to have an increasing number of collective enterprises. But the collective enterprise, whatever its quantitative advantages, cannot surpass, cannot even equal, the individual effort unless it is genuinely collective. If the collaborators have a common point of view, then their product will be not only comprehensive and accurate but also unified and interpretative.

What point of view, someone may ask, would serve? Any point of view, one might answer, and with some truth. But we need not leave the question there. It is to be observed that very few of Mr. Macy's authors manage to write their essays without discussing the American scene. Surely even Mr. Macy, who is distressed because critics of a certain school will not permit him to read about Mark Twain or Walt Whitman without becoming "entangled in economics and philosophy," will grant that if critics are to discuss American life they ought to know something about it. Many of his contributors seem to know very little indeed. It may be suggested, then, that the desired point of view must permit an understanding of economic and historical processes as well as literary values. Where are we to find such an attitude? One answer to this query, adopted by a gradually increasing number of critics, is based on the doctrines of Marx and his followers. Some day, when the number is large enough, these critics may band together and try the systematic application of their attitude to the field of American literature. Such a venture will demonstrate, I am convinced, just how superficial and unimportant "American Writers on American Literature" really is.

GRANVILLE HICKS

The Greatest French Poet

A Season in Hell: The Life of Arthur Rimbaud. By Jean-Marie Carré. Translated by Hannah and Matthew Josephson. The Macaulay Company. $3.

SOMEONE for whose opinion I have respect once said to me of Rimbaud, the boy who wrote the bulk of his poetry in his sixteenth year, deserting all literature with horror and disgust at eighteen: "It is not really his poetry which charms you into penning titles like the one above, but rather the circumstances of his extraordinary life." Mr. Josephson, in his excellent preface to this biography, shares, apparently, my friend's sentiment. "Genius of poetry," says he, "though he undoubtedly was, the most beautiful and enigmatic thing of all Rimbaud did was certainly his own life." And again: "His life had a dreadful beauty." The biographer himself agrees with his translator, for he has told and told well the tale of Rimbaud's qualifications for the martyrology of artists, but he has also said remarkably little about Rimbaud's art. Since I myself have written no fewer than five times of Rimbaud's life, I will limit myself here to his poetry.

In other words, the three problems which so constantly agitate Rimbaudians—those of his precise relationship with Verlaine, his desertion of literature, the reality of his deathbed reversion to his childhood's religion—do not, in this brief notice, interest me at all. As regards the first of these one can only say non probatum, adding that a boy who deliberately sets out (at fifteen) "to become a seer by a long, immense derangement of all the senses" might well include perversion within that dérèglement without this fact being a forty years' wonder for two generations of pious scribes. As regards the second, the poet has explained himself in "Un Saison en Enfer." As regards the third, the last word on the subject was uttered, not by Paterne Berrichon, nor by the present French Ambassador to the United States, but by the old chaplain who attended Arthur in his death agony long ago, when he said to Isabelle Rimbaud: "Your brother has faith, mon enfant; what were you telling us just now? He has faith such as I have never beheld before."

As for his work, it has been too much approached from the psychologic, or rather psychopathic, standpoint. It would be interesting, for instance, if some talented scholar like Professor Lowes would do for the boy's reading what Professor Lowes has done for that of Coleridge, showing how little of Rimbaud's poetry is properly comprehensible without reference to what he read before the year 1870. Incidentally the great crisis in modern French history—namely, Sedan and the Commune—coincided with the crisis in Rimbaud's development, with his great year as a lyric poet. Nor was he unaffected by these events; witness the terrible poem beginning:

Société! Tout est rétabli: les orgies
Pleurent leur ancien rôle aux anciens lupanars . . .

When all is reestablished after the depression, doubtless we should have our Rimbaud, but we shall not get him. "Shall we dare," as Mr. Josephson writes harmoniously, "to begin at the horizons where he expired?"

In a curious page of literary history, written at sixteen, Rimbaud himself judges his nation from the standpoint of poetic art. "Nothing has existed in poetry," he says with juvenile arrogance, "since the time of the Greeks." (At that time Rimbaud knew nothing of Shakespeare, Milton, Byron, and other English romantics, only hearing of these last when he was feverishly learning English, a year or so later, in the alcoholic company of Verlaine.) Most authors, he continues, are mere egoists, who are authors by profession because authorship gives them the opportunity to employ the first person singular the maximum number of occasions in print. Then follows the famous "seer" passage, the "long, immense derangement of all the senses," etc. "Other horrible workers," he concludes, "will begin at the very horizons in sight of which he expired." Such was Rimbaud's theory of "poetic inspiration."

The results of the theory can be interestingly studied in that chapter of M. Carré's life entitled The Death of Chimeras. The results were, on one hand, several examples of the most absolute poetry to be found in any tongue, and on the other "a season in hell," companioned by such strange associates as alcohol, drugs, vagabondage, possible perversion, and the society of M. Paul Verlaine, all encountered at the critical age of sixteen to seventeen. The result, in a word, was the death, poetically speaking, of the poet. Rimbaud's sin was that heroic and mysterious one, the sin against the Holy Ghost perhaps, of attempting to take heaven by storm. His work during those three years (1870-73) was, according to the expression of Duhamel, "a violent abbreviation of the history of literature; in three years he had passed through the entire literary evolution of modern times." "In his progress toward the impossible," M. Carré concludes, "he touched madness, and suddenly sobering, stopped short." It was high time, and the sequel is that Rimbaud eventually became a commercial agent, and was reconciled with the Catholic church on his deathbed at Marseilles.

It was Rimbaud's aim to realize within himself an absolute and burning unity which should express itself wholly in his art. By 1873 he had already discovered the impossibility of this horrible ideal. "I have said God. I want liberty in salvation," he cries poignantly in "A Season in Hell." But we are not, psychologically, a unity, but a whole colony. There is the athletic self, the animal self, the intellectual self, the poetic self, the religious self, and so on. "In the rich counterpoint of life," Mr. Huxley has written, "each separate melody plays its indispensable part. The diapason closes full in the complete man." It was Rimbaud's tragedy that, great seer though he was, he never quite seemed to understand this desirable polytheism, or polyphony if you will, of the human being. No, one of his selves must be prepared for the profession of letters by a long, deliberate "derangement," and the other selves must be lopped and mutilated in the process. Because, when he had hardly traversed the crisis of puberty, he was exposed to a prolonged hang-over, made up of narcotics, alcohol, and Verlaine, he must abandon literature, beauty, and love. Because there was in him both a pagan and a Christian (and heaven knows how many other things also), the Christian must not gain the mastery until the bitter end. Obviously this boy was a truly tormented being as well as a very great poet. It might have been better for him (though not for the surréaliste sect) if he had never seen Paris. There is an early poem, written at fifteen, the first lines of which I am quoting in conclusion:

Par les soirs bleus d'été, j'irai dans les sentiers,
Picoté par les blés, fouler l'herbe menue;
Rêveur, j'en sentirai la fraîcheur à mes pieds,
Je laisserai le vent baigner ma tête nue.

Among the many selves in Rimbaud there was one to which in his fashion he was true, the nature that bore him. Again Mr. Huxley has put it better than anyone else in one of his philosophic essays: "I like the moist, still, earthy perfume of the flowers on the growing plant that has its roots deep burrowing and darkly living in the soil!"

CUTHBERT WRIGHT

Forty Farmers

Men of Earth. By Russell Lord. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

MR. LORD relates that the United States Department of Agriculture once sent its best photographer out over the country with instructions to bring in pictures of real farmers—all kinds, caught in representative poses. He does not add, as he might, that the department should have sent him also, with instructions to bring in literary likenesses which could serve as accompanying texts. For all one knows, that is the destiny reserved for the chapters in this admirable book. Mr. Lord, who went at the command of a magazine to study forty farmers on their farms, came back with sketches which certainly make their originals clear, which certainly make them interesting, and which in themselves are literature of a valuable kind. The American farmer has been much written about in his time, but seldom has he been studied to better effect than he is here, or by a better writer.

Mr. Lord, himself brought up in the country, was educated in agriculture and has spent his whole adult life thinking and writing about the contemporary American farmer. So of necessity he is much interested in a certain transitional aspect which this person now presents. He is interested, that is to say, in the tendency, or the fate, of the farmer to become an industrialist. Many of his pages are devoted in consequence to corporate farming, to large-scale machine methods, and to individuals in the Middle or Far West who see a future which shall be nothing at all like the past. He records, for instance, the opinion of M. L. Wilson, Montana prophet of the new wholesale day, that there will come a time when "the fellow who's simply farming to have a home in the country can't stand the pace." He listens to H. P. Miller, Ohio corporate farmer, saying to his neighbors: "We'll come and farm your fields for you. We'll crop for you in the same way that threshermen have always come in and threshed for you. Plant, cultivate, harvest—the whole business." And he keeps everywhere in the foreground the picture of an America which before long may be as organized and mechanized between its cities as it is within them.

But that is not his whole story, nor is it, one can imagine, the part of it which really interests him most. Without any sentimentality of the sort that wishes to recall the century of Currier and Ives, Mr. Lord is still possessed of a great affection for the kind of farm which supports a family, affords an absorbing existence for all of its members, creates in them a definite character, and in short provides what nothing else in modern America provides—a home. He has respect for the special wisdom which a good farmer must have. "I," he says, "am the sort of man whose mind stops at his collar. A good farmer must be smart all over." When he comes to enumerate the blessings of country life he does not bother about fresh air and the smell of the soil. Those are the things city people talk about. Mr. Lord speaks rather of the pride which a man may take in "(1) owning land and a home; (2) owning and driving a car; (3) running his own business; (4) knowing everybody for miles around, and being known to them." And in the course of his journeyings among individual farmers, from Massachusetts and Maryland to any number of points west, no one has touched him more than Eugene Elkins of Kansas, whose government photograph, by the way, stands on an opposite page.

He is a powerful, rugged man. He has done in his lifetime an immense amount of hard work. His hands are thick, heavy; the fingers, blunt. Yet when he parts the leaves to show you his best fruit, those hands move deftly, and there is something about them, too, which suggests a devout person handling the Bible. "If you don't like farming," he says cheerfully, "there's nothing to it. I always did like to take care of things around a farm. My boy and I ship a load of cattle a year, as a rule, and two carlots of hogs. But my main pleasure always has been in my lawn and house and garden, and in raising a hundred or a one different little things, just to see what a fellow can do." He led me to a loft room in one of the barns, where he was assembling his exhibit for the coming county fair. One year he showed eighty-three distinct varieties of plants, all raised on the place. He carries the key to that private shop and exhibit room in his own pocket, and leads you there with the delight of a boy.

Mr. Lord, in other words, is old-fashioned enough to be interested less in the economics of agriculture than in its ethics. But it is probably not a matter of fashion with him so much as it is a matter of art. For Mr. Lord, I suspect, is a novelist without knowing it. It is the individuals here—on an island in Lake Michigan, in St. Mary's County, Maryland, on an Indian reservation in New York State, in Ohio, in Illinois, in Indiana—that count and that one will remember. Mr. Lord has sketched many of these individuals with master-strokes. All true, and all different, they make a brilliant book; and remind us how interesting a place the United States still actually is.

MARK VAN DOREN

Sargent's Blue Boy

Life Was Worth Living. By W. Graham Robertson. Harper and Brothers. $5.

IN one sense the surviving Victorians are more alive today than they ever were. They are busily writing memoirs and biographies. The past year has unearthed William Rothenstein, Arthur Symonds, Evan Charteris, Frank Harris, and now W. Graham Robertson, who stood for Sargent's masterpiece, a portrait that in all likelihood will go down in history as a companion to Gainsborough's Blue Boy.

Sargent's Titian-haired model, a Diana of young men, lives up to whatever may be expected from him—and more. Superficially he is a garrulous ghost of the yellow and lavender nineties, an illustrator and stage-costume designer who has long outlived his reputation. But anyone who takes him for a chattering fool is very much mistaken. He assumes his cap and bells with deliberate art, an art that he mastered as a boy sitting at the feet of Burne-Jones, Henry James, Sarah Bernhardt, Henry Irving, John Sargent, Ellen Terry, James Whistler. Even now, he takes the advantage gained by his physical beauty; the innocent soprano voice is heard and the mild eyes are wide with artfully simulated naivete.

His sketches of Henry Irving, Ellen Terry, Sarah Bernhardt, John Sargent, and Henry James are priceless. He recreates the divine Sarah quite as she must have been—a marvelous girl whose energy swept away all opposition. Good actress or bad (what does it matter?) it was enough to hear the curiously artificial voice, to see the Bernhardt symbol of immortal youth, her favorite role, a sixteen-year-old girl decomposing in a coffin. It becomes evident that the secret of her art lay in a play of her own making. The extremes of life and death were compressed into a single image; whatever part she acted, or pretended to act, was made to fit the picture, a melodrama in itself, the perfect expression of her time, significant as ■ paradox recited by Oscar Wilde.

Graham Robertson has nothing but praise for Henry Irving, lavish praise of the sort that convinces one that Irving was the father of Shakespearean ham acting. Irving as King Lear, spitting on his hands before lifting the body of a murdered girl, is a remarkable portrait. Irving would have none of his contemporaries; they were disgusting. But "Macbeth isn't disgusting," he said. "I don't believe the public wants disgusting things."

The story of the Sargent masterpiece fully discloses Graham Robertson's value as a raconteur. Sargent asked him why he had never painted himself, and Robertson replied gravely, "Because I am not my style." Sargent did not see the joke until three days afterward at a dinner party. Robertson still protests, modestly, that the epigram was unconscious. Perhaps he would like to have us take his entire book as a piece of unconscious writing and completely sublimated wit. The attitude, however, drops from his shoulders upon the very last page. We see him an old man in the country taking excellent care of his pet dogs. He hopes that he has told nothing that will offend the dead, that he has been discreet. Then, with the now familiar, innocent smile, he says: "A really interesting book could be compiled from my omissions and I think I could promise that it would prove a best-seller. . . . I know I can promise that it will never be written."

HORACE GREGORY

Science and Soviet Russia

Science at the Cross Roads. London: Kniga.

THIS book is a collection of papers presented by the delegation of Soviet scientists to the Second International Congress of the History of Science and Technology, held in London last summer. It is built around a double theme, is both a plea for rational planning and for a thorough scientific organization of social life, and an advocacy of a socialistic reconstruction of science itself.

Arguments in favor of rational planning may not strike American readers as startling or even as novel. They are, however, timely enough as an answer to those who clamor for "slackening the jazz band of industry," as well as to those who come forward with schemes for an organized and rationalized capitalism. To the advocates of machine-wrecking the authors rightly point out that our troubles lie not in machine industry and mass production but in the archaic property relationships behind our industrial system. The two articles by M. Rubinstein on Science and Technology and on Electrification are especially interesting as showing clearly the folly of those of us who cherish the naive belief that scientific organization of industry is compatible with capitalism. Like everything else, the application of science is subordinated in our societies to the motive of profit. And those who are responsible for the management or rather mismanagement of our economic life have at their disposal a thousand and one ways by which they can sterilize the work of science the moment it comes into conflict with this supreme motive. "Buying out patents, supporting obsolete plants, fixing cartel prices according to the manufacturing cost of the worst plants, secrecy in scientific research, fear of innovations that threaten depreciation of old capital stock"—these items of Professor Rubinstein's indictment are too familiar to be in need of special comment.

The center of gravity of the book, however, lies in the second theme. Most of the articles are concerned with showing that science itself is badly in need of redemption and that communism is the new Messiah. We should certainly have no reason to quarrel with the authors if what they meant by a reconstruction of science were the necessity of coordinating the application and teaching of science with industrial requirements and making them a deliberately planned, publicly controlled collective enterprise energized with cultural meaning and social-mindedness. This the authors largely have in mind. And the present volume offers highly valuable illustrations of how the gulf is being spanned in Russia between brain and hand workers, how closely the school and laboratory are being brought together with the factory and farm, how intimately theory and practice are being fused.

But the ambition of the authors, which is representative of the aspirations of Soviet intellectuals in general, goes much farther than that of securing ■ more intimate union between industry and science. Aiming at rewriting the entire European cultural inheritance, they try to carry the work of reconstruction into the heart of scientific theories. For, as one of the authors, B. Zavadovsky, says, "scientific theories express not only the actual level of knowledge attained by science but also the ideological justification of economic interests of warring groups and classes." Not only economics but also sciences like mathematics and physics are thus marked by the stamp of capitalistic degradation. All Western sciences are afflicted with incurable antinomies and crises reflecting the disintegration of capitalism in general. It is only communism that can rescue science from the morass of mysticism and spiritualism into which it has been sinking of late.

Soviet writers are notoriously prone to exaggerate the troubles of other people. The tale of Western science is not so woeful as our authors would have us believe. The private mystical vagaries of the Eddingtons and Jeanses have no more interfered with their practical scientific work than Newton's interest in the apocalypses obscured his judgment in his studies in optics. Nor have they influenced students to give up science for theology. The fact is that the enrolment of students for scientific courses has been growing tremendously everywhere. In the United States, the citadel of capitalism, it is the anti-vitalists that are doing a most thriving business in biology. To believe our authors, most Western physicists are drifting away from determinism. Even if this were true, it would not prove much; it might signify merely ■ repudiation of dogmatism.

That there is something the matter with Western science is not ■ Soviet invention. The breakdown of traditional categories in physics and the vicious circle in which mathematics seems to have become involved have led many scientists to speak of an actual crisis in science. But one wonders how communism can be a remedy for logical evils. The release of pent-up energies, an increase of leisure, an enthusiasm methodically stimulated by all social agencies may lead in Russia to a great expansion of science and thus indirectly to a solution of many of its difficulties. Of course the opposite may also happen. The refinement of analysis and a wider interest may bring to light difficulties that were not obvious to cruder methods of research, may, in other words, create ■ situation analogous to the one confronting us at present. In any case the citizens of Soviet Russia will solve our problems as scientists and not as Communists.

It is true that our authors claim to possess a master-key for unlocking all mysteries. We are assured in all seriousness that all our scientific troubles will be over as soon as the scientists adopt the philosophy of dialectic materialism. The recommendation to cure scientific difficulties by means of metaphysics certainly sounds queer on the lips of thinkers priding themselves upon being 100 per cent scientific.* For dialectic materialism is essentially a metaphysical doctrine. Modeled upon the Hegelian dialectic, it infuses into history and nature the dynamism and advance through contradiction which characterized the development of logical thought for Hegel. By means of a Hegelian legerdemain the dialectic materialists believe that they can transform wishes into facts and overcome the antagonisms between determinism and chance, between continuity and discreteness, between the finite and the infinite, which prevail in contemporary science. In accordance with the magic formula of the unity of opposites these antagonistic categories are simply declared to be complementary. It is needless to say that we cannot solve difficulties by naming them.

The value of the present volume lies above all in the light it sheds on the new style of ideas that is at present fashionable in Soviet Russia. The repudiation of the policy of watchful waiting and spontaneity, the glorification of conscious planning and guidance from above, the shift of allegiance from speculation and theories to thinking inspired and guided by practice—all this is a manifest tribute to the ascendancy gained by Stalinism in contemporary Russian thought.

JEROME ROSENTHAL

Books in Brief

Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch. By Arthur Lourie. Translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

If the padding were removed from this book, the residue would be an inadequate biographical sketch. The author presents his observations on the "epoch" and his opinions about various composers to the detriment of his subject. He justifies these divagations by pleading that there are no tragic shades in Koussevitzky's life. "Fate has always been kind to him; from the very beginning of his artistic career everything has gone smoothly and happily. . . . Confronted with this, one hardly knows which way to turn. One writes a biography and suddenly perceives that there is essentially no biography." On the contrary, the materials for an interesting "life" are ready to hand. The kindness of fate has smothered in many a man the possibilities of development. In Koussevitzky artistic sensitiveness, dynamic personality, and unflagging energy carried him from an obscure provincial town to the heights of his profession. Abundant drama lies in the story of the boy who arrived in Moscow penniless at the age of fourteen, mastered the most unwieldy of the fiddle family so rapidly that at eighteen he was first double-bass in the Imperial Theater orchestra, and at twenty-four won European recognition as one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi of musical history. When he could have retired with fame and fortune, he made a fresh start as a conductor. Fate has indeed been kind to a man who has shown no fear of fate.

Return I Dare Not. By Margaret Kennedy. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

This is amiable, smart writing about a house party in English high society at which the pièce de résistance is a young and incredibly successful playwright. A dowager duchess who has seen life but is now too old for it, her dashing and irresponsible daughter, an extremely beautiful and excessively stupid young married woman, a famous courtesan who is also an earl's daughter, a demure but bright young miss, a famous scientist, a literary pander, and a professional gossip are the other guests. The tale of the playwright's revolt from this artificial fame and these trivial, dashing people makes the novel. The tone is breezy and amusing; an air of sophistication is preserved, with at the same time a cynical awareness of how empty the sophistication is. But the whole thing is unimportant just because the people are trivial and their lives empty. In spite of the fact that she does not always do them justice, Miss Kennedy should stick to her artists. Her Sangers at least had blood in them.

Tune In, America: A Study of Our Coming Musical Independence. By Daniel Gregory Mason. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

Dr. Mason both practices and preaches the doctrine of our musical autonomy. His own compositions constitute as cogent an argument as any he advances in the fourteen articles here assembled from the periodicals in which they first appeared. Independence in act and thought is the theme underlying all these topical papers. "As our American impatience too often defeats us in the achievement of workmanship, so our long habit of feeling inferior to Europe sorely impedes our originality." In place of third-rate imitators of Schönberg and Stravinsky he would have us produce more MacDowells. He reproaches Arturo Toscanini and sundry imported conductors for their neglect of American composers. Taking inventory of the radio repertoire, he finds it overstocked with jazz, and advises the directors to emulate the procedure of the British Broadcasting Corporation. His book is a study not so much of a future condition as of current symptoms.

Drama

Westchester and Washington

SENTIMENT and farce do not usually form a very happy combination. It is hard enough for the outsider to take a lover's pain with appropriate seriousness even under the most favorable conditions, and if he has been encouraged into a laughing mood he is very likely to laugh at the wrong situation. However, Mr. Will Cotton has managed pretty successfully to avoid the pitfalls of his method, and in "The Bride the Sun Shines On" (Fulton Theater) he has turned out the materials for an amusing evening. Add the delightful comic gift of Miss Dorothy Gish and you have a gay little diversion which ought to keep anyone in a good humor without imposing any undue strain upon the higher faculties.

Henry Hull plays the Benedict to Miss Gish's Beatrice. He is a spoiled young composer who carries on a running quarrel with his true love all through the preparations for her marriage to a very dull youth, and who, after declaring that he would not marry her if she were the last girl in Westchester, proposes just as the wedding procession starts for the altar. Then the bride-to-be, in a delightfully unexpected gesture, gives him one swift blow over the head with the three Easter lilies which form her bridal bouquet and exits solemnly in the general direction of the waiting minister. It is hardly necessary to add that the two of them elope before the unfortunate marriage is actually consummated, but it is worth while to pay a tribute to Miss Gish's comic verve, which contributes the touch of distinction necessary to raise the whole thing above the level of pleasant routine. She plays with a certain droll ruefulness which is irresistibly taking, and yet, admirable as her performance is, I believe it less good than one she will be able to give when she has had a longer training in the methods of the stage. At present her performance is a series of brilliant flashes. She rises to each crucial scene with dependable regularity, and in each of them she makes an actual, creative contribution to the humor of the situation. But in the moments between she sometimes seems almost insignificant, and she has a way of appearing to come suddenly to life when something definite is expected of her. For an explanation one turns naturally to the fragmentary technique of the movies in which she got her first training, and one is encouraged in this perhaps too easy theory by a certain delicate play of facial expression which seems almost to demand a close-up to do it justice. In any event,

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □ DANCE □ LECTURES □ DEBATES □

GILBERT and SULLIVAN'S CIVIC LIGHT OPERA CO. in IOLANTHE
WITH FAMOUS GILBERTIAN CAST
ERLANGER'S THEA., W. 44th St. Phone. PEnn 6-7963
Nights, 50c to $2.50 Wed. Mat. 50c to $1.50. Sat. Mat. 50c to $2.00
MONDAY, JANUARY 11th—"THE GONDOLIERS"

The Theatre Guild Presents
EUGENE O'NEILL'S TRILOGY
MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA

Composed of 3 plays

Homecoming, The Hunted, The Haunted

All 3 plays will be presented on one day, commencing at 5:30 sharp. Dinner intermission of one hour at 7 o'clock. No matinee performances.

GUILD THEATRE, 52d St., West of Broadway

THE THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS
REUNION IN VIENNA

A comedy by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

MARTIN BECK THEA., 45 St. & 8 Ave. PEnn. 6-6100
Evs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

ARCH SELWYN presents

THE DEVIL PASSES

A NEW PLAY BY BENN W. LEVY

with ARTHUR BYRON, BASIL RATHBONE, ROBERT LORAIN, MARY NASH, DIANA WYNARD, CECILIA LOFTFUS, ERNEST THESIGER, ERNEST COSSART.

SELWYN THEA., W. 42nd St. Evs. 8:30 | Prices Evs. $1 to $3
Mats.: Thurs. and Sat. | Mats. $1 to $2.50

GILBERT MILLER Presents

HELEN HAYES

in MOLNAR'S New Comedy

THE GOOD FAIRY

HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street

Evenings 8:50

Matinees Thursday and Saturday 2:40

"First American play of the season of any sound quality; a play real in its character, real in its dialogue and consistently intelligent in its approach to its subject matter."—George Jean Nathan, Judge.

THE LEFT BANK

By ELMER RICE

LITTLE THEATRE, 44th Street Telephone LA 4-6620
Evs. $1 to $3. Wed. Mat. $1, $1.50 and $2. Sat. Mat. $1 - $2.50

A Clearing House of Opinion THE GROUP Meets at Auditorium 150 West 85th St.

Tuesday, January 12th, at 8:30 p.m.

DEBATE: "HAS RELIGION CONTRIBUTED TO THE PROGRESS OF CIVILIZATION"

RABBI S. GREENBERG, affirm., MAJOR JOSEPH WHELESS, neg.
PROF. WILLIAM MACDONALD, Guest Chairman

Weekly notices request

Subscription: 50c

DEBATE

RESOLVED: THAT THE SOCIALIST PARTY PROGRAM IS INADEQUATE TO SOLVE OUR SOCIAL PROBLEMS

LOUIS WALDMAN vs. A. J. MUSTE

Sunday, January 10th, 8:30 p.m.

BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC

30 Lafayette Avenue

Tickets: 25c-50c-$1—At Box Office and Rand Book Store, 7 E. 15th St., N.Y.C.
Jan. 17—Lecture—Harry A. Overstreet

AUSPICES—BROOKLYN FORUM—SOCIALIST PARTY

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL—2nd Ave. and 14th Street

DIRECTOR, DR. G. F. BECK

(New Session opens Monday, Jan. 4th)

THE STORY OF CIVILIZATION

Beginning Wednesday, Jan. 6, at 8:30 p.m.

"Studies in Roman Civilization"

STUDIES IN CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE

Beginning Sunday, Jan. 10, at 5 p.m.

"The Magic Mountain" by THOMAS MANN

THE AMERICAN SCENE BY LEON SAMSON

Beginning Tuesday, Jan. 5, at 8:30 p.m.

and other courses.

Admission to each Lecture

25 CENTS

REUNION IN NEW YORK

Green Mansions'

DANCE

GREEN MANSIONS

Friday, January 15, 1932

35 WEST 90TH ST.
Schuyler 4-3250

HOTEL ST. GEORGE

51 Clark Street

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Admission $1.50

Informal

□

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

□

PLAYS TO SEE

Brief Moment—Belasco—W. 44 St.

Civic Light Opera Co.—Erlanger's—W. 44 St.

Cornelia Otis Skinner—Lyceum—W. 45 St.

Counsellor-at-Law—Plymouth—W. 45 St.

Cynara—Morosco—45 St. W. of B'way.

Fata Morgana—Royale—45 St. W. of B'way.

Hay Fever—Avon—W. 45 St.

Mourning Becomes Electra—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.

OF Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.

Reunion in Vienna—Martin Beck—45 St. & 8 Ave.

Sing High, Sing Low—Sam H. Harris—42 St. W. of B'way.

Springtime for Henry—Bijou—45 St. W. of B'way.

The Barretts of Wimpole Street—Empire—B'way. & 40 St.

The Band Wagon—New Amsterdam—W. 42 St.

The Bride The Sun Shines On—Fulton—46 St. W. of B'way.

The Cat and The Fiddle—Globe—B'way & 46 St.

The Devil Passes—Selwyn—W. 42 St.

The Good Fairy—Henry Miller's—124 W. 43 St.

The Left Bank—Little—44 St.

Wolves—49 St.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

LABOR NEWS

"In the Raw"

During this winter of discontent when the suffering of the workers is to be the greatest in American history, you will want to get your facts straight from original sources without "the editorial slant."

Federated Press, labor's only daily news service, offers you either a daily news service from bureaus in Washington and New York plus less frequent service from Pittsburgh and Chicago, at $5 a month; or

A weekly news service including usually the most important release weekly from each of FP's four bureaus, at $10 a year. Both payable in advance.

Federated Press is non-partisan, has 100 correspondents watching the hot spots, gets the news too hot to print—and no editor can keep it from you if you take this service. We suggest that clubs, groups, classes and libraries take the service. Republication is expressly forbidden.

FEDERATED PRESS

112 E. 19th STREET
NEW YORK CITY

Oswald Garrison Villard

writes

If I Were Dictator

in

The Nation

Next Week

Miss Gish is as richly endowed with comic talent as any actress now appearing on our stage.

"Of Thee I Sing" (Music Box Theater) is the long-awaited musical satire by the Messrs. Kaufman, Ryskind, and Gershwin. Already a success before the first New York performance, the piece lives up to the expectations which were formed, and it is funny from the moment the curtain goes up on the election parade until it descends upon the caperings of the Supreme Court judges who have been called in to pronounce upon the sex of the White House baby. For the inevitable comparison with Gilbert there is a certain justification. Some of the rhymes are faintly Gilbertian, and so too is the trick of having groups of solemn men break suddenly into a jig. But there is something savage about the extravagance which suggests even more strongly the mood which has made "Ballyhoo" and its imitators phenomenally popular. Kaufman and Ryskind are dealing bludgeon-like blows because there is an anger in the air which makes them seem justified, and the audience roars its approval of slogans like "Vote for Prosperity and See What You Get" in a fashion which suggests that its rage might be ominous if it were not, for the moment, released through laughter.

Doubtless some of the quips are harmless enough. There is nothing really subversive in the conception of the ex-hermit who is selected as the most suitable candidate for vice-president and who stubbornly refuses to concede his own election until the last moment. Neither, perhaps, is there anything dangerous in the resonant Senators. But it is doubtful if there has ever been a time before when the general public would have found pleasing so raucously contemptuous a treatment of the whole spectacle of our government from the President on up (or down) to the Supreme Court itself. John P. Wintergreen ("The Flavor Lasts") is triumphantly elected on a platform of "Love," after a stirring campaign in the course of which he has publicly proposed and been accepted in each of the forty-eight States. A wave of sentiment makes the electorate forget the mistake which his party had made when it sold Rhode Island, but it is annoyed when it learns that he has jilted the Miss White House duly elected at an Atlantic City beauty parade, and international complications threaten when the French Ambassador discovers that

She's the illegitimate daughter
Of an illegitimate son
Of an illegitimate nephew
Of Nap-o-le-on.

Impeachment proceedings are in progress when the lawful wife bursts into the Senate, announces that she is about to become a mother, and thus causes the august body (aware of the fact that it has never impeached an expectant father) to quash the charges, and to break into a triumphal chorus which proclaims that "posterity is just around the corner." "Of Thee I Sing" will assuredly last the season out, but there is at least one prominent out-of-town resident who will never come to see it.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

In "Sentinels" (Biltmore Theater) Lula Vollmer, who will be remembered for her excellent "Sun Up," has written another play set in the South, but not one that will add to her reputation. It is the story of the scion of an aristocratic Southern family who kills a blackguardly politician to prevent him from exposing the past of his brother's fiancée, and of the old Negro servant who persuades her own son to take the blame for the murder to save "the honor of the Hathaways." The story would be a hard one to swallow in any case, and it is set forth with stock characters and stock situations. Its redeeming quality is a certain technical deftness.

H. H.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1932

No. 3472

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS.....	57
EDITORIALS:
If Germany Cannot Pay.....	59
The Madness of Great Britain.....	60
Foreign Loans.....	61
Scottsboro, Alabama.....	61
The Art and Mystery of Publishing.....	62
SPEAKING OF REVOLUTION... By Hendrik Willem van Loon..	63
PATIENT GERMANY. By Henry Raymond Mussey.....	64
THE CRISIS REACHES WASHINGTON. By Paul V. Anderson....	66
IF I WERE DICTATOR. By Oswald Garrison Villard.....	67
PORTRAIT OF UNDERGRADUATE YALE. By Richard S. Childs..	70
PASADENA LIGHTS ITS OWN. By William Sidney.....	72
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	73
CORRESPONDENCE.....	74
FINANCE: EXPATRIATED INVESTMENTS. By S. Palmer Harman	75
BOOKS, MUSIC, FILMS, DRAMA:
The Bore. By Mark Van Doren.....	76
Dispossessed. By Leslie Nelson Jennings.....	76
Two Critics. By Henry Hazlitt.....	76
Photography as an Art. By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	77
"War Guilt" and France. By Harry Elmer Barnes.....	78
"I Saw Thrones." By Morton Dauwen Zabel.....	78
The Alibi Department. By Ernest Gruening.....	79
Books in Brief.....	80
Music: Composer and Performer. By Arthur Mendel.....	81
Films: "Spectacle" vs. Story. By Margaret Marshall.....	82
Drama: "Ten-Twenty-Third". By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	82
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.....	84

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN FRED A. KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

will not make them. It is to make loans that even the newly organized National Credit Corporation or the newly organized railroad pool will be unable or unwilling to make. This means that it is bound to have a high proportion of bad loans—that is, a fairly large proportion of the loans will turn out to be gifts, or doles, to industry. The bill itself, however necessary it may now seem to be, is another disturbing example of the naive faith that the federal government, with its own bonds at a discount, and faced by the prospect of a series of unparalleled deficits, can take care of every situation by huge bond issues.

THE HONOLULU AFFAIR is unfortunate from every angle. With the brutal attackers of a woman, whether or not she is white and the wife of an American naval officer, it is not possible to have any sympathy; when there was reason to believe that their trial for criminal assault was conducted half-heartedly by the prosecution and when they were defended—at evidently large expense provided by unknown persons—by the best counsel available in the islands, the result being a hung jury, enormous indignation among American residents was inevitably engendered. But the situation was not helped in the least when the husband and mother of the victim took the law into their own hands, and with the aid of two enlisted men kidnapped one of the men accused and are now charged with his murder. The situation is extremely tense. It is rendered more so by the thoroughly deplorable statement of Admiral William V. Pratt, chief of naval operations. "American men will not stand for the violation of women under any circumstances," said the Admiral. "For this crime they have taken the matter into their own hands repeatedly when they have felt that the law has failed to do justice." This is a plain incitement to riot and lynching, and should be answered at once by a severe official reprimand. In contrast to this intemperate statement is the report of Rear Admiral Yates Stirling, Jr., district commandant. Rear Admiral Stirling details, with admirable restraint and lack of visible prejudice, the attack, the trial, and the subsequent efforts to obtain a more effective city police administration. Denial, meanwhile, has come from physicians at the Honolulu emergency hospital of Admiral Pratt's statement that forty assaults had been committed in the last eleven months. Only two, according to Dr. Thomas Mossman, one of them being the case of Mrs. Massie, have been found to be bona fide cases of rape.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT'S annual message to the New York Legislature was described in great headlines by the New York City press as showing that the Governor's hat was in the Presidential ring and that he had boldly flung down the gauntlet to the Republican leaders. That was misrepresentation pure and simple, for the message was a politician's document with nothing outspoken in it. It is true that he demanded a new leadership in the country, but if anybody can find a vestige of leadership in this document itself, it is more than we can. What is one to think of a message in which the author says at one moment that we

CONGRESS can hardly be charged with failing to act with the proper rapidity on the bill to create a Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but in this, more than in most cases, speed purchased at the expense of thorough consideration may prove to be rather expensive in the long run. The powers granted to the proposed corporation are extremely broad; it is to make loans to railroads, to banks, to insurance companies, to exporters, and apparently to any business that applies for them. Some of these loans are to be long and some short term. The businesses with which the new corporation are to deal, in short, as well as the types of loans, are so diverse in nature that it may be asked whether, in the interests of sound administration, two or more corporations might not have been proposed instead of one. As no loan under the present bill is to be made to a railroad without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, one wonders whether it would not have been better in the first place to put the entire control of loans to railroads in the hands of a separate corporation conducted by the commission. The loans to banks might also better have been put into the hands of a separate corporation. Further, there should be a much clearer understanding than there is of just what the corporation is or is not going to attempt. It is apparently to make loans only where the Federal Reserve banks, or commercial banks, or private investors must rebuild "our economic and social structure upon a surer foundation," and that the situation calls for the "reconstruction [sic] of a better-ordered civilization in which the economic freedom of the individual will be restored," and then goes on to say that the "American system of economics and government is everlasting"? The message is a great disappointment and merely confirms the belief that the Governor is a charming person, an increasingly astute politician, able to pull with reformers, the Republicans, and Tammany Hall, and a man who does not advance the cause of reform one whit. With all due regard for his many fine traits, his amazing courage in the face of personal adversity, we cannot see in Franklin Roosevelt any promise whatever of the leadership in national affairs of which the United States is in need.

THE LATEST Congressional election, that in the First New Hampshire District, resulted in another smashing defeat for the Hoover Administration. By about 3,000 votes, in weather below zero, with the roads blocked by snow, this rock-ribbed Republican district elected a Democrat, William N. Rogers. Five out of the six cities in the district were carried by Mr. Rogers, who is the first Democrat to enter the House from New Hampshire in ten years. During his campaign he freely criticized the Administration, and the paramount issues on both sides were unemployment and the industrial depression. The Administration must be further interested in the outcome because Mr. Rogers stood as an out-and-out wet. For once Senator Simeon Fess, Mr. Hoover's chairman of the National Republican Committee, did not come out and say that the election was, everything considered, really a vindication for the President. The gloom at Republican headquarters was apparently too much for his usual outburst of Pollyanna nonsense.

SECRETARY STIMSON appeared before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on January 6 and assured it that "there is no gentleman or lady member of our delegation [to Geneva] who is either a man or woman of imperialistic tendencies. On the contrary, they are the most practical pacifists I know, sir." He is entitled to his opinion, but it cannot change ours that we have yet to perceive in any of their actions or utterances either true pacifism or practical leadership in the direction of disarmament or peace. We rejoice to hear him say that "the conference carries the hope of the peace-loving people of the entire world," and that when it meets in Geneva it will realize that "something must be done or the state of the whole world will be dashed into a disastrous condition." The day before, Mr. Stimson's colleague, Secretary Adams, was being challenged before the House Naval Committee to explain why it was that he and the Navy Department were urging a ten-year program to build 120 warships at a cost of $616,000,000 so as to bring our navy up to the highest limit allowed by our treaty stipulations. In self-defense Secretary Adams declared that he was not disloyal to Mr. Hoover but represented Mr. Hoover's point of view. This is quite characteristic of the mental confusion of the Hoover Administration. The President has repeatedly demanded disarmament and at the same time urges that we build a larger fleet even in this time of economic disaster and of national deficit. Mr. Stimson, too, weakens our position by stating that our navy is already limited by international agreement and that we have reduced our army to such figures that "no foreign statesman could with a straight face say that it could be regarded as a menace to anybody."

THE STIMSON NOTE to Japan and China has served to clarify the official American attitude toward the Manchurian problem, though the extravagant interpretation placed on the note abroad has tended to obscure the real purpose of the communication. According to this interpretation, Secretary Stimson has invoked the Nine-Power Treaty against Japan. Such is the view held in Geneva, Nanking, and elsewhere, but not, be it noted, in Tokio or Washington. A more careful reading of the document reveals it as a reminder to both Japan and China that whatever happens in Manchuria the United States intends to defend its treaty and other rights in that territory. A supplementary explanation by the State Department upholds this view. In this statement the department said that "we have no desire to question Japan's legitimate treaty rights in Manchuria," or "to intrude ourselves into any settlement which Japan and China may make of their present unhappy difficulties" so long as that settlement "does not impair our rights or our citizens' rights in China" and is "not achieved by a violation of the methods agreed to in the Kellogg pact." It may safely be said that in its Manchurian policy the State Department has placed American rights before all else, giving the Kellogg pact only secondary consideration. The department obviously does not intend to interfere in any arrangement whereby the sovereignty of Manchuria might be transferred to Japan, if that transfer is made peacefully, and if provision is made to maintain our traditionally cherished "open-door" policy in Manchuria.

THE STRAW VOTE taken by the council of the National Economic League among its members throws an extremely interesting sidelight on the present state of a rather liberal section of "expert" opinion on the leading economic issues that confront the country. On the question of war debt, it is interesting to learn that among the 1,607 ballots returned by its membership of 5,000, only 14 per cent favored complete cancelation of the war debts and only 32 per cent favored reduction, with 41 per cent favoring a further postponement and 13 per cent voting against any further action at all. The vote of the League's special committee of thirty-seven members, made up partly of industrialists and more largely of academic economists, revealed a more advanced opinion on these questions. Forty-four per cent voted for cancelation and 32 per cent for reduction, a total of 76 per cent for either one course or the other, as compared with an actual minority for either course on the part of the national council. On the tariff, 75 per cent of the membership of the council voted in favor of immediate reduction; thirty-three of the members of the special committee also voted for immediate reduction, while only three favored keeping the rates as they are at present and no member voted for an increase. It is significant that 83 per cent of the ballots favored a national economic advisory council "to suggest policies for promoting the economic betterment of the country," and that 85 per cent voted in favor of a proposal to amend the anti-trust laws to allow, with certain safeguards, business concerns "to enter into contracts for the purpose of equalizing production and consumption."

THE DELUSION PERSISTS, and under the impulsion of the depression gains ground, that low wages are an appropriate corollary of low prices. But new support has been given to the advocates of high wages by a costly and painstaking survey recently completed by the International Labor Office, which was financed by Edward A. Filene through the Twentieth Century Fund, of which he is president. The survey took two years to finish, and covered fourteen European cities. Its purpose was to discover the amount it would cost workmen in these cities, under the special conditions of each locality, to achieve the same standard of living as a Ford laborer in Detroit. This study reveals that the disparity in prices between this and foreign countries does not by any means account for the difference in wages. In fact, living costs in Stockholm were found to be in excess of those in Detroit. The real advantage possessed by the American worker is the growth of machine production, scientific management, large-scale distribution, and efficient labor, which makes the cost of many common articles lower here than similar goods abroad. The moral is, of course, as pointed out by Dr. Leo Wolman in analyzing the survey, that "high wages are not incompatible with low prices." Dr. Joseph H. Willits, of the University of Pennsylvania, also declared, "Certainly no great national prosperity can ever be founded upon low wages." We recommend the I. L. O. report to those hard-boiled "realists" in industry who leap instantly toward their pay rolls whenever conditions furnish the merest semblance of an excuse to dock their men.

JULIUS ROSENWALD was not only a pioneer in developing the highly useful mail-order house for general merchandising, he was also a notable philanthropist with a large sense of responsibility to the community. The latter is not too often found among men of wealth, despite our Carnegies, our Rockefellers, our Harknesses, and many others. The known gifts of Mr. Rosenwald total $62,000,000, a sum which by no means covers the amount of his giving. To our mind his greatest benefaction was the aid extended by him to Negro education in the South. No less than 5,500 schools for Negroes have been erected, chiefly in rural communities, as a result of his offer to give a certain sum if the communities involved would raise the rest needed. That this meant double taxation for the Negroes is true; they paid their taxes and got no schools, and then when Mr. Rosenwald came along they had to put their hands in their pockets and raise the money for what should have been given to them as a matter of course. It is pleasant to add that in these undertakings the Negroes were constantly helped by generous and sympathetic white neighbors, occasionally by official bodies in the community. The result has been a marvelous increase in primary educational opportunities for colored people. This was only one phase of a life of extraordinary generosity; it must not be forgotten that Mr. Rosenwald played a remarkably useful role during the war as a member of the advisory commission of industrial experts in connection with the War Department, at the head of the division of food, clothing, and kindred supplies. That he gave of himself and his means without stint to civic enterprises in Chicago, where he made his home, goes without saying.

If Germany Cannot Pay

CHANCELLOR Brüning has declared that Germany can no longer pay reparations. His frank statement, though it did not come as a surprise, has brought about a new crisis in European affairs. It is not enough for German foreign-office spokesmen to explain that Brüning was merely reiterating Germany's position, which they say has long been known to foreign diplomats in Berlin. This is the first time that any responsible German official has publicly announced that Germany cannot continue to pay. It must be noted, however, that Brüning did not specifically repudiate the reparations agreement; he did not say that Germany will not pay. This is important because it has disarmed the extremists in some of the creditor countries in Europe who would like nothing better than to be furnished with an excuse for applying sanctions against Germany, that is to say, an excuse for reoccupying the industrial areas of western Germany. Brüning's announcement was apparently intended to prepare world opinion for the position the German delegation will take at the Lausanne conference. But it has had the effect of awakening new suspicions among the creditor Powers, especially France and Belgium.

In recent months nationalist sentiment in France had been appreciably weakened by the drastic inroads the economic depression has been making in that country. Not only the radicals of the left but even moderate newspapers and the leaders of the moderate political parties were beginning to ask whether the most practical way out of France's and Europe's difficulties did not lie in a general cancellation of all international financial obligations inherited from the war. That Premier Laval was not blind to this development was shown by his efforts to reconstruct his Cabinet so as to give the left increased representation, a move that could only have resulted in modifying the French attitude toward reparations. But with the publication of Brüning's announcement a decided reaction has set in. The press and the political leaders who recently were discussing cancellation are now insisting that France cannot afford to let reparations be dropped altogether. Had Brüning waited with his announcement until the opening of the Lausanne conference, he probably would have had to deal with a French delegation more than willing to listen to reason. He may now have to face a group opposed to any substantial change in the Young Plan, though perhaps willing to grant an extension of the moratorium.

Whatever position the French take, it appears from Premier MacDonald's statement of January 10 that the British will be inclined to support Brüning at Lausanne, but probably not to the extent of approving any move for complete cancellation. In any case it seems certain, to judge from both the British and French reaction to the Brüning statement, that neither delegation will accept any plan that does not provide for the scaling down or outright cancellation of European debts to the United States. Thus Brüning has virtually called upon Europe to choose between crushing Germany and repudiating the war debts owed us. There can be little doubt which course Europe will choose in its extremity.

The Madness of Great Britain

THE Union Jack flies over the buildings of the Indian National Congress but it stays there more as an emblem of dishonor than of victory. A campaign of ruthless repression has been instituted; "nowhere else in civilized or semi-civilized lands," says the Cleveland Plain Dealer justifiably, "is there such a terroristic regime. . . . Crimes that are not crimes are being punished with amazing severity." Gandhi is treated kindly in his prison, though his deportation, recently demanded by British Tories, is being darkly hinted. Not only have funds of the Congress been confiscated; banking institutions in which Nationalist money had been deposited have been ordered to withhold payment. One after another the leaders of the rebel movement, no matter how non-violent, have been imprisoned at hard labor. The use of the mails and wires has been denied. Freedom of expression is dead. Every chance meeting place of rebellious Indians has been closed. Native ambulances are outlawed. Peaceful picketing is proscribed; children are not exempted from arrest and imprisonment; and the sound of lathis falling on Nationalist heads, however innocent of reprisal may be the non-resistant victims, calls forth hallelujahs from the more vindictive British press. Even the shooting of demonstrators—which happily does not parallel as yet the excesses of the previous clashes—is hailed by British officialdom as deplorable but necessary. And worst of all, judges are empowered to pass any sentence, even the death penalty, upon anyone violating the restrictive ordinances, this savage "justice" not requiring the personal presence of the defendant or any evidence beyond a brief description of the "crime." Well may Rabindranath Tagore, who has not always agreed with Gandhi, not to mention the National Congress as a whole, castigate "the primitive lawlessness of our lawmakers."

If jails enough do not exist to contain the Indians who are perfectly willing to fill them for their cause—60,000 Nationalists were confined at one time in 1930—Britain possesses islands in abundance where the casualties of her imperialism may be domiciled. The reckless use of force may, indeed, succeed in clamping down an outward "peace" while the committees authorized by Prime Minister MacDonald draw up a pseudo-constitutional outline of "self-government." But will this be victory for Britain? Can she carry conviction anywhere regarding her declared purpose of instituting a "new deal" in India, when she is obliged to ram it down the throats of an unwilling Indian majority, and by methods hardly removed from medieval barbarism?

The severity, the punishments, the vindictiveness are all evidences of a bad conscience and a hopeless cause. The failure of violence in the face of non-violent resistance has already been amply demonstrated. Gandhi almost at once has won a series of important triumphs. He has convinced the world that the dissatisfaction with British policy and the hand-picked Round Table conferences is not limited to small groups of chronic fanatics, but wells up from the hearts of aspiring millions. He has destroyed the efforts of propaganda to picture him as insincere and—to quote the words of the conservative Observer—as "one of the wildest tacticians alive," filled with "personal hatred of the British regime" that is "senseless and implacable." By the smug scoffers who welcomed him to London (where he was well received by most) he can hardly now be labeled as one "chiefly to be remembered as the man who tried to defy the British climate with a loin-cloth." He has won back the loyal support of his eldest son, Harilal, who has hitherto opposed his policies—a conquest that may have its repercussions on the Indian youth movements. The All-Indian Moslem Congress, which a short time ago was opposing him, has split wide open, and what appears to be a substantial section, if not a majority, has swung behind the non-violent revolt. The Calcutta Corporation by a vote of twenty-seven to fifteen has adjourned as "a protest against the reactionary and oppressive policy." The hartals, or suspensions of all normal business and social activity, have closed down shops in the cities and caused commercial havoc. No less a figure than E. C. Benthall, described in dispatches as "president of the foremost European firm in India," has addressed a protest to Premier MacDonald against the Viceroy's crucial refusal to discuss the new repressive measures with Mahatma Gandhi.

The chief strength of Gandhi lies in his integrity of character; the chief weakness of the British raj is its patent willingness to use whatever means it can to impose its will. But the most immediately practical instrument for Indian freedom is the boycott. Indubitably, the boycott this time will be more effective than before. And the effects of previous boycotts have been devastating, although Indian enthusiasts are sometimes inclined to forget the general depression and attribute the decline in volume of business entirely to their efforts. Yet the mill-owners of Lancashire have not been howling at nothing. No amount of ferocity can make Indians purchase British goods. In March, 1931, for example, when Gandhi was out of jail but the boycott still prevailed, imports of cotton yarn and manufactures decreased $13,000,000 as compared with March, 1930. Imports of gray cotton cloth went down from $7,000,000 to $1,000,000; white goods dropped from $5,000,000 to $2,000,000; and colored goods fell from $3,000,000 to $1,500,000. Associated Press reports disclose that business in Bombay is about 25 per cent of normal, that the exchanges for cotton, bullion, seeds, stocks, and piece goods have been shut down, and that "not one yard of British cloth has been sold in the Bombay wholesale market, which supplies the greater part of India."

Gandhi, however, relies not only on the boycott and other forms of non-violent coercion, not only upon world opinion outside of Britain, but upon the self-respect and conscience of the British people. We await with eager hope a sturdy cry within Great Britain for a cessation of the brutalities in India; we long for a demand that Gandhi and the Nationalists be freed and invited to state their terms anew, and those terms be met by a generosity on the part of Great Britain far less costly than the madness of her present policy. Short of this, the frail but mighty man who calmly spins and prays within the confines of Yerovda prison will shame the British people for all time.

Foreign Loans

NEVER has a mistaken government policy revenged itself so quickly and so completely upon its authors as has that of the State Department in reserving to itself the right to pass upon proposed international loans. We do not know whether it was the international bankers who first suggested this viséing of foreign loans by the government, or whether it was the bright idea of Secretary Hughes, nor do we care. When the policy was first announced we protested against it to the best of our ability. But the authorities were sure that they were right in thus supervising private business which might lead to international complications (which was all the more amusing since the practice began under President Harding and Secretary of Commerce Hoover, whose slogan was "Less government in business and more business in government"). Thus, they said, they could protect American citizens from unwise investments and could decide whether from the political point of view an investment in a given country was or was not unwise or inopportune. As time went on the practice became a precedent, an established policy, and the State Department was so sure of its own wisdom in the matter that it would not even listen to protests that came to it from at least one other department of the government, that of Commerce. Naturally, the bankers were in the main delighted by the arrangement. If now and again they were disappointed in not having certain issues approved, on the other hand they gained enormously by being able to go to their customers and say: "This issue is approved by the United States government, which is especially anxious that our citizens should not invest in bonds of a dubious character." Of course the government never went as far as that, and the bankers did not often put into writing anything so categorical. But the effect was the same.

As the years went on, the State Department was more than ever satisfied. It could keep Americans from lending money to Russia or to other countries on the black books of the government; it had gained additional political power. Things were exceedingly prosperous, our business was on the upswing, and everybody was happy. Then the depression set in and the whole situation changed. American investors wanted to know why it was that the South American loans, which the State Department had approved, defaulted to the extent of $815,000,000. Of course the State Department explained again that it had never passed on the worth of the loans, but had merely certified that there was no political or international objection to them. But the investor had naturally not looked upon the government's specification as being thus limited. Now it even appears that various loans were approved by the State Department over the protest of the Department of Commerce for purely political reasons. Thus, when the commercial attaché in Colombia reported to the Department of Commerce that "Colombia is running wild on borrowing," that information did not prevent the State Department from approving an extension of a short-term credit of $20,000,000. Again, in the case of a Bolivian loan of $23,000,000, made in the United States in 1928, an official of the Department of Commerce protested to the State Department, but was finally induced to consent because "at that particular moment our diplomatic relations with Latin America were a little upset. . . . As I recall the State Department said that it might result in embarrassment [in view of the approaching Pan-American Conference] if we turned down this loan proposition." So there you have it clearly; no consideration of the merits of the loan, no thought of American investors; just a decision based upon the sheerest political expediency, and stupid expediency at that. Of course the procedure was contrary to law, and it was moreover in defiance of a Senate resolution passed two years ago calling upon the State Department to desist, a resolution which Secretary Stimson practically said he would ignore.

As for the international bankers who have testified, we cannot see that they have added or detracted very much from the picture we already had. There was too much dwelling upon their own excellent motives, especially in the case of Mr. Kahn. James Speyer was refreshingly frank in saying that his firm was out to make money, that its profits were regrettably low, and that it had suffered with its clients through the depreciation of some of the securities it floated. Even here there is nothing new, though some of the Washington correspondents seem to think that there was never any unsuccessful flotation of foreign securities until recently. One need only think of Mexico and the Mexican railways to recall how bonds sponsored by the Morgans and Mr. Speyer's banking house were ruined by the revolutions which followed the end of the Díaz regime. The history of international banking contains many similar episodes. The bankers who deal in international securities are just what they have always been, men out to make as much money as they possibly can, often of limited vision and little understanding of the risks they are taking and the internal conditions of the countries to which they are lending American money; often heedless or unaware of the grave international complications they are invoking. It is not a pretty picture.

Scottsboro, Alabama

ON April 9, 1931, the last of eight boys was convicted of rape in Alabama. They were and are minors; they are Negroes; their alleged victims are white women. The trial, according to friendly and unfriendly reports at the time, was conducted with an accompaniment of obvious local prejudice of the most violent sort. Rape in Alabama is punishable with death. The boys were accordingly sentenced to the electric chair and the date of execution was set at July 10 last. However, notice of appeal was duly filed by counsel for the defense, the day of execution was postponed, and the appeal for reversal of the conviction is to be heard January 21 in the Alabama Supreme Court.

These facts about the Scottsboro case, by now promising to become as celebrated as the Sacco-Vanzetti case in Massachusetts or the Leo Frank case in Georgia, are indisputable. Would that other aspects of the situation were equally plain! For almost from the moment of conviction of the defendants, the unfortunate Negro boys, illiterate, ignorant, helpless, with their equally helpless parents, have been the pawns in a furious battle between two organizations, each, according to its contention, desirous only of saving them from death in the electric chair. We have no intention of going into the contradictory and acrimonious details of the quarrel between the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the International Labor Defense over who should act as defense counsel in the case. Each side believes the other guilty of misrepresentation and duplicity. Each has been actually guilty of calling names and an attempt to elbow out the other. In a controversy as heated as this has now become it is impossible to take the word of either at its face value or to determine calmly and with assurances of accuracy where the truth lies. It is a fact that the National Association has finally—if anything in the case can be considered final—withdrawn, that Clarence Darrow, Arthur Garfield Hays, and Roderick Beddow, engaged by that association as defense counsel, have also withdrawn, and that as a result the International Labor Defense alone will argue the appeal.

If the merits of the quarrel cannot be discussed in the space which The Nation by any conceivable act of generosity could give to it, it is possible to discuss the difference of tactics out of which the quarrel arose and the attitude of mind which each organization displayed and will doubtless continue to display. The N. A. A. C. P. is an organization with a long record of successful championship of Negro rights, particularly in the conduct of court cases. Its membership and its administration are liberal, it is interested in civil liberty for Negroes, it believes in the orderly procedure of protest, newspaper publicity, and legal defense to secure the rights to which Negroes, as well as whites, are entitled. Often it has found that it could best conduct cases relating to Negroes in the South by minimizing its own participation in the cases, believing that white Southern antagonism to a Northern Negro organization would be lessened and the individual Negro victim in question have a better day in court thereby. It successfully carried through to the United States Supreme Court the Arkansas riot cases, the decision of which will be the guiding decision in case either the Alabama Supreme Court or the final federal tribunal decides to reverse the Scottsboro conviction.

What of the International Labor Defense? This organization declares that in the present case it wishes sincerely and solely to save the Negro defendants from execution. To that end, however, it invokes not only the time-honored methods of newspaper publicity and legal action, but it brings in the more complicated issue of the class struggle. The Negro boys are the exploited members of the working class; they are ignorant and poor because the workers are at the mercy of the ruling group; the workers, therefore, by mass-meeting, mass protest, telegrams and letters of disapproval, are urged to register as loudly and as widely as possible their championship of these unfortunate Negro workers and to demand that justice be done them.

This, in brief, expresses the attitudes of the two contending organizations. It is not necessary to take sides with either in order to point out that when principles are so heatedly held and so ardently fought for, the main point at issue, which is that eight black boys less than twenty-one years old shall not be electrocuted for a crime they have by no means been proved to have committed, is likely to be somewhat overlooked. The boys are not in any way able to defend themselves. In shouldering the grave responsibility for their defense the I. L. D. may rest assured that many thousands of persons will watch the case with anxious eyes.

The Art and Mystery of Publishing

MR. O. H. CHENEY, former vice-president of the Irving Trust Company, called in by a group of publishers to diagnose and prescribe for a book business that is not as well as might be, has turned in a 150,000-word report that represents probably the most thorough analysis of the American book business ever made. While the report does not say anything that is completely novel to those within the trade, it does compile statistics that are certain to astonish the average layman. Mr. Cheney finds that less than half of the books on the list of the average publisher produce nearly 90 per cent of his revenue. Statistics on new fiction show that while nine novels in ten sell more than 1,000 copies in their first year, only five in ten sell more than 4,000 copies, only two in ten more than 10,000, and only one in ten more than 20,000. New non-fiction titles are even greater risks, with only six in ten selling more than 1,000 copies, only two in ten more than 3,000, and only one in ten reaching a sale of more than 6,000. Mr. Cheney finds that "the profits of the publishers show an instability second only to that of the returns of the theatrical producers," and concludes that the high percentage of unsuccessful books on the publishers' lists is the result of a policy "subject only to the laws of black magic."

Without attempting here to comment on Mr. Cheney's report as a whole, it is necessary to make certain warnings about it. Mr. Cheney may be entirely right when he argues that the book business is being run chiefly by "economic illiterates" and "incurable romantics," but it is certainly to be hoped that the book business never becomes entirely business-like—at least in the sense in which most other businesses are business-like. The best publishers have always been willing to accept some volumes, not primarily because they thought they would sell, but because they were proud to publish them, even though they were certain in many cases that they would lose money by doing so. This is not to imply that only bad books sell well; for if that were so, the publisher's problem, from the commercial side, would be as simple as if only good books sold well. The problem is simply that there does not appear to be the slightest correlation between the sales of a book and its goodness or badness. Good books sell well and bad books sell well; bad books fail and good books fail. True, certain kinds of goodness in books, as well as certain kinds of badness, achieve a high percentage of success, and a shrewd publisher can guess better on these matters than a stupid one. But the publishing business is essentially a gambling business and likely always to remain one. Intelligence, wide knowledge, and personal discernment will be the chief requirements of the successful publisher in the future as in the past; and Mr. Cheney is profoundly mistaken if he supposes that there are any "scientific" methods of determining in advance what a mercurial book-buying public is going to like. Not while the list of the six best-selling non-fiction books contains "The Stag at Eve" cheek by jowl with James Truslow Adams's "The Epic of America," and makes bedfellows of Eugene O'Neill's "Mourning Becomes Electra" and Culbertson's "Blue Book."

Speaking of Revolution . . .

By HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

I MUST confess that Mr. Ochs's well-known and justly celebrated Sunday supplement gives me great satisfaction. I refuse to wade through his bales of printed matter. He has reduced newspaper writing to the point of anonymity where it is difficult to differentiate it from sheer inanity. He gives us all the facts fit to print. A warehouse containing fifty thousand cans of embalmed chicken bouillon may claim to give us all the soup fit to eat, but I will pass up on that meal and let Luigi get me a single bowl of potage santé, flavored after my own taste and seasoned by his own amiable philosophy of life.

But when it comes to the "pittures"—ah, then we are talking! Or rather the pictures are talking. Not as mere works of the photographer's art, for most of them are exceedingly dull, badly posed, and quite inferior to the art work of the two magazine sections. But for their silent comment upon many interesting little items never mentioned in the news paragraphs, with the headlines Paris or Shanghai or Westchester County, those pictures deserve to be studied much more carefully than is usually the case.

Take the value of these pictorial records as little straws which show the way the wind is blowing. At first the Japanese were preparing for war. The pictures showed us Japanese troops bringing in Chinese prisoners of war, duly garbed in what we were led to believe were regular Chinese uniforms. That was in the days when we still vaguely remembered that a certain ex-Secretary of State by the name of Frank Kellogg had received the Nobel prize for his famous "pact." We did not quite remember what this "pact" had been but it was something in the nature of an international safety-valve. As soon as a number of people got up so much steam that war threatened, there was a loud phoooo-eeeeee, and the Kellogg pact automatically made an end to the disturbance and prevented an explosion.

But somehow or other the Kellogg safety-valve failed to function. Everybody was too polite or too much lacking in honesty to say anything about mere "scraps of paper." Washington ceased to send notes to Tokio about the small barrel of treaties and conventions that had been dropped into the Yellow Sea, and the Japanese Ambassador reassured his dear friends, both north and south of the Potomac, that the whole Manchurian business was nothing but a highly necessary bit of house-cleaning, like that funny little expedition of ours in Nicaragua. "Bandits, Your Excellency and citizens of the great Republic. Just a few bandits and hoodlums."

And behold, the next week the bandits actually made their appearance in the pictorial supplements. Villainous-looking ruffians, scowling gangsters, heavily manacled and closely guarded by neat and spruce Japanese soldiers doing a turn at "police duty."

By now the Manchurian bandit season is in full swing. Several army corps have apparently been mobilized to chase a few dozen bandits. The navy is on the job to bombard the bandits at long range. Guns are being unloaded to protect the trenches from bandit raids. Liebesgaben are being dispatched to the front. The Japanese Red Cross is having its lotus day. The imperial family is presenting gumdrops to victims of the bandits. And the inevitable O-Toyo-San has committed the inevitable hara-kiri that her soldier husband may not be held by domestic ties from chasing bandits.

And now we turn to the second section. There has been a revolution in Spain. When that revolution took place, the papers dug into their morgue and showed us Alfonso aetat. one, two, three, four, five, etc., etc., up to forty-nine. (We are contemporaries and how I used to envy him when his pictures first appeared upon the stamps.) There was one taken when the Hapsburg Hopeful got engaged. You may remember the picture. Alfonso, very Hapsburgish, in a uniform and a riding whip, sitting on a chair, and the lovely English bride with a sailor hat (Queen Mary, vintage 1905) standing right behind him. When that picture reappeared in April of last year, I heard a great deal of comment. After all, what could one have expected of a sovereign who quietly sat on his chair while his affianced bride had to do the standing? I remember that I took the monarch's side. I had just discovered that he was a direct descendant in the twelfth degree of that William of Orange whom his great-great-great-grandfather Philip had ordered to be murdered by a hired assassin. In a way, that made him a compatriot. And I took his side and said that it was an old Spanish custom to have your picture taken that way. But I was squelched, so to speak, by the general indignation of all those present. Yet there was one consolation, so the leader of the opposition declared—Spain was now a republic and woman would at last come into her own.

I hereby offer a vote of thanks to Mr. Ochs for his latest contribution to the debate. He brings us a picture of the first President of Spain and his children, taken in the palace where the pantry is still filled with the latest royally ordered groceries. It is a grand picture. All the Zamora men comfortably seated on the royal chairs and all the Zamora women, uncomfortably erect on their republican legs, standing dutifully behind dear papa and the dear brothers.

A great many things happen in this world but one thing always remains the same—someone is forever sitting on a chair and someone is forever standing behind a chair. Sometimes the two change places, but the chair remains the same.

And all the revolutions in the world cannot change that fact—unless we destroy the chair; and then everybody must stand. That, indeed, is a solution, but if you will pardon me—a hell of a solution!

Patient Germany

By HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Nürnberg, December 23

THE Germans are making brave but rather pitiful preparations to celebrate a cheerless Christmas. As they look forward into the new year, the prospect is one of unrelieved blackness, and not a person with whom I have talked sees a ray of light ahead. Yet after they have told you their personal troubles and perhaps have indicated something of the difficulties that hem in their beloved Fatherland, then almost always, with that incredible patience of theirs, they add a last word: "Hoffentlich geht's besser." Yes, for the sake of Germany and all the rest of the world, it is to be hoped that it will go better, but when and how and whither?

I have just been reading in the press the latest quarterly report of the Institut für Konjunkturforschung, perhaps the best-known German scientific institution for the study of the contemporary economic situation. It ends with December 14, and contains practically final estimates for the year 1931. Its sober statements of fact and opinion are enough to make Moscow chortle with joy. Despite its cheerlessness, it has the advantage of putting the German situation in its place as part of the world picture.

Let us first glance at the setting. The Institute's index of world industrial production, based on the output of 1928 as 100, fell from 83.3 in June of the present year to 79.4 in October. In other words, the world's factories are now turning out a fifth less of actual goods than they were producing three years ago. The Institute figures the fall of prices in the present down-swing at almost 40 per cent, or nearly twice as much as in the period of sharpest price decline during the past sixty years, namely, in the crisis of 1920-21. From 1925 to October of the present year, it finds, the buying power of gold nearly doubled, standing now appreciably above the level of 1913. But instead of the world's money capital having accumulated as a result of the contraction of the past two years, so as to give an impulse for a new upward swing of industry, it declares that the credit resources of the world have been exhausted, and that we are at present, accordingly, in a genuine financial crisis. Every such crisis, according to past experience, ushers in a period of liquidation. The Institute sees no hope in a prolongation of frozen credits, nor does it believe that the transforming of short credits into long ones alone will do much good. The fall of prices must be ended; "therefore, above all, the deflation process must be brought to a stop," and within the gold-standard system the initiative can come only from the creditor countries. On their credit policy, therefore, will depend the development of world economy during the coming months—which would seem to put a heavy responsibility on the statesmen and bankers of the United States and France.

Within this general framework what picture does this report paint of the German situation? The crisis, it declares, has more and more grown out of the realm of the conjunctural and fortuitous. The events in the exchange market, as well as the fall of prices of securities, goods, and real estate, have affected the very fundamentals of currency and credit administration, which stand in pressing need of thoroughgoing reform. The shattering of credit during the summer gave German production and trade a further shove downhill. Industrial output has declined since July by 8.9 per cent. No one thinks of investing any new capital, and even the ordinary necessary replacement of machinery and equipment is increasingly neglected. With all this, the number of bankruptcies has now surpassed the figures of the disastrous winter of 1925-26, being estimated for the present year at no less than 17,000.

Coming to that which more intimately touches popular well-being, the total income of the German people, which in the prosperous year 1928 is estimated to have reached 75,400,000,000 marks and in 1929, 76,200,000,000 marks, fell in 1930 to a figure of from 68,000,000,000 to 70,000,000,000 marks, and in the present year to only 50,000,000,000 to 60,000,000,000 marks—a catastrophic drop of from a fifth to a third within three years. Nor is this simply a decline in money income; it means real goods. The industrial production of the present year is 30 per cent lower than that of 1928, while the volume of building has fallen from 8,900,000,000 marks in 1928 to 4,500,000,000 in 1931, or practically one-half. The unemployed, whose average number in 1928 was 1,391,000, count not less than 4,600,000 on the average for the present year. Of the 21,000,000 workers in Germany, 5,000,000 are now out of work, and the Institute figures on an increase of 750,000 to 1,000,000 during the winter months. Small wonder that the turnover of goods has declined from 134,100,000,000 marks in 1928 to 105,000,000,000 in 1931. Figures such as these tell their own story to anyone who is acquainted with the meaning of statistical material, and is even slightly conversant with the modest standard of comfort attained by the German people in the very best of times.

When we turn to the statistics of foreign trade, another set of interesting and important facts emerges. The figures for the past five years (in billions of marks) are as follows:

	Imports	Exports	Balance
1927.....	13.8.....	11.0.....	-2.8
1928.....	13.6.....	12.4.....	-1.2
1929.....	13.4.....	13.5.....	+0.1
1930.....	10.4.....	12.0.....	+1.6
1931.....	6.7.....	9.6.....	+2.9

During 1927 and 1928 the stream of foreign capital was flowing merrily in; it enabled Germany not only to make "reparation" "payments" (I use both quotes advisedly) but also to buy imports in excess of the value of her exports. As that stream gradually dried up and became insufficient to do more than cover the tribute the Germans had to pay, exports in 1929 balanced imports, and last year, primarily in consequence of the sharp cutting of imports, there was a "favorable" trade balance of 1,600,000,000 marks. This year there has been a disastrous shrinkage of both export and import trade, so that great numbers of trading firms are ruined—but the export balance has jumped to 2,900,000,- 000 marks, representing a genuine payment of interest and "reparations." But it ought never to be forgotten that up to the last two years, in consequence of the rapid inflow of foreign capital, the Germans never actually paid a dollar of the money tribute that was levied on them—that is, paid it in the sense of discharging an obligation and getting rid of it. They simply paid with borrowed money, mortgaging their patrimony and their future ever more deeply in the process. The attempt to make actual payments during the past two years, under existing price relations, has brought German finances and the German government to the existing state of virtual bankruptcy.

But there is no possibility, German financial conditions entirely aside, of a continuation of the recently existing trade situation, in which the world has been getting some blood out of the German turnip. German exports, which were at the low level of 865,800,000 marks in October, pitched downward to 738,200,000 marks in November, the favorable trade balance falling by just the same amount, 127,000,000 marks. Of the export decline, not more than a third is due to seasonal influences. For the rest, it is the countries that have gone off the gold standard that show, as would be expected, the sharpest fall in their takings of German goods, and now the German exporters stand face to face with what is to them the greatest of trade terrors, a British protective tariff. Small wonder that Der Tag, in a front-page article on the subject in its issue of December 16, declares that if the possibility of paying German debts by selling German goods abroad is to be lessened by unfavorable exchange developments and trade restrictions, then Germany may be obliged itself to limit imports in order to maintain its favorable trade balance, "which is necessary in order to guarantee the stability of its currency and to defend it successfully against all attacks from without." Was ever a people more successfully shut up in a squirrel cage and made to run faster and faster for the sake of getting nowhere?

I have made no mention of the Brüning Government's astounding Emergency Decree of December 8, which deserves a volume to itself. Various of the other newspapers share the judgment of Vorwärts that it is the sharpest and most comprehensive interference that has ever been made in economic life by a capitalistic state. Interest, rents, wages, and prices are all to be lowered arbitrarily in varying amounts under varying conditions. Everybody is to be better off, and nobody is to be worse off, and apparently it has not occurred to anybody to ask what it is all about. If capitalists by some mysterious hocus-pocus are to be compensated for lower interest and landlords for lower rents by lower prices, and employing business men for lower prices by lower interest and rents and wages, and laborers for lower wages by lower prices and rents, just where does anybody get off this astonishing merry-go-round? The whole thing is senseless except in its relation to politics, reparations, and foreign trade. If it means anything real at all, it means a desperate effort to cut costs by fiat, thus making possible more exports and therefore more payments of interest and tribute. The throwing into the scales of "Brüning's last reserve" by the raising of the sales tax from 0.85 per cent to 2 per cent in the effort to balance the budget is also, according to the Chancellor's own statement, a springboard for the reparation and debt negotiations. What the actual results of the Emergency Decree are to be, nobody actually knows; what we do know is that it cannot materially increase the ability of the German people to meet foreign obligations.

Meanwhile the Price Commissioner, Dr. Goerdeler, Leipzig's popular Oberbürgermeister, has gone busily to work; various of the cities have already reduced street-car fares and prices of gas and electricity; and arbitrators are busy cutting wages to the decreed level of January, 1927, from which point they had risen considerably by 1930, only to fall again in the present year. In November the wages of skilled male workers in a few of the leading occupations were as follows, stated in marks per hour: coal miners, 1.06; metal workers, 0.89; chemical workers, 1.03; building workers, 1.13; printers, 1.10; textile workers, 0.72; brewery workers, 1.22. Thus the brewery workers, the best-paid of the list, are getting about 29 cents an hour; the textile workers 17 cents, when they have any work. These wages will be reduced from January 1 in amounts estimated at from 8 to 15 per cent in various trades. The decision of the arbitrators in the Rhenish-Westphalian iron industry, the first to be announced for a great industrial district, reduces the wages of skilled workers to 70 pfennigs (about 17 cents) per hour, those of helpers to 55 pfennigs (13 cents). In the light of such figures, there is little need for comment on the possibility of fresh taxes and renewed reparation payments.

And what are the German people doing? For the most part, patiently enduring their privations. For five months I have lived among them, seeing something of almost all classes except the little handful of the rich. I have seen a young miner who has had no work for five years and who has no hope of getting a job again—ever. His father was killed in a mine accident, so his mother draws a pension of thirty marks a month, of which she pays eight for rent. He draws no unemployment benefit, because he is supposed to live with his mother! No wonder he is a Communist. I have seen a well-to-do man of fifty, formerly the proprietor of a good business, now gone. He owns his own house, and the older two of his three children have good positions. They live comfortably, but I notice that in the cold of the North German winter my friend always carries his hands in his pockets. He has no gloves. I have seen a delightful student, the son of a professor, in the last year of a technical college. He had been saving out of his allowance for half a year to get his watch repaired, and had finally given it up. It would have cost seven or eight marks. I will not multiply instances. The three trifling ones I have given suggest the kind of thing I find wherever I go in Germany, with whatever people I talk. They have forgotten about luxuries—a bookbinder told me the other day that in seven years he had had orders for just three leather bindings—and now they are schooling themselves to cut down the necessities. Patient Germany!

In his note of last June to President Hoover, President Hindenburg said: "The possibilities of improving the situation by internal measures, without relief from foreign burdens, are exhausted." The months that have passed since have only confirmed the truth of his statement. Now comes an important French political leader, nameless because he holds public office, to declare in a periodical article, under the caption "Death or Salvation for Europe," that "the whole world, including the public opinion of France, knows that reparations have got a fearful blow." Germany, he declares, cannot pay, and in a few years no one will be able to comprehend "that the statesmen and business leaders of today could contend over annuities and terms of payment, while the very foundations of the world were already shaken to their very center." The Manchester Guardian, in a remarkable editorial demanding that the coming world conference proceed along the broadest lines, declares truly that the present problem is much wider than the German question, important as that is:

We are in a more dangerous situation now, both politically and economically, than we have ever been since the war—not this country alone, but Europe as a whole. Every country is carrying on economic war against its neighbors, though the only thing that will save them is economic co-operation. . . . Economic nationalism has been given its head and is plainly drifting to destruction. Unless we can create a genuine spirit of international cooperation, unless we can think broadly for generous ideals, there is every possibility of a calamity at least comparable to that of the war.

These are words of truth and wisdom; and as I go about among the simple, friendly men and women of this little but great country, now so thoroughly disarmed and despoiled, it is with the daily prayer that for their sakes and ours their patience may be rewarded, that the statesmen of the world, in this hour of world extremity, as the first necessary step in a world program, may at last have the vision, the courage, the simple human kindness to lift from the backs of these suffering, patient people the burdens that are dragging them and us down to destruction. "Hoffentlich geht's besser."

The Crisis Reaches Washington

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, January 9

WE may as well realize that the economic malady of the United States has progressed to a desperate stage, and that those in control of the government are incapable of doing anything to arrest it. The leaders of the Democratic Party can think of nothing but the next Presidential election, and consequently are torn between greedy anticipation and the horrible fear of committing a blunder. The Republicans, except the Progressives, have resigned themselves to despair, and Herbert Hoover has lapsed into utter panic. The condition of the man is really pathetic. He is not altogether responsible for the present state of affairs—he is less to blame for it than Calvin Coolidge and Andrew Mellon—but his fright and general ineptitude have done much to aggravate it. After refusing for nine months to call Congress into extra session, he now plies it with frenzied entreaties to enact all manner of legislative panaceas, many of which apparently came to him on the spur of the moment. There is an abundance of skill and intelligence in the country, but he avails himself of none of it. Instead, he turns for political counsel to such celebrated thinkers as Ray Benjamin, Jimmy Burke, and Simian Fess, while his economic ideas are derived from a succession of financial adventurers and industrial sweaters, most of whom helped to precipitate the present situation. The real brains of the country are not consulted and the nation plunges onward to complete demoralization and wholesale ruin.

the unprecedented load with which this Administration has insisted on burdening it. One hears of a destitute population of more than one million persons fighting starvation and illness in mining villages and camps far removed even from the pitiful benevolences of community chests and organized poor relief. We find there are at least 7,000,000 workers totally unemployed, and an equal number working on skeleton schedules. Governor Pinchot warns of incipient riots unless the federal government acts quickly, and a Communist leader boldly announces that "we intend to organize the unemployed to go out and fight in the streets—we intend to make it damned uncomfortable for those who refuse to help the unemployed." What is the Administration's response to these awful danger signals? In the main, it consists in a proposal to lend money to banks and railroads, and in a succession of shrieks against the "dole." Well, unless I misread the signs, the Ides of March will not pass before Mr. Hoover is confronted with an appropriation for unemployment relief—and I prophesy that he will be glad to sign it. Indeed, by that time he probably will be glad to do almost anything that offers hope.

DESPITE the hopeful chirping of the New York financial writers, Hiram Johnson's cross-examination of the international bankers already has produced sensational disclosures. Not only has he revealed that many of the great (and supposedly respectable) investment houses of this country engaged in a greedy scramble for opportunities to unload foreign securities on the American public, but he has discovered that these issues were floated with the approval of the State Department, in the face of printed warnings from the Commerce Department! But that is not the worst of it. Take the case of Colombia, whose precarious financial and economic condition had been sternly described in a Commerce Department bulletin. Three large American banking houses decided, notwithstanding, to extend a loan of $20,000,000. Prior to this time the Colombian government had revoked an oil concession to the Gulf Company, owned by the Mellon family. After being told by the State Department that there was "no political objection" to the loan, the banks put

TO appreciate the extremes of the debacle, one needs to attend the hearings which Senators La Follette and Costigan are conducting on unemployment. The picture is appalling. One learns that the suicide rate has nearly doubled in the past year, that insanity cases are multiplying, that there is a heavy increase in child mortality from ailments induced by malnutrition, that thousands of girls are being driven into prostitution, that in countless instances family life has virtually disappeared under the compulsion of "doubling up" and overcrowding, that juvenile delinquency is increasing, and that the whole established system of welfare work and local charity is tottering toward collapse under it through, whereupon the Colombian government restored the oil concession to Secretary Mellon's company! It is impossible here even to summarize the record which the inquiry has disclosed. The course of the State Department in giving its consent to the flotation of these blue-sky foreign loans impelled Senator Glass to exclaim that the federal government "was morally responsible for every cent of the two billion dollars which American citizens have lost." Yet in the face of the evidence, these financiers lecture the Senate and dilate upon their own virtue. I would wager all my Bolivian bonds against one copy of a Hoover prosperity oration that during the forty years in the wilderness Moses never used the word "moral" as often as Otto Kahn used it in one afternoon. Reversing an opinion recently expressed here, I must confess that I prefer hard-boiled men like Charlie Mitchell and Clarence Dillon, or that charming realist James Speyer, who whispered: "We are in the business to make a profit, Senator." Incidentally, one notes that the New York financial writers have vanished from the scene. The places of such little brothers of the rich as B. C. Forbes have been taken by journeymen reporters.

BUT all is not tragedy and gloom in the Washington madhouse. For amusement one can always turn to the antics of Bob Lucas, master-mind of the Republican National Committee. It is impossible to remain permanently angry at the fellow; he is too funny. Recently he prepared a speech charging the Democrats with publishing "scandal books by unnamed authors." Requested to specify, he replied that the books he had in mind were "The Strange Career of Mr. Hoover," by John Hamill, and "The Great Mistake," by John Knox. Not only do the names of the authors appear on the covers of both books, but Lucas mentioned their names in his explanation. It was the most diverting performance he has given since his public announcement that "Prime Minister Grotius of Germany" would soon visit America in the interest of world peace. On that occasion the most thorough search of Germany failed to reveal any such office as that of "Prime Minister," or any official named Grotius. Subsequently it developed that Bob was thinking of Dr. Julius Curtius, the German Foreign Minister, who resigned two days later after explaining that he had never expressed any intention of visiting the United States. As to the books, wonderment does not cease. They contain many statements about Mr. Hoover's past life which, if untrue, constitute plain cases of criminal libel. Yet the Department of Justice has started no prosecution against the authors or publishers, and apparently has no intention of doing so. Why doesn't it?

I HAVE often betrayed a deep aversion to the personal ethics and official practices of Andrew Mellon. My conviction survives that during the past ten years he has been the most powerful individual influence for evil in this Republic. But now it is tinged with a certain pity. Every informed person in Washington knows that Ogden Mills is in absolute control of the Treasury. Hoover consults him constantly. When it is necessary to present the department's views to Congress, Mills is the official spokesman. Nobody consults Uncle Andy. Lonely, hurt, neglected, he lingers on in the twilight of a reputation which would shine today with redoubled splendor if only he had possessed the canniness which prompted his real affinity, Calvin Coolidge, to get out while the getting was good.

If I Were Dictator*

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

IF I were dictator? Well, I am sure that what I have to say will disappoint many readers who look for far more radical and violent changes than I have to suggest. I am conscious that the immediate remedies that offer themselves to me will seem lacking both in originality and in thoroughness, perhaps because I have not lost faith in democracy or the workability of our institutions, provided that these are adjusted to modern economic, social, and political conditions. The fault, in my judgment, has been less with the economic and political system under which we have lived than with the men that we have chosen to work it. But the evolution of capitalism has given ever-increasing opportunities for the selfishness and greed of the average human being in industry and politics, and these traits are bringing down the structure. We in America have learned the bitter lesson that uncontrolled individualism, whether rugged or otherwise, leads but to despair.

If I were dictator I should begin in the field of international relations, since it is in that field that we are today most menaced by conditions which not only threaten the peace of the world, but make an early recovery from the economic chaos impossible. I should first of all muster out the fleet, laying it up as did Thomas Jefferson when President, and reduce the regular army to the police force of 25,000 men which it was at the outbreak of the war with Spain. I should retire every single one of the talking generals and admirals and send them all to Guam with the direction that they put that island into a state of 100 per cent preparedness and play at war maneuvers to their heart's content. Resuming the historic American attitude of being unarmed and unafraid, I should say to the rest of the world: "See how genuinely pacific we are. We have done away with the arts of war, have ceased to teach our soldiers how best to disembowel their fellow-men or how to kill innocent women and children by the use of aerial bombs and poison gas, which are not selective in dealing death and destruction. We are ready to take the risks of peace. We have faith not only in our own moral strength; we know that in modern war there are neither victors nor vanquished, but that all suffer alike, and that less than ever can one be assured that the heaviest battalions and the best generals will be on the side of right."

If I were dictator I should abolish every tariff because

* The last of a series of articles on this subject.—EDITOR THE NATION.

I know that the rapid rise of the three great industrial nations of modern times has been due chiefly to the fact that within their respective empires it has been free trade that has made them powerful and prosperous. Particularly I should say that this is true of the United States; that if tariffs are the blessings they are said to be, then we should surround every one of the forty-eight States of the Union with those magic walls which are supposed to raise the standard of living and bestow prosperity upon all inside their circle. I should put an end to the abomination that we must protect all trade within purely arbitrary geographic lines. I should first of all abolish the sugar tariff against Cuba, an island almost within sight of our shores, whose sugar would come into our country free and untaxed if the American flag floated over Morro Castle in Havana; instead of which, merely because Cuba is outside of our national lines, we raise the price of sugar to every man, woman, and child, and destroy the value of great American investments in that island. Also we help to reduce the working masses in that country to misery and despair, and help to render them the helpless and hapless victims of a ruthless dictator—merely in order to insure profits for some of our citizens who unnecessarily entered the sugar business at home.

If I were dictator I should serve notice upon Japan that if she did not withdraw within her former lines in Manchuria I should invoke an international boycott to compel her to do so, and, to demonstrate that I meant what I said in all sincerity, I should withdraw every last American soldier from Haiti, Nicaragua, Cuba, Samoa, and the Philippines. I should free the latter before their inhabitants had time to petition me for this action and so live up to our pledged national word. Then I should offer to China every possible help in the way of financial aid and expert advice and service to enable that harassed country to constitute a strong and honest central government. I should immediately recognize the Russia of the Soviets with every gesture of friendship and good-will to the Russian people. I should not be afraid of communism because I should set out really to constitute an honest and efficient government for the United States, one responding to the will of the American people as expressed through the initiative and referendum, and I am bold enough to believe that if I could have my way, our own system of government as reconstituted would not only challenge comparison with the Soviet program, but would seem infinitely more desirable so long as the Soviet Government is a bloody-handed class dictatorship.

To accomplish this I should do everything in my power to bring about economic equality, and equality before the law. As I do not believe in prisons as they now are constituted, I should relegate to prison farms every single American official—and their number runs into thousands upon thousands—who violates the law, believes himself superior to it, and connives at the abuse of personal liberties by men in the garb of police officers or in that of civil authority. For I believe that the chief explanation of our being the most lawless civilized nation is to be found in the fact that we have more lawless officials sworn to uphold the law than any other nation on earth.

I should remove from the statute books by one stroke of the pen every law regulating the private morals of individual citizens. I should declare that, however men and women behaved in their relations with one another, it was their own affair, save where the public peace was disturbed. I should, however, continue and increase the control of the sale of narcotics, and my government would be as rigid as that of the Soviets in preventing the exploitation of the bodies of women for the gain of individuals. Censors of literature, art, or the theater would be my special game. I have long wondered where would be the proper place in which to exile the censors and snoopers, and then it came to me—the Virgin Islands! I should seek to find a method of dispensing liquors and wines in a way rigidly to control the drink habit, so that men should not profit by catering to that appetite of their fellow-men which undeniably has done more than any other one thing to fill our jails, our hospitals, and our asylums. I should appeal to my subjects to join me in treating alcohol from the same standpoint as that from which we treat the abuse of drugs, believing that unlimited use of alcohol is almost as much a danger to the race as is unlimited use of opium.

I should at once tackle the disgraceful statistics which reveal to all the world that the death-rate in childbirth is higher in the United States than anywhere else. I should follow the policy advocated by Governor Alfred E. Smith of New York when he asked the legislature to see to it that every community in his State received adequate medical and nursing care, and I should make it possible for the poor to have not only adequate medical care, but the dental service of which they are today deprived because it is beyond their means. And, of course, I should make free for all the necessary information as to birth control. I should free our schools from the domination of all the politicians and all the priests. I should introduce self-government not only among the scholars, but among the teachers, and I should not only guarantee absolute freedom of teaching but see to it that every new or old ism was carefully explored within the classrooms of school and college. One of my first steps would be to make impossible the control of our colleges by boards of trustees comprising wealthy men devoted chiefly to the old order of society and to the prevention of the teaching of new doctrines and new theories of economic and political life. I should read to each board of university trustees the famous words of Patrick Henry: "Give me liberty, or give me death," and then give them their choice. I should ask them not to come to me to explain that there are "certain things" that must not be laid before the "immature minds of undergraduates," and that there must be some limits to liberty and free speech lest they degenerate into license. If anyone sneaked through into my audience chamber and began to address me with the words: "I believe in liberty and freedom, but there are limits," I should immediately sentence him to twenty-five years on my most northern Alaskan prison farm, in company with all those benighted citizens who might appeal to me to continue intercollegiate athletic contests under present conditions. William Green and Matthew Woll of the American Federation of Labor I should designate as Governor and Deputy Governor of the Aleutian Islands. For Mr. Hoover and his Cabinet, and other talkers of economic nonsense, I should reserve the Island of Yap with the requirement that morning and evening they should meet together to inform one another that prosperity is just around the corner, and that every day in every way things are getting better and better.

Then I should give my attention to the revision of our own government, to vital alterations in our Constitution, a noble document, admirably constructed for the use of thirteen struggling States along the Atlantic seaboard when they did not know their own hinterland, when not one citizen had yet crossed the continent overland. I should change the Constitution so that the state should take over and operate, either directly or through some government corporation like the Mississippi Waterways Corporation, the railroads, the pipe-lines, the telephone and telegraph, the radio, the mines, the oil wells, water power, and all other natural resources, thus making enormous savings, closing avenues to the making of excessive fortunes, and destroying the foothold of many masters of privilege. By income taxes and inheritance taxes I should make impossible the transmission from one generation to another of swollen fortunes. I should enormously lighten the burden of taxation by having the profits of public utilities go into the pockets not of stockholders, but of the communities which operate them, or into a general treasury. In other words, I should endeavor to create social control of institutions as a source of funds for a progressive social policy. I should further reduce the expenses of government by saving almost entirely the $750,000,000 now devoted to the annual upkeep of the army and navy. I should seek in every way to redeem my country from the stigma placed upon its common sense by the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, when he twice declared in his annual reports that 85 cents out of every dollar raised by taxation now goes to wars past and future.

With the money so saved and earned and raised, I should rebuild our cities so that every slum would disappear. I should frankly and boldly imitate the Russian government in that I should stress above all else the welfare, the prosperity, and the happiness of the plain people of Abraham Lincoln. Instead of making this a government by and for the well-to-do and rich, I should make it a government primarily concerned with the welfare of the toiling masses, and I should let the rich go hang. The ablest men that I could find I should set to the problem of the farmer, gradually and voluntarily bringing about the creation of great co-operative farms, and working out the problem of large industrial agricultural enterprises versus individual farming. I should find some way of eliminating the middleman so that the farmer living within forty miles of our greatest cities would no longer get between three and five cents a quart for the milk that sells at around fifteen on the streets of the metropolis.

Turning to the States, I should so devise their constitutions as to abolish the bicameral legislatures along the lines of a plan suggested by Senator Norris, creating a single chamber of some twenty-four members, more in the nature of a governor's council, to be elected without benefit of party. I should take every office now bestowable by a politician and put it under rigid civil-service rules. So with our municipalities, I should eliminate politics and make the office of mayor a scientific job to be held by professional mayors freed from all political control, precisely as is the case today in Germany, instituting local referendums that the people might vote upon policies. Judges I should put to work, real work, and I should make them simplify the processes of law so that they would be humanized and speeded up, as is the case in England; and, as is the case in Russia, I should abolish the death penalty, and go farther than Russia by abolishing it for political offenses as well. Divorce would be, as now in Spain and in Russia, by mutual consent, and as in both those countries, there would no longer be any distinction, legal or social, between children born in or out of wedlock.

As for the immediate emergency, I should at once introduce the five-day week, and remove from industry all children under the age of eighteen. I should institute a scientific system of unemployment insurance, and make the system of old-age pensions recently adopted in New York State nationwide. To take care of the existing unemployment, I should immediately sell a bond issue running into the billions and utilize the proceeds for great public works, and especially for the rebuilding of our cities so that no city dweller should remain in dark and unsanitary quarters. Planning? Of course. Not only for caring for the unemployed today but for a general overhauling of the economic system in the belief that it is not overproduction but underdistribution which is troubling us and especially to prevent the recurrence of depressions like these. Naturally this would entail first of all planning to end the enormous waste of the competitive system in such an industry, for example, as that of the makers of rubber tires or of the producers of oil. But the most important means of ending the existing economic crisis would be those measures for the regulation of international trade, including means of putting an end to the hurtful heaping up of gold in this country, which I have already outlined, the abolition of tariffs, the forgiving of debts and reparations, complete disarmament, and the ending of the rule of fear and suspicion and hatred among peoples—at least so far as our example could bring this to pass.

By this time, I am sure, more than half the people of this Republic would have risen against me; the generosity of my dictatorship would be too much for them to stand. But one last thing I should strive to do before I was led off to the guillotine. I should close two-thirds of the churches of the country, allowing only those to remain open that were absolutely dedicated to peace at any price, whose ministers agreed that they would go to prison—our present type of prison abomination if you please—for life before one word of approval of mass killing should cross their lips. They would have to promise, moreover, to preach but one sermon a year dedicated to abstract theological doctrine. The rest of their time they would have to give over to social endeavor, to true spiritual leadership, according to the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth, preaching sermons directly connected with the problems of society and the practical welfare of those about them. Finally, just to show that I was human and therefore extremely inconsistent, I should once more turn censor myself and abolish lip-sticks, high-heeled shoes, silk hats, all remaining Ford cars of the original model, the Navy League, the Civic Federation, and the Protective Tariff League, not to mention Ballyhoo, College Humor, the tabloids, and the Saturday Evening Post. I should send Henry Ford himself, with his humbug reputation as a model employer of labor, to join the heads of the American Federation of Labor in the Aleutian Islands.

If these things that I have outlined seem inadequate to some, too radical to others, as well as inconsistent, please remember that I have none the less stressed liberty in all the relations between human beings, and that I have had no other object in view than social, economic, and political equality. In other words, I have suggested nothing which does not seem to me in keeping with the true spirit of American institutions, with democracy and the desire for life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Sometime, soon it is to be hoped, we must come to some such recasting of our governments—city, State, and national; if we do not, then we may be sure that a totally new system, whether that be communist or something else, will have to be devised to insure equality of opportunity and of life, to curb and restrict greed and appetite for wealth, and to end all the special privileges which have been established under our modern industrial system and our government—as it has been perverted from the control of the masses into the hands of the dominating few.

Portrait of Undergraduate Yale

By RICHARD S. CHILDS

I
MISCONCEPTION brewed by generalities and much nonsense has distorted the common picture of undergraduate life. For one acquainted with the mass of reading matter on College Life in America there is little to be observed in New Haven to strengthen the validity of the usual assumptions. "Collegiatism" as popularly conceived is heartily despised. Fraternity life is important only through sophomore year as marking a tentative social recognition, and "houses" are frequented mostly as a refuge from the toasted-bun and coffee fare of New Haven Smoke Shops. The national brethren are apt to scowl on Yale. Old graduates bemoan the passing of something known as College Spirit. While the old-Ford-rah-rah-painted-slicker figure of collegiate mythology has not been replaced by that of the passionate scholar, a new figure has arisen, drawing its life from within the confines of York and College Streets, that, with allowances made for the inevitable caricature resulting from generalities, may be fairly described as the Yale undergraduate.

"You did not come to Yale for an education. If you had wanted only that you could have gone to some other place. You came here for other reasons: because your father did, because you had friends coming, or because of the contacts you could make here. You came for the real things that Yale and no other place could offer you." Not in mockery, not as broad satire, but earnestly were these words spoken by a graduate not so very many weeks ago. He was not an older graduate dreaming of the '90's; he was a young man. Just out of Yale. Just in business. He knew. He was believed and applauded by his undergraduate listeners.

Now, Yale is not the same university it was last year, the year before that. Year by year it has been making and will continue to make a little sandier the greased slide of minimum credit requirements. Reading periods and a postponement of midyear examinations this year show that the educational veneer is to be thickened by a layer or two, and New Haven tutoring schools and cramming institutions will become correspondingly enriched. All of this is so—yet it is only by realizing the full significance of the words "You did not come to Yale for an education" that any perspective may be gained on the undergraduate of today—and probably of tomorrow. Perspective is essential in a portrait. Educational systems will come and go. But the subject of our portrait will remain constant, and these same key words will continue to give meaning to an otherwise paradoxical spectacle as long as systems exist intended to care for young men whose main reason for being in college is to partake primarily of a university's social facilities, to make their bow of conformity to a fetish of American so-called upper classes.

Forget for a moment the nouveau riche blatancy of Gothic buildings and assume that Yale is a university where young men are gathered who thirst not only for knowledge but also for the inspiration that comes from contact with the creativeness of the past, where teachers are in their own minds still students, a little farther along the way perhaps and eager to indicate the paths they have discovered. Make this assumption, and Yale the reality becomes immediately meaningless, open to violent criticism. Incredulity, indignation, and amazement must swim together confusingly before the spectacle of 3,000 undergraduates in daily forced attendance in the lecture rooms of New Haven, suspected, checked, tested, and ranked according to a still hovering form-routine—the privilege of education still held a doubtful one by teacher and scholar alike. Are the unfit and uninterested a university's concern? Can men be hired to face daily insult on the lecture platform? The whole thing is a nightmare! A travesty on educational ideals! "What is it for? What is it for?" must be the cry.

Yet such protests, while constantly recurring, are quite empty. They unnecessarily confuse matters because they spring from a wrong premise, that Yale College is exclusively an institution of higher education. Return to the key words, "You did not come to Yale for an education," and all swings into line with a certain inevitability. Confusion vanishes. Systems and methods of teaching become clear, tacit affirmers of the same attitude. And at last, in this light, the Yale undergraduate is understandable. And sympathy should follow understanding.

"If a man by his years at Yale learns to live more richly and more happily, he has not spent his time in vain. The measure of success is not a lot of canned knowledge, but the ability to get out and do something. The social side of his life at Yale is often more important to his development than his classes." It is essential that this point of view, one recently expressed in an editorial in the Yale Daily News, be fully grasped with all its implications. Yale and her undergraduates can never be torn from the background of American society on which they are patterned, and separately examined, if anything approaching comprehension is to result. To contrast present conditions with ideals of pure learning is hopeless at the outset and can only distort a not too horrible picture. Social life—learning to live through experience with other men, the chance to do something whether it be on the field of sport, in journalism, or what not, the opportunity to get somewhere through making friends, establishing contacts—is the end-all of the American university and of Yale. And knowledge is forever “canned”; where, after ■ certain point, does it get you?

If the aim of four years of college is to create socially pleasant young men able to get along with their fellows, ready to accept the mode of living as they find it, to shoulder the burdens such acceptance implicitly imposes upon them, then Yale, by affording opportunity for training in community life, does its duty well. Undergraduate Yale knows very well what it is about. Education is ■ necessary stumbling-block to be tripped over willy-nilly on the path toward the real things of Yale. Philosophically, however, the undergraduate feels some good may come of it all. He has great faith. He has faith in the good that may be derived from Pictorial Art, Geology, Classical Civilization, and Elementary Economics, indiscriminately. Each, if marks are kept up—it really doesn't matter how—will turn into credits. Credits mean a diploma. A diploma means education. That a certain amount of education is good, America, swarming with packed universities, home-study courses, and five-foot book shelves will testify. Under new systems actual study seems to be increasingly demanded. The student is willing that it should be so, provided not too much time is required. Education must be kept in its place lest it should become confusing.

II

Extra-curricular activities are the basis of the real things. They are lent added depth and meaning through associations and traditions peculiar to Yale. The most miserably lost person in New Haven is he who, without the original social prestige of a well-known preparatory school behind him, without the zeal of scholarly pretention to bolster him, is unable to state with any definiteness just what he is doing. Yale's “big men” possess the virtues of those in society at large. They are safe, sane, and, according to their own standards, open-minded. They have all been successful “doers.”

It is natural that extra-curricular Yale, one foot planted in Eastern preparatory schools, the other in Wall Street, should mirror the social and religious organizations, the publications, the athletic interests of the one, magnified to strange monsters by the heavy seriousness and intensity of the other. These are the absorbents of Yale's youthful energy. The social Yale is Andover, Hotchkiss, what you will, on a large and business-conscious scale. Her undergraduate leaders are the leaders from such centers of high culture and liberal education. They are the men incoming freshmen look to for guidance and advice. They are the men who emphasize and make part of the very atmosphere of New Haven the necessity for extra-curricular activities in “spare” time. And spare time in their eyes is all time not spent in the classroom. And they are right, too. Education for them might well be ■ dusty, life-sucking adventure. Yale, inevitably, under the tyranny of college boards, must open her arms to such—though she wonders, rather ingenuously perhaps, why she is signally successful in turning out ■ large majority of Wall Street runners, bond salesmen, and young gentlemen with exceptionally bright prospects in the insurance and advertising lines.

It would be misleading, even in an article so shamelessly given to generalities as this, to imply that extra-curricular activities are dependent for their dominating position on men who are socially “on the make.” Fraternities and senior societies may dignify the successful conclusion of an undergraduate athletic, social, or publishing career, though election is by no means limited by mere external merit. An athletic director may preach the educational value of athletics. The News may sublimate ■ heeling campaign by featuring the “business experience” to be gained, the contacts to be made. Dwight Hall may send out its service-to-humanity appeal. But in the end social prestige and alluring catch phrases are in themselves meaningless, pure rationalizations. They are the garnishings, the a posteriori justifications and exaltations, of an existent undergraduate urge, one that is unable or unwilling to exhaust itself intellectually in the classroom or in outside study. Hence the glorification of non-intellectual pursuits at Yale. They are the tests by means of which a man proves himself. And to be head of an organization, a publication, captain of a team, represents no slight achievement.

Undergraduate society has fashioned ■ God in its own image and worship before Him is felt to be a bounden duty. Salvation is attained through works. And the blessed, indeed, may be laying up just rewards for themselves, storing riches in the other world, the one just beyond graduation. A high and sacred priesthood has arisen to insure the preservation of the gentlemanly ideals worshiped by this society.

But here again lies the danger of misconception. Because scholars and scholarships are not the rule, because intellectual interests are not insisted upon, it must not be assumed that they are taboo, even in the society of the elect.

III

For the normal undergraduate, then, the all-mighty and non-existent average man, somewhat immature, frankly uninterested in books and their offerings, Yale does and pretends to do very little intellectually. That a university B.A. or Ph.D. degree is of purely social significance is generally recognized. But here too it must be realized that Yale, contrary to the practice of many of her contemporaries, at least provides the outline of a liberal education that does not sink to the fantastic absurdities of salesmanship and, to borrow from Flexner, ad hoc courses. Yale standards are such that she feels content if she can turn out thoroughly sound and worth-while members of American society. She must provide for men whose intellectual diet has been a preaching of conformity, hard, clean playing on athletic fields, and good citizenship, from earliest boarding-school days on. Such is the conception of “leader” manufacture in America.

But there is another side of undergraduate Yale which has not been touched upon until now because it can contribute only the finer shadings to ■ blatantly general portrait. There are those at Yale who have become firmly convinced, not of the value of its social training, not of the spurious importance of costly buildings, but of the purely intellectual and educational opportunities it affords. If such men can live through the first two years of banal “prep”-school routine and generally low-grade instruction without experiencing ■ revulsion of vicious disgust toward the university and the pretentiousness of its very name, they will be amazed to find themselves in a place where a genuine interest is taken in them and in their aims. And if they are lucky enough to come in contact before this with some of the more forward-looking men on the faculty, they may even be spared any long period of disillusionment. Yale does provide for its scholars. And this is important. It is a fact seldom taken into account in many of the criticisms most pardonably launched at its system in general.

After two years the scholar is at last free to follow up a special line of interest, free from the burden of requirements, in Honors work. Even if he does not qualify or is not interested in Honors, leeway is occasionally granted to genuine interest. Requirements are not invariably iron-bound. And there are men of brilliance not only to stimulate him but to take a personal interest in his work.

Furthermore, the inevitable looseness of social organization in so large a community as undergraduate Yale is especially favorable to the need of the scholar and nonconformist. For such a man the social pressure of the smaller university does not exist. The obnoxious ghost of collegiatism need not haunt him. Tolerance, while it may be sheer indifference in undergraduate Yale, is at least real in the faculty and administrative heads. There is no such thing as censorship of publications. Yale is always a free place in which to work, inspiring if only the individual wishes to make it so. But, as in few other universities, the writer, the artist, the debater, the college liberal are accepted by public opinion at their true value. And while such men may be regarded as "queer" and are not always asked to "play," yet as a rule by the end of four years it is only through exaggeration of their own sensitiveness that they need experience the noble pain of social ostracism. Undergraduate Yale is undeniably friendly.

In general, Yale feels that she does give a well-rounded training for the usual requirements of outside life. A majority of her graduates and undergraduates agree with her in this. And if they are conservative, doubtful of new plans, if they are scornful of criticism and somewhat self-consciously above it, it is because they fear that something they have known in common with others and instinctively feel to be fine, and as such to be cherished and preserved, is in danger of being torn from their lives.

Pasadena Lights Its Own

By WILLIAM SIDNEY

A STOUNDING profits from the municipally owned and operated light and power plant of Pasadena, California, have made it possible for the city to construct, within a three-year period, a million-dollar civic auditorium, a $200,000 police station, $125,000 golf links, and a branch library. Thus, the light department has been correctly termed "Pasadena's civic loan bank."

This unique light plant, established twenty-five years ago on such a slender shoestring that it was necessary to use pie tins for street-light reflectors, has now earned in net profits as much as $708,025 in a single year, while maintaining the lowest rates in California and one of the three or four lowest rates in the entire United States. Besides financing civic improvements with its profits, and at the same time furnishing current at such a low rate that the majority of housewives can afford labor-saving electrical devices, the light department provides employment for 230 breadwinners in a city of 76,047 inhabitants. Also, through selling light bulbs to its patrons at cost, the department saves them $40,000 annually.

By loaning a total of $615,000 of its profits to the general fund of the city when the fund became depleted before taxes were paid, the municipal light department made it possible in the last three years for Pasadena to secure valuable cash discounts on purchase of supplies. Not long ago $18,036 of the profits was used to finance the installation of flood lights in the Rose Bowl, scene of classic East-West football games and first stadium on the Pacific Coast to be used for night games.

After a majority of Pasadenans had twice voted in favor of a bond issue for municipal golf links and the proposition had failed for lack of a two-thirds' majority, the light department loaned $125,000 for the project. Taxpayers who feared the loan was the first step in carrying out a plot to wreck the financial structure of the light department through bleeding it of reserves for future expansion tried to obtain an injunction to halt construction of the course, but failed. Income from greens fees went up to $64,414 a year, however, of which $8,866 was repaid to the department. For more than ten years business interests had made every effort to obtain a civic auditorium that would draw large conventions to Pasadena. There seemed little hope of realization of the project until the light department, again in the role of the municipal Santa Claus, loaned $600,000, or about half the total cost of the structure. The auditorium is expected to be completed soon.

Another needed civic improvement, now realized through application of light-plant profits, is the new $200,000 police station and jail. The financing was made possible when the light department furnished $125,000 for the project by paying that exorbitant sum for the old tumble-down police headquarters. Among the sufficient proofs that Pasadena's light department virtually had become the city's own loan bank is its recent purchase for $19,750 of vacant city property; proceeds from the sale made possible the erection of a new branch library in a public park. Including the $615,000 loaned to tide the city over the period before taxes were paid, the department has advanced a total of $1,479,750 to the city within three years. If this sum is ever repaid with interest, a surprise is in store for friends of the municipal plant. At the present time the average light and power rates charged by Pasadena for various types of service are as follows: homes and stores, four and a small fraction cents per kilowatt hour; street lighting, three cents; and power, two cents.

The total cost of producing and delivering a kilowatt hour of current, exclusive of interest and depreciation, is a trifle more than one cent. Thus, the Pasadena plant can deliver current for three cents and still earn at least some surplus for expansion. It has been estimated that current from the Boulder Dam project cannot be delivered here for less than 3.77 cents per kilowatt hour.

When, in 1906, after a dispute with the Southern California Edison Company, which monopolized the field, Pasadena city officials decided to establish a municipally owned lighting plant, residents were paying the private corporation for lighting current at the rate of fifteen cents per kilowatt hour, about four times as high a rate as that brought about through intelligent municipal ownership. The high officials and 70 per cent of the stockholders of the Southern California Edison Company resided in Pasadena, so it is surprising, not that the first bond issue for the project carried by only thirty-two votes, but that it carried at all. As considerable time was required to sell this initial $125,000 bond issue, the first actual capital was $52,000 that was levied and collected from general taxes. A few teams of horses and mules were purchased, and until adequate capital was forthcoming, ordinary pie tins were wired to the wooden street-lighting poles as reflectors.

After a bitter struggle marked by the failure of municipal-ownership foes to frighten the taxpayers by charges that the city "had gone socialistic," Pasadena offered in 1909 to purchase the plant and lines of the Edison Company within the city. The offer was ignored and the ensuing decade of sharp competition was featured by attempts of the private corporation to force the municipal plant out of business by lowering its own rates gradually from fifteen cents to four cents. Whenever the city lowered its rates, as justified by earnings, the Edison Company proceeded to undercut them, absorbing its losses by means of the profits of its plants located in other part of Southern California. Although in 1913 the city's rate was five cents, a cent higher than the Edison rate, Pasadenans, stirred by the slogan "Remember the fifteen-cent rate," were supporting the municipal plant in increasing numbers. Since then the number of consumers has risen from 5,000 to 30,696. In 1920, by a seven-to-one vote, the people of Pasadena decided to buy out the Edison's system in the city. At that time the municipal plant had 12,000 consumers, three times as many as its competitor. Having failed by propaganda and rate slashing to stifle the growth of its young competitor, the private corporation accepted the $500,000 offered and withdrew from the field.

Benjamin F. DeLanty, veteran superintendent of the municipal plant, reported actual profits for the year 1929-30 as $708,025. This total includes $65,000 spent for work properly chargeable to other city departments. The present rates in the city are so low that a family may burn five or six bulbs until midnight, operate a small washing machine, a radio, a vacuum cleaner, and an electric iron, and keep its monthly bill for electric current below $2.50. The minimum monthly charge is fifty cents. The total bonded indebtedness is $452,283, the capital assets being reported as $5,346,264, the difference, $4,893,980, being the amount put into the plant and distributing lines from earnings.

In justice to the Southern California Edison Company, it should be noted that its present rates are reputed to be about as low as those of any other private power corporation in the United States. The Edison rate in Los Angeles and vicinity starts at five cents, while the municipal rate is graduated downward from four and one-half cents. Thus, an Edison patron pays $50 for the first 1,000 kilowatt hours of current used, compared to $39 charged the Pasadena plant's patron for the same current. For 5,000 kilowatt hours, the private corporation charges $200, compared with the charge of $143.50 by the municipally owned plant.

The total capacity of the Pasadena plant is 34,500 kilowatts, and ground was broken recently for another unit which ultimately will almost double the present capacity. This million-dollar addition, like the present plant, will be paid for out of earnings without asking taxpayers for one penny.

From the standpoint of technical efficiency and lack of dependence upon private fuel corporations, Pasadena's plant is in an enviable position despite the fact that it uses steam instead of water power to generate its electrical output. Either crude oil or natural gas may be burned to produce the steam, the energy of which is later transformed into electric current. In the unlikely event that neither oil nor gas can be secured from the private corporations at reasonable prices, coal may be used as a substitute after necessary adjustments are made. Although cities in the Northwest which have the good fortune to possess water power in their back yards should be able, theoretically at least, to generate current more cheaply than Pasadena's steam plant, it is the steam plant which must come to the rescue of the hydroelectric plant when stream levels fall during a drought.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter, being tender-hearted himself, is tender toward others. He once said grace at the request of certain pious acquaintances who had invited him to dinner, and his politeness extends even to corporate personalities. Like Frank Sullivan, he feels uncomfortable at not replying to a touching appeal from the Messrs. Rogers-Peet, and every time he gets a slightly pained notice from one of the department stores concerning his failure to make full use of the credit facilities which the said corporation has been kind enough—and rash enough—to grant him, he feels like writing a polite note to Mr. Wanamaker or Mr. Gimbel begging the gentleman to believe that he is not ungrateful, and that he will try to do better next month. He cannot get over the feeling that some representative of Liggett and Myers would be just a little bit hurt if he should suddenly "switch to Old Golds," and he is perfectly sure that if he were ever given a blindfold test he would do his very best to give the right answer.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■

IT is in view of this fact that he was particularly pleased to learn recently that he is right in his assumption; that even great corporations can have their sensibilities wounded; and that even the Western Union—which many think of as mere copper wires and bloated directors—has feelings like anybody else. What happened was this. A ribald friend handed into one of the suboffices of the company the following message to a friend in the West: "Please accept Western Union Christmas Greetings Numbers 7, 9, and 15." He then went quietly home and was even obtuse enough not to get the point when he received a polite telephone call to inquire if the office was right in assuming that what he wanted sent was the canned greetings corresponding to those numbers. He replied that he wanted the message sent exactly as it had been written, and it was not until a second call arrived that he realized his rudeness. "It is the opinion of this office," said a pained voice, "that you are merely trying to make fun of the company."

NOW if it had been the Drifter himself, he would certainly have apologized profusely, but some of the Drifter's friends are very crude persons and this one replied only: "That is exactly what I am doing, but since the message contains nothing treasonable, obscene, or libelous you will transmit it exactly as I turned it in or I'll have the law on you." And so the message was sent, while the wires blushed and the great corporation went metaphorically into a garden and ate worms. It had done its poor best to make sentiment easy. It had rung all the possible changes upon the given theme and provided subtle choices between dignified phrases like "A Merry Christmas to you and yours" and folksy greetings like "Love to the kiddies." It had even offered to transmit them at a reduced cost. But there are some people who will mock at the most sacred things and be cynical even at Yuletide. Western Union would prefer to have nothing to do with them and only the law can make it go against its better nature.

THE Drifter at least is touched and confirmed, and if he ever has occasion to wire a holiday greeting he would no more think of deviating from the offered formula than he would think of refusing to applaud a play to which the press agent had been kind enough to send him tickets. He has, indeed, always wondered how dramatic critics could do such things.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Bread and Milk for Lawrence Strikers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The American Textile Workers Union of Lawrence, Massachusetts, is trying to raise a small sum of money to supply bread and milk to about 300 families who were involved in the textile strike there last fall and whose members have never since gone back to work. The strike was one of desperation against a 10 per cent wage reduction, the last of a series of such cuts. It was unsuccessful, and in the case of the Pacific Mills, in which most of the members of the Textile Workers Union work, reductions actually ranging from 10 to 30 per cent were put into effect when work was resumed. All the mills are running very slack and thousands of former strikers have had no work for months.

The public and private charity agencies in Lawrence have a rule, to which few exceptions are made, not to give relief to families who were not on their lists before the strike began. The reason given is lack of sufficient funds to supply all relief needs. Obviously, the rule operates as a device to punish men and women who still have some of the traditional American spirit of independence and refuse to accept a wage cut without a protest. The American Textile Workers Union is an independent union not at present affiliated with any national body. It played a creditable and responsible part in the recent strike.

Contributions may be sent either to the Emergency Strike Relief Committee, 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York City, of which Norman Thomas is chairman, or direct to James W. Sullivan, Treasurer, American Textile Workers, 180 Essex Street, Lawrence, Mass. Contributions sent direct to Lawrence should be in the form of money orders, since it is practically impossible in the banking situation there to get checks cashed.

New York, January 2

A. J. MUSTE

"But Sun It Is Not When You Say It Is Not!"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Once again it becomes our painful duty to tell you that The Nation has made an error, the usual error. In The Nation's Honor Roll for 1931, as published in your issue dated January 6, 1932, there appears the following citation:

H. L. Mencken, for writing, and the Baltimore Sun, for publishing, an article denouncing the Salisbury lynchings, a fearless and effective polemic written in the face of threats by Salisbury business men to withdraw their business from Baltimore.

It is true that H. L. Mencken wrote the articles in question. There was not one of them, but three, published respectively on December 7, December 14, and December 21. But it is not true that they were published in the Baltimore Sun. It was the Baltimore Evening Sun, of which Mr. Mencken is a contributing editor, which published all three articles. We expect this mistake from others but not from the discriminating editor of The Nation.

HAMILTON OWENS, Editor, the Evening Sun

J. EDWIN MURPHY, Managing Editor

Baltimore, January 2

Communism for America

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On page 20 of your issue of January 6 you printed a letter from an Iowan who disagrees with you in a number of matters. I cannot agree with the disagreeer, but I could thank him for his next-to-last paragraph because it has brought into clear focus a dim thought that has hovered in my mind for some time. He there speaks of "your program" reducing us all to the level of the unsuccessful and the worthless.

I imagine a great many good Americans shudder at the thought of communism coming to us, mainly because they have the feeling that we should all immediately have to grow beards and sink to the level of the Russian peasant. I wonder whether the level of the Russian proletariat is not now considerably above the average of Russian living as it was before communism. And if there is indeed an improvement, then might there not be an improvement here with us? Where should we Americans stand if we were all on a plane somewhat higher than an average of American living? Might we not, instead of degenerating into hairy savages, sink down miserably only to about the present status of the locomotive engineer or college professor, with an assured living, a pension against old age, some leisure to devote to matters of the mind, and the comforting assurance of being "significant for the functions we perform"?

East Orange, N. J., January 2

A. G. BARNETT

Mrs. Pinchot Makes a Correction

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation's reputation for accuracy and square dealing is so well established that I am certain that as soon as the errors in a story concerning my coming Congressional campaign, published in the issue of January 6, are brought to the attention of the editors, they will be willing to make the necessary corrections.

Mr. Anderson's story, the facts he alleges, the words he puts into my mouth in quotes, the interpretation he draws from my decision to run against McFadden are all pure fantasy. The formal statement announcing my candidacy to the press not only most emphatically did not say I based my "decision to run against McFadden on the ground that 'he insulted our President,'" but, as a matter of fact, did not mention either McFadden or Hoover, and made no reference whatsoever to the charges of the former against the latter.

In answer to a newspaperman who asked whether I believed that Hoover had sold out to Germany, I answered, "Anyone must resent an unsubstantiated attack of treason against the President," and suggested the public would be interested to hear the facts to which Mr. McFadden referred. If this be Hoover support, make the most of it!

My decision to contest McFadden's seat has nothing to do with his stand on the moratorium. I am running at the request of many friends in the district—farmers, miners, small business men, church people, et cetera—who feel that McFadden has always been the tool of the bankers and has neglected the interests of his constituents.

As a matter of fact, far from supporting the President, I am opposed to many of his major policies, which I feel have been partly responsible for, and an aggravation of, many of the ills we are suffering today. Had Mr. Anderson been really interested in getting at the facts concerning the fight in the Fifteenth Congressional District, he would have referred to the frantic efforts—so far unsuccessful—of Administration leaders in Washington and of the Republican organization in Pennsylvania to find a man to carry the "Support-Hoover" banner.

One thing I want to assure The Nation, however, if there is still any doubt, and that is that this particular job is not going to be wished upon any Pinchot—male or female.

Harrisburg, January 7 CORNELIA BRYCE PINCHOT

Who's Got the Button?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Cincinnati has a plan to end the depression. And the plan comes from the inner sanctum of the largest and most influential club in our city. The Cincinnati Club, formerly the Business Men's Club, has launched an anti-depression campaign, and every organization and every individual in the city is being brought into the line of battle to clean up on "Old Man Depression."

Well, here is the plan: Issue buttons bearing the inscription "I'm sold on America. I won't talk depression." Get everybody to wear one. Already 10,000 people in Cincinnati are wearing these buttons. The minister of the New Thought Temple preached a powerful sermon against thinking, seeing, or recognizing depression in any of its forms at any time.

We want every man, woman, and child in America to wear our anti-depression buttons and thus end the terrible crisis.

Cincinnati, January 4

NICHOLAS KLEIN

Finance

Expatriated Investments

HEAVY declines in the prices of foreign bonds indicate the market's judgment as to the prospects of collecting the sums due American investors by foreign borrowers. Nothing could be more mistaken than to regard all these loans as worthless or even highly doubtful, yet it must be said that the outlook for payment is discouraging in many directions. A long series of defaults or postponements has involved the federal, state, or municipal loans of every South American country except Argentina. Europe is still paying interest and amortization charges, but it now seems probable that little will be accomplished immediately in the way of transferring a substantial amount from Germany on account of the short-term credits owed to American, British, and other banks. Beyond all this looms the reparations impasse.

Out of this rather somber situation there is emerging, in more and more articulate form, the opinion that American business can absorb its losses and enjoy a fair degree of recovery, in spite of anything that may occur abroad. Perhaps the most definite expression of this doctrine was voiced by Mr. Lamont, who recently told a Senate committee: "I think that if we can address ourselves to certain phases of our domestic situation, our foreign situation will in due course take care of itself." There is much to commend this view. We have probably fixed our eyes too closely on events abroad, from the economic standpoint, and have lost sight of the fact that even in so-called normal periods there are vast differences in degrees of prosperity among nations, as indicated by wage scales, wealth, and standards of living. There has been a too easy and uncritical assumption that some sort of uniformity must prevail—an assumption which is easily refuted, on a smaller stage, by recalling that American prosperity in the past has not depended on equalizing the status of a Carolina cotton picker with that of a member of the locomotive engineers' brotherhood.

When all this is said, however, it remains to be admitted that many American industries are facing a situation with respect to foreign trade which at the present moment is extremely difficult. This has to do with those companies which have invested in factories and other plants abroad, either through owned subsidiaries or participation in existing foreign enterprises. A study by the Department of Commerce placed the total of these investments at the end of 1929 at $7,477,735,000. Properties in Canada were valued at $1,960,320,000; those in Europe, $1,352,753,000; in Cuba and the West Indies, $1,053,751,000; in South America, $1,547,895,000. Canada has been especially favored by American corporations because of its proximity, its uniformity of language, law, and currency, and the preferential tariff position it occupies in the British Empire. In the Dominion no fewer than 1,024 investments in factories, mines, utilities, selling agencies, and other enterprises are listed.

This is where the almost world-wide lapse from the gold standard pinches. Corporate investors, in bringing home their interest and dividends, are confronted with a state of disorder in the foreign-exchange market ranging all the way from a 15 per cent discount to absolute prohibition of transfer of funds. A number of companies are withdrawing their current funds, nevertheless, and pocketing the loss; others are leaving them abroad until more favorable opportunities present themselves. Stabilization of exchange, if not return to parity, is a prime requisite for profitable operation of American branches abroad, and stabilization, generally speaking, is nowhere in sight.

S. PALMER HARMAN

Books, Music, Films, Drama

The Bore

By MARK VAN DOREN

He was not helped by knowing well
How cold he made us, and how weary.
He must have told himself at last
He was not saved by being sorry.

Better than anyone he saw
The stealthy turn, the trained escape,
Or if he came too soon for these,
How frantic courtesy could wrap

Desire to fly with skill to stay—
A twitching wing beneath the feather;
How within a graying eye
The kindest agony can gather.

And did he witness this too well?
Was then the knowledge but the cause?
Long time we looked, but could not find
A way of learning what he was.

Dispossessed

By LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS

As well say wind and water should remain
Steadfast, unfluent, as that you transcend
The element which fuels blood and brain
And fashions you obscurely to its end.
Some will take root and suck from earth what makes
That very immobility to thrive;
And some will cling like martyrs to their stakes,
Knowing that only so can they survive.

How should I ask you, therefore, to transgress
By any spoken pledge or act of grace
A stronger will, your master none the less,
Or hope a trivial snare of time and space
Could hold you captive to a love whose way,
Despite our wish, was never to obey?

Two Critics

Creative Criticism, and Other Essays. By J. E. Spingarn.
Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Counter-Statement. By Kenneth Burke. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THE essays that Mr. Spingarn collected in 1917 under the title of "Creative Criticism" have been out of print, and the present volume consists half of those early essays and half of papers written since that time. Rereading the book, one finds it difficult to account for the high reputation as a critical theorist that Mr. Spingarn once enjoyed, and to some extent still enjoys. For the breadth and thoroughness of his literary scholarship one can have only the profoundest respect; and his prose, far from being dull or pedantic, is vigorous and even eloquent. But his ideas are rather thin, and his logic is appalling.

The opening essay, The New Criticism, is the least defensible in the volume. One hardly knows whether it would be good sportsmanship to analyze it calmly, for it was written in 1910, and Mr. Spingarn in a prefatory note remarks that the essays written between 1910 and 1913 "naturally do not adequately represent my present opinions." But as Mr. Spingarn has seen fit to reprint it, as much of his reputation a decade ago was based on it, and as for the most part it says in a sweeping way what later essays say more temperately, it may be well to look at it. It sets forth the Crocean idea that "art is expression." Now I have no wish to question the truth of this idea; it seems to me, on the contrary, so completely obvious that I am at a loss to understand why it should be considered a theory of art, and why it should be set forth, either by Croce or Mr. Spingarn, with so much insistence and bellicosity. It is precisely as if someone were to tell us that "language is expression" and expect us to regard the phrase as a remarkably revelatory philological doctrine. When Mr. Spingarn goes on to say of Croce that "he has led aesthetic thought inevitably from the concept that art is expression to the conclusion that all expression is art," he advances from a truism to an absurdity. If all expression is art, then if I say "Rubbish," that's art.

One is compelled to apply the same blunt type of criticism to Mr. Spingarn's insistence that the sole question the critic has a right to ask when confronted with a work of art is: "What was the author's intention, and how far has he succeeded in carrying it out?" The first thing to be said of this standard is that the critic can seldom know what the author's intention was; he can merely infer it from the work actually before him. But waiving this point, the intention itself may be modest, or trivial, or even silly. And a work that succeeds in achieving a low aim is not necessarily better than one that fails to achieve a much more ambitious aim. Sensitive to the criticism made of this standard, Mr. Spingarn insists in one of his later essays that his previous use of the word "intention" was misunderstood. "The poet's real 'intention,'" he now writes, "is to be found, not in one or another of the various ambitions that flit through his mind, but in the actual work of art which he creates. His poem is his 'intention.'" But if that is what he means, why does he confuse the issue by bringing in the question of "intention" at all?

There is, of course, a certain justification for Mr. Spingarn's insistence on this point. A critic who ignores an artist's intention, who judges a work of art merely by its success or failure in living up to his own preconceptions or in adhering to some conventional form, will surely be a bad critic. As Mr. Spingarn remarks, no criticism of any poem "is possible without a realization of 'the spirit in which its author writ.'" But this seems to me merely a statement of an obvious precaution that every intelligent critic ought to take; one can hardly dignify it by calling it a "theory of criticism."

Mr. Spingarn seems constitutionally incapable of correcting one error without embracing the opposite error, and stating it in such an extreme form as to discredit what is valid in his criticism. In one chapter, for example, he is not content to point out that in the transition from rhymed verse to blank verse to vers libre to rhythmic prose it is often difficult to say where verse ends and prose begins; he denies the validity of the distinction between the two forms, which is much as if he were to deny the distinction between day and night because there is no exact minute in the twilight period when one becomes the other. His essay on The New Criticism could have performed an important service in clearing away a good deal of pedantry and in discrediting the moralistic preoccupations of the American humanists, but Mr. Spingarn so overstated his case that he ended by putting art in a moral, intellectual, and social vacuum. Of course it is impossible to maintain any such position without inconsistency, and we even find Mr. Spingarn contradicting in one sentence what he has told us in the one immediately preceding. Thus, on page 28:

Her [Beauty's] imaginary creations, by definition, make no pretense to reality, and cannot be judged by reality's tests. The poet's only moral duty, as a poet, is to be true to his art, and to express his vision of reality as well as he can.

The italics are mine.

Finally, it is curious that Mr. Spingarn, who makes so able a criticism of Mr. Babbitt's scholarship and moralism, should embrace the same meaningless dualism that Mr. Babbitt does, contrasting "truth inside the spirit of man" with truth "outside," and should refer to the sciences with the same patronizing air, insisting that "whatever value they may have on the plane of our practical lives, they must be left behind when we enter the realm of spiritual values"—as if our knowledge of ourselves and of the universe could possibly be irrelevant to our scale of values.

"All art is lyrical," writes Mr. Spingarn at one point, and he sometimes seems to think that all criticism should be lyrical, too, and even all theories of criticism. In any case, he chronically uses words for their emotive appeal, and not with any nice regard for their value as tools of analysis. When we turn to Mr. Burke we turn to a much more realistic thinker, and, incidentally, a much subtler one. I make bold to say, indeed, that "Counter-Statement" is one of the most brilliant books on critical theory ever written in America; certainly one need not hesitate to rank it with any contemporary European work of its type. It seems to suffer, if anything, from an excess of ideas; at least the major criticism I have to make of it is that these ideas sometimes stumble over one another, while collateral ideas are constantly pulling the author off at a tangent, so that the reader has difficulty sometimes in knowing precisely where Mr. Burke is trying to take him. Allied to this is the criticism that Mr. Burke, who writes for the most part extremely well, occasionally indulges in a pedantically elliptical style, and keeps jolting his reader against wedged-in parentheses.

It is impossible here to give an adequate summary of "Counter-Statement," largely because of the very multiplicity of its ideas, and one can merely refer the reader to the book itself. But two essays, Psychology and Form, and The Status of Art, stand out. The latter is a masterly discussion of the function of art and the contemporary need for it, but Mr. Burke is careful not to overstate his case: "One cannot advocate art as a cure for toothache," he reminds us, "without disclosing the superiority of dentistry." The essay on Psychology and Form opens with an acute analysis of the scene in "Hamlet" immediately preceding the entrance of the ghost of Hamlet's father. Mr. Burke shows how adroitly Shakespeare plays upon the expectations of the audience, whetting, frustrating, surprising, and gratifying them. The scene, he holds, is a perfect illustration of the relationship between psychology and form, and indicates how the one is to be defined in terms of the other. Literary form, in brief, is in essence not something arbitrary, imposed, or merely conventional; it is implicit in subject matter; it is an arousing and fulfilment of desires: a work has form in so far as one part of it leads a reader to anticipate another part, and to be gratified by the sequence.

I cannot close without a reference to Mr. Burke's admirable little essay in his final pages in defense of "rhetoric." The reader of modern prose is constantly on his guard against "rhetoric," yet the word, by lexicographer's definition, refers merely to "the use of language in such a way as to produce a desired impression upon the hearer or reader." In accordance with this definition, effective literature could be nothing else but rhetoric: thus the resistance to rhetoric qua rhetoric must be due to a faulty analysis. To an extent, this resistance is a revolt against an overemphasizing of the traditionally ceremonious, and as such wholesome, but in turning against the specific methods of specific rhetoricians, modern writers persuaded themselves that they were turning against rhetoric in toto. The great danger of this, Mr. Burke insists, is that it leads to a denigration of form, and such a denigration cannot become widespread without leading to an impoverished literature.

HENRY HAZLITT

Photography as an Art

Eyes on Russia. By Margaret Bourke-White. With a Foreword by Maurice Hindus. Simon and Schuster. $5.

David Octavius Hill. By Heinrich Schwarz. The Viking Press. $6.

MISS BOURKE-WHITE is a young American photographer well known for her pictures of American industry. In 1930 she spent five busy weeks in Russia, took some four hundred photographs, and now presents us with forty of them in a volume which contains also a gay and amusing account of her adventures. Anyone who has had even the briefest experience with Soviet officials will appreciate her description of their enthusiastic, cordial, inefficient cooperation, and will be, besides, in a position to appreciate the difficulties overcome in making these striking pictures in a country where cameras are so rare that the possession of one is enough to attract the curious eye of every passer-by.

Miss Bourke-White includes several arresting portraits of various Russian types, but she has concentrated upon different phases of industry and she has managed somehow to suggest something of the Russian attitude toward the machine. Doubtless the strangely beautiful effect of certain of her pictures—like that of the loom-tender seen through the threads which rise to the great pyramid of spools—is the result of her arrangement alone. Doubtless the same effect could have been achieved in almost any American spinning-mill. But the effect is, nevertheless, one which interprets the attitude of a people to whom industry is an idea as well as a physical fact, and for that very reason it is appropriate in a way that a romanticizing of our factories often is not.

From a purely pictorial standpoint these pictures should interest photographers as well as those who will be fascinated by the glimpses which they afford into the daily life of the Russian worker. So much nonsense has been talked on both sides of the question "Is photography an art?" that an object lesson like this has a very real value for the simple reason that it exemplifies so admirably the kind of effect which photography can produce. Primarily these pictures are documents, and the fact that they are supposed to convey information is never forgotten. Miss Bourke-White never selects forms purely for their own sakes, or carries "interpretation" to the point where the camera becomes merely a mechanical instrument for the imitation of bad paintings. But she does use her knowledge of light, shadow, and viewpoint to capture the most suggestive aspect of any given actuality, and she presents us with a record of something which is significant, not because it has been imagined, but because it has been selected. She recognizes the fact that photography is one of the arts in which truth to fact plays a relatively important part, and the result is something worth a good deal more than all the pseudo-Corots turned out by the old school of "artistic" photographers as well as all the "arrangements" and "montages" produced by the futile labors of the "moderns."

The volume devoted to Hill is a sumptuously printed album containing a memoir and eighty reproductions of the pictures (mostly portraits) which he took during the forties of the last century. Hill was a Scotchman who worked at the very beginning of photography and who did not use even the then newly calculated Petzval lens; but it would be difficult to find any portraits more full of character than those which he took of the iron-visaged Victorians who came to his studio. Since his time the photographer has been relieved of many limitations, but he has hardly improved upon work of the sort which was possible within the limitations imposed upon Hill by his materials.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"War Guilt" and France

War and Diplomacy in the French Republic. By Frederick L. Schuman. Whittlesey House. $4.

THIS is a capital monograph on the history and methods of contemporary diplomacy. It is a very timely, important, and trustworthy volume. The book presents a careful analysis of the machinery of foreign policy in France and of the psychology which runs this machinery.

Able as the portions of the book devoted to these aspects of the subject may be, the greatest interest resides in Part II. Here the author presents in some 250 pages a thorough and up-to-date summary of French diplomatic history under the Third Republic. This is especially valuable, for such a treatment has hitherto been lacking in English. The pre-war diplomatic history of most of the other principals in the crisis of 1914 has been treated in authoritative monographs, but the developments in France have been dealt with only incidentally.

Especially important is Dr. Schuman's discussion of the diplomatic revolution of 1912-14 and of the part played by French statesmen in the crisis of 1914. He recognizes clearly the significance of the ousting of Caillaux and the elevation of Poincaré to the premiership.

From Caillaux to Poincaré was a step from conciliation and cooperation with Germany to a policy of vigorous self-reliance and determined assertion of national interests. . . . His [Poincaré's] determination to take a firm stand against Berlin in future controversies was perhaps an expression of a deeper and unconfessed resolution to do all in his power to regain the "lost provinces" for the Republic and to crush the German "menace" once and for all. This could be achieved not by diplomacy but only by war. Izvolsky was moved by corresponding sentiments and ambitions. He, too, could gain his objective only by war—since diplomacy had failed.

Such was the background of events from 1912 to 1914. Dr. Schuman traces the developments with skill and impartiality. He shows the linkage of the Straits and Alsace-Lorraine in the Dual Alliance of France and Russia; indicates how Izvolsky induced Poincaré to promise French aid in a war over the Balkans, provided Germany came to the aid of Austria; describes the bribery of the French press by Russian gold to win over the French public to support this policy; shows how the support of England was gradually rendered more probable if not certain; and outlines the manner in which France and Russia were creating a firm front for any European crisis.

Coming to the dramatic and moving events of the period from June 28 to August 5, 1914, Dr. Schuman presents the facts in resolute fashion. He makes it clear that Poincaré's visit to Russia late in July, 1914, greatly strengthened the Russian militarists and helped them to decide to use the assassination crisis as the episode to precipitate the war over the Straits. He reveals the misrepresentation of German diplomacy by Berthelot and its effect upon the Paris press. He does not hesitate to expose Paléologue's misrepresentation of the Russian mobilization or the gross falsification of the facts in regard to it in the French "Yellow Book" (pp. 232-33). He does not endeavor to conceal the fact that the French offered no resistance to the Russian general mobilization, even though they knew it meant inevitable European war, or that the French government made the final decision for war with enthusiasm.

In short, Dr. Schuman shows clearly enough that the French could not have more skilfully forwarded war policies in the summer of 1914 and that they did nothing of any significance to avert the calamity. His chief oversight lies in not contrasting with this the repeated and firm pressure exerted on Austria by the German government, but Fay has established this fact for all time.

Dr. Schuman thus writes as an advanced revisionist. The reviewer could not ask for a more complete confirmation of the indictment of France in his "Genesis of the World War." To anticipate and avert any controversy in The Nation over this point, he would suggest that any curious person read Chapters III and VII of that book, compare it with Dr. Schuman's treatment, and form his own judgment on the matter.

The most astonishing aspect of the book remains to be pointed out. About a year ago Dr. Schuman reviewed Professor Schmitt's "Coming of the War, 1914" in The Nation and commended it most warmly. The reviewer cannot imagine a more damaging implicit criticism of Schmitt's treatment of France than Dr. Schuman's work. Further, in his preface to the present book, Dr. Schuman states that Professor Schmitt has read and criticized Part II. One can only remark that the ways of history professors in the United States are frequently beyond the understanding of ordinary mortals.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

"I Saw Thrones"

Everyman Remembers. By Ernest Rhys. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $4.

THE generation of young literary aspirants who came to London during the eighties and nineties has now for twenty years been giving us, out of the mellow memories of its old age, the records of an enchanted youth. Apparently London was never before or since so magical a city for the hopeful novice in verse, drama, and novel-writing. Parnassians, noble Romans, blooming aesthetes, pontifical critics, and cloud-girt Olympians thronged its streets, clubs, theaters, and drawing-rooms. In the age of professional beauties, venerable theatrical stars, and canonized royalty, the man of letters likewise claimed a homage and a luxury too seldom his. The glamor of celebrity haunted every writer who had made the slightest stir in the reviews, but for gods like Tennyson, Browning, Meredith, and Morris was conjured up a reverence usually reserved for kingship and sainthood. The city quaked with the excitement of new books, new plays, the Yellow Book, and under-tremors of scandal; with the additional enthusiasm aroused by the "young anger" of revolutionary groups like the Rhymers' Club, the Celtic Revival, the Decembrists, and the Fabians, the air managed to seethe with the fervor that makes literature. Even the now historical literary "bull market" in America between 1912 and 1922 appears curtailed in comparison. From the calmer vantage-point of 1931 it is possible to be callous about much of the uproar, but for Ernest Rhys, who played his active part in that age and in our own, the excitement was contagious and the grandeur authentic. The sincerity with which he transfers them to his volume of memoirs gives his book, in spite of its defects of form and style, a respectable place beside the similar records of Le Gallienne, Beerbohm, Yeats, and their contemporaries.

From obscure Welsh beginnings and a false start in the mining business, Rhys approached London on no velvet drugged. His charming poetic endowment, while sufficiently real to make him—with Yeats and Rolleston—one of the three original members of the Rhymers, was never strong enough to insure him a post among the front-rank celebrities. His critical abilities were likewise frail. As an editor, however, his enthusiasm and foresight not only placed him in the front rank of the publishing profession, but made him an adviser and host to three literary generations. Entering, virtually by accident, the publishing world, he set going the Camelot Series for Walter Scott, Ltd. Shortly afterward he conceived and launched for J. M. Dent the now classical Everyman's Library, of which he still remains editor. Of this undertaking he writes his most humble pages, but it will remain his greatest claim to eminence. The cordiality with which he popularized the classics and encouraged publishers to print the work of young writers was undoubtedly the secret of his friendship with Swinburne and Watts-Dunton at Putney, with Conrad in Kent, with Yeats and "Æ" and the Irish writers; with Russian exiles like Kropotkin and Stepniak; with Whitman, Lowell, Holmes, and the Stedman circle in New York; with Lawrence, Pound, Ford, and the new spirits of 1910; with, indeed, an almost interminable procession of talents and geniuses through fifty years of eager and generous service in the cause of writing. Such service cannot be too critical of its masters. Rhys's memoirs have no value as criticism, but among the garrulities and sentiments of recent literary reminiscence "Everyman Remembers" stands out for the engaging ardor whereby Rhys made his valuable contribution to the creative enlightenment of a part of two centuries.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

The Alibi Department

Power Ethics. By Jack Levin. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THE recent history of political malfeasance in office, showing the rise of privileged groups above regulation, above law, is only possible where the public has been misled through misinformation or through no information at all," declares Jack Levin, of the research staff of the People's Legislative Service, in his analysis of the most deliberate, most wholesale, most highly organized campaign of misinformation in the peace-time history of the United States.

He has carefully analyzed and then synthesized the material gathered by the Federal Trade Commission in a three years' investigation of the propaganda of the public utilities, particularly the electric utilities. He finds this glaring paradox—that the very industries which cannot be depended upon to serve the public physically without State or national regulation have managed to serve the same public mentally with material of their own choosing, thus making it possible to persuade that public against its own interest to nullify the regulatory acts designed to protect it.

This propaganda was initiated and largely carried on through the efforts of the Insulls, although the National Electric Light Association was particeps criminis, and its component companies share the responsibility. The propaganda mill operated chiefly through so-called "information committees." Heading each was a director, who was thus described by the head of the Georgia Information Committee: "You may look upon him . . . as the head of the alibi department, the fixer . . . the undertaker's assistant, suave of manner, discreetly clothed, who moves here and there during the inquest trying to put the best possible face on the murder."

Concealing the true authorship of the propaganda, whether operating through school or college, church, lodge, service or women's clubs, through the press or motion picture, the privately owned public utilities sought to insinuate, in the guise of informative or educational material, a viewpoint favorable to their status quo of excessive profits and absence of effective regulation.

Mr. Levin quotes from the record the following suggestive incident:

There was a very prominent lady in the community . . . member of the Literary Club . . . of the W. C. T. U., and a number of organizations. She gave an afternoon tea, and in the course of the party . . . brought the conversation around to the subject of State water and power acts, and said rather casually, "My banker tells me that that is an iniquitous and dangerous measure," and with a little comment of that kind passed on. Those who were at the tea did not realize until the investigation came out that she had been paid (by the private utilities) . . . to buy cakes and cookies for the giving of that party.

Wherever possible the true purpose of this propaganda was disguised. "A $1,875 payment to a college professor and a $4,200 motion-picture bill for farmers are labeled on a voucher 'engineering investigation on wind and ice loading of transmission lines.'"

The amount of free newspaper publicity, in contradistinction to that which was paid for at advertising rates, was enormous. State committee directors boasted how much the "space" they secured would have cost at regular advertising rates. Newspaper publicity for their propaganda was, certainly until the Federal Trade Commission exposé had begun to seep through to a section of the press (that section not controlled by the utilities and their affiliates), extremely easy to secure. The director of publicity in Florida spoke of being so deluged by clippings that a discontinuance of them was necessary, "but," he wrote, "a rough estimate of the editorial and other matter given to us from the Florida newspapers would amount to more than $50,000. The editorial matter could not be purchased at any price." Similarly a private utility reported that its publicity, if paid for, would have cost over a million dollars.

Mr. Levin's study leads him to certain interesting conclusions:

First, that this great variety of charges incurred in the propaganda campaign—$13,284 paid to the past president of the General Federation of Women's Clubs for magazine articles presenting the public-utility view, entertainment charges, country-club dinners, deep-sea fishing trips, payment of Rotary Club dues, hotel and traveling expenses, theater parties for editors, etc., ad lib.—were all charged to operating expenses, and that the consumer invariably paid for them in his higher charges for light and power.

Second, that sweeping and comprehensive as the evidence dug up by the Federal Trade Commission has been, it is only a small indication of the true extent of the private-utility activities in our educational system.

Third, that by contrasting the woeful tales uttered by the utility representatives before the establishment of the information committees with their claims of accomplishment a few years later, it is reasonable to assume that "they have succeeded in converting public opinion to their point of view." "It is abundantly clear," says Mr. Levin, "that they have convinced great masses of people that all is well with the regulation of our public utilities and that therefore the citizen should leave matters as they are and go about his own affairs."

The reviewer agrees with that somewhat pessimistic judgment. To a considerable extent the utilities campaign has successfully used the Insull formula of "pinning the bolshevist tag" on those who have contended for effective regulation, who have perceived what a colossal racket the electric public-utility industry has become, and have sought reform. Nevertheless, the crudity of the racket, the tremendous inflation of values, the obvious iniquity of the pyramided structure of holding companies, the patent lack of effective regulation should require only a small amount of exposure to bring about a determined movement for reform. The spotlight is really the first essential.

Mr. Levin's book performs that service in a thorough way. His method is that of analysis and deduction, and collation of all the implied facts. The result is perhaps not so vivid a picture and so easily readable an account as were obtained through the method which the reviewer adopted in his own volume on the same subject, where a liberal use of quotations from the utilities' correspondence files permits them to condemn themselves "out of their own mouths," and allows the reader to judge the material itself.

Mr. Levin's approach is probably the more difficult and the more painstaking, and he is entitled to a vote of thanks for making the result of his researches available. Full appreciation and understanding by the public of what he has to tell would result in cutting the light-and-power bill of the nation at least in half, if not lower, and of making that indispensable commodity—electric current—far more widely available, as indeed it ought to be.

ERNEST GRUBNING

Books in Brief

From Steerage to Congress. By Richard Bartholdt. Philadelphia: Dorrance and Company. $4.

Richard Bartholdt's memoirs tell the story of a German boy, the son of a revolutionist of 1848, who came to this country at the age of fifteen and worked his way up from printer to Congressman. He served from 1893 to 1915, from the Fifty-third to the Sixty-third Congress, from the Tenth Missouri District, and retired voluntarily to devote himself to public causes, and particularly to that of peace. He was for a time president of the Interparliamentary Union for the Promotion of International Arbitration, was founder and long head of the American group, and has been unceasing in his efforts to bring about international understanding.

While the narrative is somewhat rambling and needs very careful revision, if there is to be another edition, as to facts, names, and dates, which are often erroneous, it is none the less an interesting chronicle of a typical German-American career—typical in its loyalty and devotion to American institutions and faithful service to the second Motherland, but not typical in the quality and distinction of that service. Especially interesting are the accounts of Mr. Bartholdt's interviews with Kaiser Wilhelm, when in 1911 he delivered an address to him on behalf of the President and the Congress of the United States, and also presented to the Kaiser a replica of the Steuben monument in Washington. On one of these occasions the Kaiser said: "Yes, they call me the Peace Kaiser with a jeer. Nevertheless [with great emphasis], I am proud of that title and hope the good Lord may permit me to take it into my grave." It would be a wonderful thing if just at this moment so sturdy and uncompromising a champion for peace and international good-will as Mr. Bartholdt could be heard in Congress.

Jenny Lind. By Edward Wagenknecht. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

Avowedly a disciple of Gamaliel Bradford, Mr. Wagenknecht here applies the "psychographic" method with more zeal than skill. Analytical wheels whirr and dial readings are recorded to the accompaniment of a voluble exposition—too often in the first person singular. The effect is that of a laboratory demonstration with the lecturer flourishing a pointer over his apparatus and charts. Evidential values have not always been carefully weighed. For example, nearly two pages are devoted to the manner in which Jenny Lind sang the familiar aria, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." The author gravely writes: "It is said that she always placed the accent on 'know,' thus making the utterance, as it were, a personal confession of faith." Inasmuch as the melody is so constructed that the accent cannot be placed anywhere else without disturbing both the balance of the musical phrase and the meaning of the text, it would have been remarkable if she had sung it otherwise. The idiosyncrasies of the Swedish Nightingale as well as the fundamental traits of her character are duly disclosed in sketches, but at no time is the soul-portrait clearly limned in its entirety.

George Gershwin: A Study in American Music. By Isaac Goldberg. Simon and Schuster. $3.50.

Equally conversant with the prosody of Latin America and the idiomatic lyrics of Tin Pan Alley, Dr. Goldberg has written a study of George Gershwin in which eulogy and analysis are neatly combined. It is biography and critique in one. Readers curious about the personality of the most illustrious of jazz composers will find here all they need to know about his manner of living, his methods of work, and his opinions. "What the deuce do I care about jazz?" has implications that may startle his admirers. Dr. Goldberg quotes it to prove that "to George, as to any genuine composer, it is music that comes first. If jazz should threaten to become a hampering stereotype, a 'tradition' in its turn, George would go forward to the next fresh impulse that arose in him." The promise that he will go forward is implicit in the development he has already passed through and in the strongly individual quality of his music. Dr. Goldberg's book is completely sympathetic in tone, and its insouciant style trips a lively pace most of the time.

Digging in Yucatan. By Ann Axtell Morris. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

Centuries ago a Maya king decided that people who worked had no time to revolt. So he ordered his architect to tear down one temple and put another above it. The work was begun; but as it progressed, either the king or the architect changed his mind a good many times. The result is the Temple of the Warriors at Chichen Itza, an oft-changed yet beautiful building whose shifting plans and styles record the decline of an Indian kingdom. As the kingdom fell, so did the temple, and for hundreds of years it lay in ruins. When Mrs. Morris and her husband came to Yucatan in 1924, the building lay under soil and trees. This book tells of their removal, of the discovery of one temple beneath another, of the engineering and scientific feats performed in putting those buildings back together. The volume is lively as well as informing.

City Child. By Selma Robinson. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

Selma Robinson knows her medium perfectly and never overtaxes it; hers is charming magazine verse on the many themes of human life, loneliness, tenderness, whimsical sophistication, slight cynicism. It is the kind of verse everyone understands and reads and enjoys. In form it is perfect, just subtle enough—just gay and bitter enough, too, in idea. It never overshoots the mark in seriousness or in false humor; the tone is the modern tone of the young woman grown up in the city. The little volume is decorated with tiny woodcuts and drawings by Rockwell Kent.

The Divine Comedy of Dante Alighieri. Translated by Jefferson Butler Fletcher. The Macmillan Company. $5.

Professor Fletcher's Dante is of course the work of a careful student in the field—and one, furthermore, who is accomplished in the writing of verse. His determination, however, to dispense with the linkage between his tercets—to write, that is to say, aba, cdc, efe, and so on—seems hardly to be vindicated by the result, which is a jerky and bumpy poem. Dante was often involved, and Professor Fletcher follows his involutions like a master; but Dante, by writing aba, bcb, cdc, and so on, was never without the effect of continuity. Professor Fletcher often is, and this makes his translation not infrequently inferior to several others which, imperfect though they are, have adhered strictly to the rhyme scheme of the original.

Music

Composer and Performer

IT would be difficult to find two pianists, I suppose, who would less like to be compared with each other than Harry Cumpson and Harriet Cohen, and there are certainly few more contrasted than they. But although each would probably consider assurance of that fact an occasion for self-congratulation, neither would be right in doing so. For it is just in those things in which they most differ that each could profitably learn from the other.

Mr. Cumpson's purpose is to convey the message of the music he plays as simply as possible. It is the purpose of every sincere artist—Miss Cohen doubtless included. He strives for clean, quiet, accurate playing from which as far as possible any trace of his personality shall be effaced in favor of the composer. But he has allowed an excellent principle to become a fetish, and in his unceasing effort to avoid overstatement he has forgotten that habitual understatement is equally inaccurate. Miss Cohen appears not to be afraid of overstatement; in her desire not to miss the slightest inflection she frequently lapses into gross exaggeration.

A revealing thing about an unbalanced art like that of either of these two is that at the most unexpected places the most contradictory tendencies appear. Thus Mr. Cumpson plays on for pages with dogmatic monotony of color and rhythm, and with lofty disregard of important phrase inflections and articulations, only to seize upon the indicated phrasing in the first variation of the Beethoven Sonata, Opus 26, as the occasion for a caesura so exaggerated as to interrupt seriously the four-measure flow of the rhythm. And Miss Cohen, after lavishing excessive tenderness on many undeserving phrases, is content to skip with the most complete nonchalance over the structurally and expressively important trill that comes at the end of the early tonic pedal in the Bach A-minor Organ Prelude.

The shortcomings of both these artists are due, I think, to faulty emphasis in their conceptions of the function of the interpreting artist: Mr. Cumpson mistaking literalness for faithfulness, and thinking that a sincere performance is one that converts the contents of the printed page into sound, adding nothing, or as little as possible, in the process; Miss Cohen substituting her own sentiments for the composer's, placing unmerited reliance upon her intuitions, allowing the forest to be hidden by the trees.

The obvious truth is that neither in strict nor in loose construction will a satisfactory interpretation be found. For to realize the necessity that Miss Cohen ignores—that of making sure that the composer's intentions are not clouded by the introduction of irrelevant sentiments, or his gentler and lighter remarks inflated into grandiose or pathetic pronouncements—is only half the battle; and the other half, to which Mr. Cumpson unfortunately shuts his eyes, consists in realizing that while the substitution of one's personal emotions for those of the composer is unwarranted, the mere literal reproduction of the com-

Soviet Russia Equals Europe . . . in cost to the traveler

For the summer of 1932 the Open Road is able to offer its standard travel services in Russia at European prices.

A month's round trip to the U. S. S. R. with expenses New York to Russia and return steamship passage from Europe can be made for . . . $238, third class on land and sea (with tourist class Baltic crossing and second class sleeper Helsingfors-Leningrad). $359, second class on land, tourist class at sea (first class Baltic crossing).

Itineraries may be drafted to suit. Experienced Open Road representatives in Leningrad and Moscow know how to make a little time go a long way in a country where the visitor plunges into a bewildering new civilization and where every waking hour of the sojourn is precious.

In writing for itineraries and rates, indicate what phases of Russian life interest you most and whether you prefer to travel with a group or independently.

The OPEN ROAD

Salmon Tower, 11 West 42nd Street, New York City

Cooperating in U. S. S. R. with INTOURIST

Rogel's International

THESAURUS

"Words grouped by Ideas"

Complete list of synonyms, antonyms, phrases, slang, etc., in fact everything to help find the right word. The one indispensable book for all writers. A necessary complement of the dictionary.

Now $3 Copy

from CROWELL'S
THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO.
393 Fourth Avenue, New York

95 CENTS A COPY FOR THE FIRST TIME

Balzac's
DROLL STORIES
Boccaccio's THE
DECAMERON

Each volume complete and unabridged

THE MODERN LIBRARY

poser's indicated intentions does not make a vital—that is, an accurate—interpretation of his true meaning. If the interpreter's own thoughts and emotions are taboo, he must at least share those of the composer. He must, for the duration of his role as interpreter, try to reincarnate the composer, and not be afraid to speak his meaning as well as his words with vigor and imagination. Nor dare he forget the inadequacy of the notation by which composers give but a hint of their intentions, or become so absorbed in accurately reproducing the things indicated that he loses sight of the intentions which that notation is unable to convey.

Miss Cohen gives us many impressions delightful in themselves, but their connection with the main tendency of the music is often questionable. She wastes considerable pianistic resources—a quite unusual tonal range, and often delightful sensitiveness and imagination in phrasing—by failing to employ them in an organized way toward well-defined ends. Mr. Cumpson, on the other hand, wastes the fine intellectual and formal grasp he has on music by allowing the sensitive, imaginative, intuitive side of his interpretative powers to atrophy, and so cheating his playing of the living force it must have to be faithful interpretation.

I often wonder whether a review like this which points out prominent shortcomings in the playing of accomplished musicians does not give a quite false impression of their art. Perhaps it would be a serious omission in this one, for example, not to make it clear that while definite weaknesses prevent either Harry Cumpson or Harriet Cohen from giving thoroughly satisfactory performances, there is much to be enjoyed and a great deal to be learned from each of them, and that I should not like to miss performances by either of music that interests me.

ARTHUR MENDEL

Films

"Spectacle" vs. Story

IT has been indicated before in this column that the greatest defect of the American film is its tendency to be spectacular at the expense of being convincing. "Mata Hari," in which Greta Garbo is starred (Capitol), is one of the more gorgeous examples of the tendency. The story of the beautiful German spy, the dancer who bought war secrets with the international and highly negotiable currency of love, is so melodramatic in itself that only warm characterization, a simple plot, and convincing motivation could make it human and therefore touching. The present production is unfortunately only a spectacle through which Miss Garbo moves, always competently but with static coldness. The character of Mata Hari is neither established nor developed. In justice to Miss Garbo it must be said that the fault seems to lie more with the producer and the director than with her ability as an actress. Wherever it lies, however, the result is the same. The story has no center. Besides being synthetic it is also elaborate and long drawn out. The settings are lavish, and Miss Garbo's gowns render her forbiddingly beautiful rather than irresistible. Lewis Stone is badly miscast as the master-spy; Ramon Novarro, who plays opposite Miss Garbo, is ineffectual; and the performance of Lionel Barrymore, who provides the only authentic implication of pathos, is lost in the general grandeur.

It is a different sort of precocity which keeps a really admirable venture from achieving success. The new version of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" (Rivoli) falls between the two stools of Freudian psychology and simple "horror." Modern psychology is introduced into the outlines of the Stevenson tale, and this interpretation of the old theme if consistently followed might have produced significant drama. Instead, the producer took the easier as well as the more spectacular way, and accordingly the handsome Dr. Jekyll, after drinking a chemical cocktail, turns before one's eyes into a repulsive, ape-like Mr. Hyde who rapes and murders and in general terrorizes the town. Accordingly also the play loses most of its significance as modern drama. Since Stevenson's day, through the kindly offices of Dr. Freud, "bestiality" has been so completely stripped of its horrific Victorian implications that the loathsome Hyde is quite implausible. What is more to the point dramatically, a really subtle and effective as well as thoroughly modern Jekyll-Hyde would dispense with drastic make-up. Without it, the characterization would of course require an excellent brand of acting, but Fredric March's work in the present version indicates that he could handle it. The rest of the cast, and in fact the picture as a whole, need not be touched. The settings are very well conceived, and the imaginative camera work is an integral part of the production. Rouben Mamoulian has given it sensitive and intelligent direction; and Miriam Hopkins's interpretation of the little music-hall girl who is the victim of Hyde's brutality, combined with the tortured Dr. Jekyll of Mr. March, endows the picture with a quality that is haunting in spite of the unreal element of horror which finally defeats it.

The theme of "Zwei Menschen" (Little Carnegie), which depicts a painful struggle between the church and human love, with the church winning out, is emotionally remote from American audiences. But the high valleys of the Tyrolean Alps where the film was made are pleasant to look upon and the play is very well acted. "Secrets of the Orient" (Europa), a German silent film, relates one of the tales of Scheherezade to the accompaniment of Rimsky-Korsakoff's music. The adventures of Ali the cobbler are pleasantly absorbing, even though the settings, which are intentionally fantastic, may be distracting to those who feel that a dream, to be effective, must appear if anything more real than reality.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Drama

Ten-Twenty-Thirt'

THE producers of "Berlin" (Cohan Theater) played an elaborate if unintentional joke upon the professional first-nighters, for it was vaguely suggested that the new play was to be "something like 'Grand Hotel,'" and the audience assembled with all the deferential solemnity appropriate to a predestined success. The ermine coats were out in respectable numbers, even the cagiest of the "first-string" critics were present, and the first ten minutes of the show itself seemed to promise something pretentious at least. There was a round of applause for the elaborate setting, an appropriate "Ah!" for the trick lighting of the scene, and then half an hour, at least, during which there was a stubborn refusal to believe the all too obvious fact that everyone was in for nothing more or less than a ten-twenty-thirty melodrama of the rankest variety. Spies spied; vamps vamped; ingenues acted innocent; and a perfectly blood-curdling chief of the secret police turned up on his club foot with distressing regularity until the time came for him to walk calmly into a clout on the head and thus allow the hero and heroine to escape gaily out of a house which even a village constable would have had surrounded.

And what do you suppose it was all about? Those very same "papers" which even the patrons of vaudeville now know to be as irresistibly funny as a reference to dill pickles or Bismarck herring, and which, in this particular instance, are sup-

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □ DANCE □ LECTURES □ DEBATES □

CIVIC LIGHT OPERA CO. ■
GILBERT and SULLIVAN'S The GONDOLIERS
 WITH FAMOUS GILBERTIAN CAST
 THEA., W. 44th St. Phone. PENN 6-7963
 ERLANGER'S Nights, 50c to $2.50 Wed. Mat. 50c ■
 $1.50. Sat. Mat. 50c to $2.00
 MONDAY, JANUARY 18th—PATIENCE

The Theatre Guild Presents
EUGENE O'NEILL'S TRILOGY
MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA
 Composed of 3 plays
 Homecoming, The Hunted, The Haunted
 All 3 plays will be presented ■ one day, commencing ■ 5:30 sharp. Dinner intermission of one hour at 7 o'clock. No matinee performances.
 GUILD THEATRE, 52d St., ■ of Broadway

THE THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS
REUNION IN VIENNA
 A comedy by ROBERT B. SHERWOOD
MARTIN BECK THEA., ■ St. & 8 Ave. PENN. 6-6100
 Evgs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

GILBERT MILLER and LESLIE HOWARD present
LESLIE HOWARD
 in PHILIP BARRY'S New Comedy
THE ANIMAL KINGDOM
 Staged by GILBERT MILLER
 BROADHURST THEA. 44th St., West of Broadway
 Mats., Wednesday and Saturday 2:30

ARCH SELWYN presents
THE DEVIL PASSES A NEW PLAY BY
 BENN W. LEVY
 with ARTHUR BYRON, BASIL RATHBONE, ROBERT LORAIN, MARY NASH, DIANA WYNYARD, CECILIA LOFTUS, ERNEST THESIGER, ERNEST COSSART.
 SELWYN THEA., W. 42nd St. Evgs. 8:30 | Prices Evgs. $1 ■ ■
 Mats.: Thurs. and Sat. | Mats. $1 to $2.50

GILBERT MILLER Presents
HELEN HAYES
 in MOLNAR'S New Comedy
THE GOOD FAIRY
 HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
 Evenings 8:50 Matinees Thursday and Saturday 2:40

"First American play of the ■■■■■ of any sound quality; a play real in its character, ■■■■■ its dialogue and consistently intelligent in ■■■■■ approach to its subject matter."—George Jean Nathan, Judge.

THE LEFT BANK

By ELMER RICE
 LITTLE THEATRE, ■■■■■ Street Telephone LA 4-6620
 Evgs. $1 to $3. Wed. Mat. $1, $1.50 and $2. Sat. Mat. $1 - $2.50

LOUIS FISCHER
 Foremost Authority on Russia
 Available for lectures after February 1st
 For terms and open dates address
 LEE KEEDICK, 475 Fifth Avenue, New York

REUNION IN NEW YORK

Green Mansions' Dance

Friday, January 15, 1932

GREEN MANSIONS

35 WEST 90TH ST.
 Schuyler 4-3250

HOTEL ST. GEORGE
 51 Clark Street
 Brooklyn, N. Y.

Admission $1.50 . . . Informal

Debate! SHALL WE DISARM?

Can Peace Be Assured by Reduction of Armaments?

BISHOP FRANCIS J. McCONNELL Says YES!

vs.

GENERAL SMEDLEY D. BUTLER Says NO!

CHAIRMAN: HEYWOOD BROWN

SAT. EVE., JAN. 30th, 1932, AT MECCA TEMPLE

ON THE EVE OF THE GENEVA CONFERENCE

Tickets: $.50-.75-$1.00-$1.50-$2.00—Reservations Accepted Now
 Mgt.—DISCUSSION GUILD—15 East 40th St., LEx. 2-5024

A Clearing House of Opinion THE GROUP Meets at Auditorium
 150 West 85th St.

Tuesday, January 19th, ■ 8:30 P.M.

PROF. E. C. LINDEMAN speaks on:

"THE MACHINE AND ITS CULTURAL INFLUENCE"

This Sunday Aft. (Jan. 17th) ■ 4:30 P.M.

ROY L. McCARDELL speaks on:

"BABBITS—AREN'T WE ALL?" (Tea Served)

"THE WORLD CRISIS AS I SEE IT"
 LECTURE BY PROF. HARRY A. OVERSTREET
 Sunday Jan. 17—8:30 P.M.

BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC
 80 LAFAYETTE AVE. near FLATBUSH AVE.
 TICKETS—25c, 50c, $1.00 AT BOX OFFICE OR
 RAND BOOK STORE—7 East 15th St., N.Y.C.
 AUSPICES—BROOKLYN FORUM—SOCIALIST PARTY

□ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT □

PLAYS TO SEE

Brief Moment—Belasco—W. 44 St.
 Civic Light Opera Co.—Erlanger's—W. 44 St.
 Counsellor-at-Law—Plymouth—W. 45 St.
 Cynara—Morosco—45 St. W. of B'way.
 Mourning Becomes Electra—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.
 OF Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.
 Reunion in Vienna—Martin Beck—45 St. ■ Ave.
 Springtime for Henry—Bijou—45 St. W. of B'way.
 The Barretts of Wimpole Street—Empire—B'way. & 40 St.
 The Band Wagon—New Amsterdam—W. 42 St.
 The Bride The Sun Shines On—Fulton—46 St. W. of B'way.
 The Devil Passes—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
 The Good Fairy—Henry Miller's—124 W. 43 St.
 The Left Bank—Little—44 St.

SCOTT NEARING, Ph. D.

Who Has Just Returned from a Trip Around the World!

In A Series of Nine Lectures on

"A New World Economy"

Thursday Evenings at 8:15

Jan. 21—Economic Evolution

Why does one form of economy replace another? The rise of national and imperial economy. Inter-national economy. Modifications in the productive forces. Shifts in class power. Speeding up and directing the economic process.

Jan. 28—The Beginning of World Economy

Is a new economy emerging? The decay of national and imperial economy. Exploitation. War. Expansion. Revolution. The first stage of a world economy.

Feb. 4—Purposive Economics

Can economic forces be controlled and directed? The bankruptcy of laissez-faire. The goal: a decent living for the human race. Role of the economic expert. New economic principles for a new economic era.

Feb. 11—Economic Planning

Is a world five-year plan possible? The chaos of a planless world. The principles of planned economy. A world budget. World planning and world planners.

Feb. 18—The Organization of Production

Can the world's productive system be rationalized? Competition, duplication, waste. Industrialization. Mobilizing the world's resources, tools and man power to provide for the needs of mankind.

Feb. 25—Money Power

What role will money play in the new world economy? Money as a yardstick for barter; as an agency of exploitation. Value and its measurement. A stable money unit.

Mar. 3—Price Control

What shall determine prices? Supply and demand. Failure of the open market. Monopoly. Prices, taxation, the budget, and self-supporting commodities.

Mar. 10—The Division of Income

How shall the social income be divided? The "grab" system. Individual and social income. Income according to need; to product. Guaranteeing income.

Mar. 17—The Administration of World Economy

What administrative system will develop with world economy? Natural economy and the nation; international economy and the League of Nations; world economy and a league of industries. A sovereign world parliament, directing a unified, planned, world economy.

At the Community Church, meeting at

TEMPLE BETH-EL—Fifth Avenue at 76th Street

Course tickets—$3.00; single admission—50 cents; Student course tickets—$1.50; single admission—35 cents. Apply Church Office, 76th Street.

Building for Happiness

The common impression that social work is primarily concerned with salvaging unfortunates is only partly correct. Social work is concerned not only with normalizing the socially maladjusted individual but also with building up a happier and culturally richer community life. In Jewish social work the opportunities for constructive work are especially numerous and promising.

Have you chosen your career? If not, you should examine carefully the advantages, both tangible and intangible, of

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

A number of scholarships and fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each academic year are available for especially qualified college graduates.

For full information write to
M. J. KARPP, Director

The Training School

For Jewish Social Work

(A Graduate School)

71 W. 47th St., New York City

posed to contain something which must be got to England in order to prevent the British fleet from going somewhere or other on the eve of the Great War. But their contents are so inviolably secret that the audience is never given a hint as to what they are or why the handsome young spy who knows all about them should not take the next boat across the Channel and tell somebody or other likely to meet an admiral or two at dinner. And why, I may ask still further, do secret agents who ought to be hard to find invariably frequent the most popular restaurants in the company of double-crossing adventuresses who look and act about as safe as cobras? It is true that they appear—on the evidence of various causes célèbres—to do just that, but there is no reason why melodrama should be so scrupulously true to life in that one aspect which appears most improbable.

Evidently the sponsors of the play had in mind the fact that various melodramas inherently as preposterous as this one have enjoyed a real success before proudly sophisticated audiences. Probably they had "Broadway" or "Grand Hotel" in their memories and nourished false hopes upon the quite justified belief that "Berlin" is no worse, sub specie aeternitatis, than they were. But what they ought to have remembered is the elementary fact that the eye of eternity has little to do with current success, and that bad melodramas go over only when there is something superficially novel or superficially veracious about them. Hard-boiled reporters, sentimental bootleggers, and virgin-hearted hostesses of Broadway night clubs are relatively new, but secret police, sinister German princes, and above all "the papers" are hopelessly worn out. A few years hence one set will seem as funny as the other, but this is 1932—and not 1902 or 1942.

None of the other events of a very busy but not very distinguished post-holiday week require more than a brief mention. At the Royale Theater Ernest Vajda's "Fata Morgana" stands up very well indeed in a revival after eight years; so too does Noel Coward's irresponsible comedy "Hay Fever," which, after an interval of seven, is being seen again at the Avon. And if Henry J. Byron's "The Lancashire Lass" stands up very badly indeed, it was intended to do so by the Victorian Players, who are offering it as the first of a projected series of spoofing revivals at the President Theater, while the spectator may well devote a few minutes of astonishment to the fact that Henry Irving was a member of the original cast.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Contributors to This Issue

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, formerly managing editor of The Nation, is now studying conditions in Germany.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

RICHARD S. CHILDS, a senior at Yale, is one of the editors of the Harkness Hoot.

WILLIAM SIDNEY is the pen name of a writer who has made a special study of municipal ownership.

MARK VAN DOREN is the author of "Jonathan Gentry." LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS contributes verse to various periodicals.

HARRY ELMER BARNES is the author of "The Genesis of the World War."

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL is professor of English literature in Loyola University and one of the editors of Poetry: A Magazine of Verse.

ERNEST GRUENING, editor of the Portland Evening News, is author of "The Public Pays: A Study of Power Propaganda."

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 27, 1932

No. 3473

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS.....	85
EDITORIALS:
Bond Issues or Starvation.....	88
The Future of Birth Control.....	89
Economic Isolation.....	89
The Blessed Isles.....	90
Pictures for Sale.....	90
Youth Votes for Peace.....	91
SPEAKING OF REVOLUTION... By Hendrik Willem van Loon..	92
AMERICAN LOANS TO LATIN AMERICA.....	93
AN EMERGENCY CURRENCY. By Henry Hazlitt.....	94
WHAT I BELIEVE. By Edmund Wilson.....	95
WHAT POLISH JEWS ARE FACING. By Boris Smolar.....	99
CARTOON. By Wortman.....	101
THE POPE'S POSITION ON BIRTH CONTROL. By Margaret Sanger.....	102
CONGRESS AND BIRTH CONTROL. By Robert S. Allen.....	104
BIRTH CONTROL AND SOCIAL ENGINEERING. By Henry Pratt Fairchild.....	105
ASIATIC CONFLICT AND OVERPOPULATION. By C. V. Drysdale.....	107
BIRTH CONTROL, RELIGION, AND THE UNFIT. By Charlotte Perkins Gilman.....	108
BIRTH CONTROL IN DISEASE. By S. Adolphus Knopf, M.D..	109
THE SPIRITUAL ASPECT OF BIRTH CONTROL. By George B. Lake, M.D.....	110
BIRTH CONTROL AND SEX MORALITY. By William Allen Pusey, M.D.....	111
EDUCATION AND BIRTH CONTROL. By John Dewey.....	112
HOW WE NULLIFY. By Morris L. Ernst.....	113
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	114
CORRESPONDENCE.....	115
FINANCE: CRYSTAL-GAZING IN WALL STREET. By S. Palmer Harman.....	116
BOOKS, ART, DRAMA:
This Nonchalant Pause of Earth. By Florence Kiper Frank.....	117
The Perfect Secretary of War. By Oswald Garrison Villard.....	117
"The Mystic and Bizarre Emily." By Granville Hicks.....	119
African Biography. By Melville J. Herskovits.....	119
Parasitic Profits. By W. P. Mangold.....	120
Books in Brief.....	120
Art: An Essay on Marin. By Paul Rosenfeld.....	122
Drama: Lynching Bee. By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	124
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.....	126

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

LEWIS WOOD BROWN FRED KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE DEMOCRATIC VICTORY dinners, on January 14, sixty in number, presage a vigorous and united campaign with the drift steadily toward Governor Roosevelt or the nomination. There can be no doubt that if the convention were to be held on February 1 it would be a walk-over for him. But February 1 is not June 1, and much may happen in the meantime. If the situation continues about as is, the chances will overwhelmingly favor the Governor of New York. In a sense he is winning by default. We cannot believe that the Democratic Party will nominate Governor Ritchie, a wet who stands upon a platform of States' rights that was out of date years ago. We do not think that the party will turn to Newton D. Baker, a wet who has, consistently and courageously, again announced his adherence to the League of Nations and demanded that the United States enter the League at once. He is also unthinkable as a Presidential candidate because, as president of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Cleveland, he signed and published full-page newspaper advertisements of that organization demanding the open shop in Cleveland and attacking organized labor. Nor does it seem to us practical politics for the party to select a man who was so identified with the Administration of Woodrow Wilson. All of this makes a grave situation for the party. On the other side there is comic relief: Postmaster General Brown has announced to the world the surprising news that Mr. Hoover is a candidate for renomination. What a shock! We hasten to pass on to the Postmaster General, Mr. Hoover's manager, as an excellent slogan for use in his campaign, one that has just been sent to us for our indorsement: "Don't swap toboggans in the middle of the slide."

FOUR MORE EUROPEAN NATIONS are "on the brink of default." Austria, Bulgaria, Greece, and Yugoslavia are said to be about to follow Hungary's example and to announce their inability to meet their foreign interest payments, which will painfully affect the American holders of some $600,000,000 of securities then to be placed in the defaulting class. Thus the financial and economic disintegration of Europe goes on apace. It need surprise no one. For several years the inevitability of the breakdown has been evident to all who really studied the situation. Only the men responsible for the several governments have refused to see it and to take the necessary steps to ward it off and to restore Europe to economic sanity. That the United States has played an unenlightened, and in some respects a deliberately inimical, role does not alter the fact that the European nations themselves, because of the post-war treaties, their tariff folly, and in some cases their voluntary assumption of crushing military burdens, have contributed more than their share to the coming catastrophe. Meanwhile the conference at Lausanne, at this writing scheduled for January 25 (with the French reported to be eager to postpone it until June!), has a last chance to mend matters before it is too late.

JAPAN'S NAIVETE in conducting diplomatic negotiations incidental to her occupation of Manchuria may yet prove her undoing. Japanese aggression on the Asiatic mainland has been formally condemned at Geneva and elsewhere as being in direct violation of the Kellogg Pact and the Nine-Power Treaty. That Japan's action did violate these two agreements cannot be denied, and has not been denied anywhere outside Japan. Nevertheless, in replying to Secretary Stimson's recent note, the new Foreign Minister, Kenkichi Yoshizawa, said:

The Government of Japan is well aware that the Government of the United States could always be relied upon to do everything in their power to support Japan's efforts to secure full and complete fulfilment in every detail of the treaties of Washington and the Kellogg treaty for the outlawry of war. They are glad to receive this additional assurance of the fact.

Such impudent twisting of the facts will win Japan no new friends in this country. With respect to Russia the Japanese have shown themselves undiplomatically rude. Russia's interest in North Manchuria is hardly less definite than Japan's interest in South Manchuria. Japanese military activities in the neighborhood of Tsitsihar jeopardized Russian interests, but Moscow remained patient and so avoided a conflict with Tokio. More recently Moscow proposed that the two countries negotiate a non-aggression pact, apparently in the hope of preventing a future Russo-Japanese conflict over Manchuria. But the Japanese allowed the proposal to lie unanswered until Moscow made a second inquiry. Thereupon the Japanese replied very curtly that they had not yet got around to studying the Russian proposal.

FRENCH POLITICS as well as the German situation played a large part in the reconstruction of the French Cabinet. With the national elections only a few months off, the Radical and other left-wing parties did not want to prejudice their excellent opportunity for a victory at the polls by sharing responsibility with their opponents for the handling of the new reparations negotiations. The Radicals believe that public opinion in France is now ready to accept some modification in French reparations policy, and they are also convinced that Premier Laval has decided not to depart from France's traditionally stern attitude toward Germany. By not accepting his invitation to join the new government they have left themselves free to attack the Laval program, whatever that may be, during the election campaign. It may be noted that the only important change in the Cabinet was the substitution of Premier Laval for Aristide Briand in the foreign ministry. Although Briand has lost much of his domestic political influence, he has lost little of his international prestige. Hence it was necessary to offer Briand a place in the Cabinet without portfolio so that the rest of Europe would not be too greatly alarmed by the extremely nationalistic composition of the French government on the eve of the delicate reparations and disarmament negotiations.

EIGHTEEN MONTHS AGO representatives of the moderate left-wing parties in Poland met in Cracow, denounced the Pilsudski dictatorship, and demanded the resignation of President Moscicki. A few days ago in Warsaw ten leaders of these parties, including Vincent Witos, thrice Premier of the Polish republic, were sentenced to prison on the ground that the resolutions adopted by the Cracow congress were revolutionary in intent. Behind these bare facts lies a tale of repression and brutality that began with the arrest of the ten party leaders and numerous other political opponents of Pilsudski just before the November, 1930, elections. The treatment to which these men were subjected while held in Brest-Litovsk fortress was brutal and inhuman. Pilsudski long ago earned the undying enmity of the National Democrats of the right; he has now again defied the great masses of the working people and peasants, whose party leaders were convicted. He has little, if any, popular support left, and must depend more than ever on his army. In addition, he has on his hands the task of "pacifying" the Ukraine, of quieting the fears of the Lithuanians in the Vilna district, and of solving the increasingly important problem of the Corridor. Poland remains a distinct threat to the peace of Europe.

BRTAIN IS FINDING OUT in India that, as always, one repression necessitates another and cruelty is inevitably cumulative. Having embarked on a course of barbarism toward adults, it has not been easy to handle children with that sportsmanship and fair play which have sometimes been such admirable British characteristics. Incredible to relate, one nine-year-old boy, shouting his readiness to die for Gandhi, was sentenced to four years' imprisonment for anti-British demonstrations. But not only are native followers of Gandhi suspected; even American missionaries, it appears, are to be denied the privilege of remaining in the peninsula if they are discovered to have sympathy for the Indian cause. The Reverend G. B. Halstead has been forced to resign as social director of Lucknow Christian College for just that reason, and has followed the government's advice to leave the country. We can assure our British cousins that the outrages in India arouse no enthusiasm in the United States, though we have not forgotten our own imperialist sins; and that the threatened expulsion of any American from India who, in Christian sympathy, is attracted by the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi will hardly increase American confidence in Britain's capacity to rule.

PETER WITT, liberal and independent candidate, was defeated by two machine politicians in the mayoralty primary in Cleveland on January 12. The winning candidates, who will face each other in the final election on February 16, are Daniel E. Morgan, Republican, and Ray T. Miller, Democrat. Mr. Witt's defeat was surprising as he had been given a comfortable lead in virtually all the pre-election straw votes. It was all the more surprising in view of the fact that Cleveland was the only large city outside of Wisconsin carried by Senator La Follette in the 1924 Presidential campaign. Witt had Socialist and liberal support, though some voters who might have followed him were diverted to Dr. F. W. Walz, another independent candidate. Organized labor indorsed the Republican machine candidate, not without considerable protest from the rank and file. One feature of the primary that has caused widespread comment was the increase in Communist strength. The Communist vote was still small, totaling only 5,242, but this was about five times more than the radical party had ever before polled in Cleveland. It is worth noting that the Communist candidate, I. O. Ford, stood alone in emphasizing unemployment relief as the major issue in the campaign. We are sorry to record Mr. Witt's defeat, for he is a true reformer and a man of unflinching courage.

NO MATTER WITH WHAT WEAKNESS our authorities act in regard to an economic crisis, they can always summon force and energy to repress its protesting victims. Anticipating mob demonstrations or even food riots, the Thirty-third Division, Illinois National Guard, has recently issued a 104-page manual entitled "Emergency Plans for Domestic Disturbances." There is no sentimental nonsense about this program for feeding bullets to hungry rebels. Pointing out that troop commanders can rely for aid upon Legion posts and chambers of commerce, the manual urges that "the proper performance of riot duty requires the adoption of and adherence to general plans, which are tests of the officer's ability. An ambitious officer may, by decisive action and proper distribution of troops, acquire fame." The manual's plans cover the posting of sharpshooters on roofs to pick off rioters from the rear, the dropping of aviation bombs into buildings where armed mobs have taken refuge, and the use of machine-guns, tear gas, and white-phosphorus grenades. Some of the further constructive suggestions of this forward-looking pamphlet are as follows: "Blank cartridges should never be fired at a mob"; "never fire over the heads of rioters"; "a subordinate should never be placed on riot duty with any definite restrictions as to the amount of force to be used." The Socialist Party, which first called public notice to the manual, pointedly inquires: "Is the situation to be left to those who know nothing to appease hunger but force?"

IN ALL THE FINANCIAL MISERY of the cities, one bright spot stands out—Milwaukee. During 1931 the city paid all its salaries and bills, expended hundreds of thousands of dollars for unemployed relief, and wound up the year with a bank balance of about $4,000,000. The Mayor of Milwaukee, Daniel W. Hoan, is a Socialist who has been reelected to that office ever since 1916—one of those wicked Socialists who wish to ruin America and destroy our precious Constitution—and this is the result. It is, of course, not entirely the work of the Mayor; there is a non-partisan Controller who watches expenditures like a hawk. It is not simply because the Mayor is a Socialist. It is due primarily to the fact that the Mayor is honest and sincere, that he has felt he owed it to his party as well as to the city to make a splendid record, and that after fifteen years of service he is a master of his job. Socialism itself is hardly farther advanced in Milwaukee than elsewhere, yet the city government does reflect the spirit of that movement and its zeal for banning political corruption wherever encountered. Nor is Milwaukee noteworthy merely on the financial side. It has no gangsters; its police are efficient; its criminal courts are the speediest in the country, and the justice they dispense is even-handed. New York, Chicago, and other cities could have this sort of government—if they wished it.

THE COMMISSIONER OF LICENSES of New York City has taken things into his own hands in the matter of censorship. In an order to newsdealers in the city, Commissioner Geraghty issued the warning that continued sale of indecent publications would result in a revocation of licenses. One wonders if it is worth while respectfully to point out to the Commissioner that, at least in the absence of advices to the contrary, the courts in New York City are still functioning; and that if any citizen of the city, or even any license commissioner, believes that obscene publications are being displayed for sale upon any newsstand, he may protest to the police, make charges to the District Attorney, and wait for an indictment and a jury trial. If such citizen feels it necessary immediately to stop the offending display, he may, we suppose, appeal for an injunction to restrain the dealer while the case is pending. The National Council on Freedom from Censorship has issued a letter of protest to Mr. Geraghty and to District Attorney Crain, not only pointing out how high-handed Mr. Geraghty's methods are but urging that action—if any—be taken against the publishers of certain magazines instead of the newsdealers. The Nation's position on so-called obscene publications is well known; it believes that the public should be its own censor in the matter, and that it is capable of refusing to buy magazines which it does not like. But while the courts still may exercise the right of censorship, surely that right should not be left to any one official.

THE SEASON FOR THE REPORTS of university presidents is upon us. At Columbia as usual President Butler begins with a list of the "outstanding happenings of the year," covering some ten pages. "Outstanding happenings" range from the splendid Columbia University edition of the works of John Milton to the "formal presentation by the university of gates to the graveyards in which the bodies of two early presidents of the university are buried." Perhaps the most questionable item in President Butler's report is his catalogue of the various institutions which by affiliation or otherwise now constitute Columbia University. This catalogue covers three pages and includes Columbia College and its graduate school, for the financing and directing of which Columbia is responsible, but it also includes a host of other institutions, for the financing of which Columbia has no responsibility whatever, despite the fact that it uses its name and good-will in their behalf. It is difficult to understand how the President of Columbia University, with his diversified interests, some of them, such as his interest in international peace, highly creditable to him, can possibly influence the conduct or quality of a school in Porto Rico, a social center in Greenwich Village, or a college ninety miles up the Hudson. The inclusion of these and other irrelevant activities and institutions has, as President Butler reports, the great advantage of swelling the total enrolment of the institution to something like 50,000, of whom almost 40,000 are "resident." It would seem that these figures contain in themselves the severest possible criticism of the policies upon which the university has embarked.

JUSTICE OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES has bowed to the inevitable and stepped down from the Supreme Court of the United States with all the dignity and wisdom that have marked his whole career and so profoundly endeared him to the American people. We wish that we could be as philosophical as he. But the retirement of this noble spirit moves us deeply. For one thing he is in his person the final link with the Civil War period, the America of Lincoln and Grant, the boys in blue, the men in gray. His retirement marks the final closing of an era. In all the writings of Oliver Wendell Holmes, the father of the Justice, there is nothing more touching than the essay written for the Atlantic Monthly in which he told of his "hunt for the captain" after the battle at Antietam. In another three months it will be exactly seventy years since that father's search for the son he adored, who has lived so long to honor him and his country. Now the question comes as to who should be his successor. Surely there is one man who stands out as entirely fit, Benjamin N. Cardozo, the Chief Justice of the New York State Court of Appeals. We shall be told that his appointment, or that of Judge Learned Hand, who also merits promotion to the Supreme Court, is impossible because there are already two judges on the Supreme Court from the Empire State. We have never believed in the geographical rule of appointments. It seems to us that the sole question should be the fitness of the man, and as to Judge Cardozo's fitness there can be no doubt whatever.

Bond Issues or Starvation

THE government is preparing to borrow money to help needy banks and industrial corporations. May it not also borrow money to help the millions of unemployed workers? May we not employ the power of the state to prevent widespread suffering and hunger as well as bankruptcies and market losses? Economic law may have its own answers to these questions, but economics alone cannot be permitted to dictate our course. We cannot turn from our door those who are starving today, or those who may be starving tomorrow, simply because to help them with the aid of government funds would be uneconomic. To do so would be to ignore completely our collective social responsibility. But we do not admit that government relief for the workless and their numerous dependents would violate economic law. Properly administered, such relief could well give impetus to the reconstruction process about which the Hoover Administration has lately been talking so much. The relief could take several forms. It might be an unconditional distribution of money to the hungry—an alternative the country may have to face sooner than it now supposes. Or it might take the form of housing or other government construction programs that would provide work for the unemployed and would be financed through the public sale of bonds.

Whether it is a cause or an effect of our present difficulties, the major factor in the depression is the sharply curtailed purchasing power of the great bulk of the people. Goods are not being sold, because they cannot be bought, because there are many million Americans who have not sufficient money to purchase even the bare necessities of life. At the same time there is more than enough unused purchasing power in this country to finance any of the public-building programs now before Congress. It is possible that a huge bond issue at this time might strain the credit position of the government, but if care were taken in marketing the bonds we believe this would not happen. Senator La Follette has proposed that they be sold directly to the public with the help of campaigns similar to the Liberty Loan drives. Bond issues planned in connection with the Reconstruction Corporation and similar measures are not designed to transfer our latent purchasing power to the people who could use it to the best advantage for the country as a whole. The proceeds from the sale of such bonds are to be used almost exclusively to bolster up temporarily embarrassed banks and corporations. But the proceeds from the sale of public-building bonds would be largely translated into direct purchasing power. Much of it would go to buy building materials, while even more of it would reach the reemployed workers in the form of wages, and this would help them to buy food, clothing, and other necessities they now lack. It can hardly be denied that employment in many industries beyond those immediately affected would thereby be greatly stimulated.

Many objections have been raised to this plan, probably the most serious of which is the widely heard complaint that for the federal government to finance a public-building program would be to break down local enterprise and initiative.

Thus a special committee of the President's Organization on Unemployment Relief contends that "the assumption by the federal government of such obligations would inevitably lead to ever-increasing appropriations, and furthermore would necessarily weaken the sense of responsibility of the municipalities and States to provide for their local needs and welfare, and would postpone, if not prevent, the adoption by the localities of wise, local, long-time construction plans." This was obviously intended as a direct criticism of Senator La Follette's bill, under which the sum of $3,750,000,000 would be made available for loans to State and local authorities. The committee further suggests that "if some localities are unable to carry their burden" in this respect, "then the States will do their share." The members of the committee know only too well that most municipalities, because of statutory debt limitations and for other reasons, are unable today to carry any kind of additional burden. A dispatch from Boston the other day reported that five Massachusetts cities are no longer in a position to meet their ordinary pay rolls, let alone contemplate the expenditure of extra money for public works or unemployment relief. Numerous other municipalities are finding themselves in similar plight. Chicago's case is too well known to need discussion here. New York City is rapidly approaching a municipal financial crisis. Philadelphia cannot pay its employees regularly but must borrow money for the purpose. Detroit has had to lay off several hundred of its civil servants. But Mr. Hoover's committee promises that the States "will do their share." How many States have begun work on construction programs extensive enough to provide employment for a majority of their jobless residents? Not one that we know of. In fact, we find the same people who are blocking this plan in Congress obstructing like measures in their State legislatures. The conservatives in the Wisconsin senate have thus far defeated every relief bill introduced by the progressives on the ground that State action would undermine local responsibility. Thus the Hoover Administration through its committee is really advocating a policy of inaction and despair.

We can think of more pertinent objections to the various public-building programs. Too much emphasis is placed on highways and government buildings, and not enough on housing. Our overcrowded, insanitary slum districts furnish us with one of the most important social problems of the present age. A few billions of dollars spent on housing would be much more profitable to society as a whole than would all the additional highways, beautiful post offices, and ornamental bridges envisaged in the several bills under consideration. But such objections as these must not be allowed to obscure the principal objective. Public construction will provide work for many of our unemployed. It will to a considerable extent increase purchasing power. It will save many of our fellow-citizens from continued distress and hunger. We must either choose that course—or leave it to chance and the doubtful economic experiments of the Hoover Administration to prevent further suffering among the ten million or more Americans who are now without work.

The Future of Birth Control

WE have gone out of our way to devote a considerable portion of this unusually large issue of The Nation to the subject of birth control because of the overshadowing importance of the question at this grave juncture of the world's economic history. With millions upon millions out of work, on the verge of starvation or actually starving, the question of population becomes of transcendent importance—so much so that H. G. Wells on his recent visit to New York declared that if things continue as they are some 400,000,000 people must needs perish in order to restore the old equilibrium. Fantastic that utterance sounds; exaggerated it indubitably is. Still, the present emergency is too grave and the threat of a long-drawn-out world convalescence too likely, not to call peoples' attention sharply to a reconsideration of the old theory that the larger the nation the better for all its people.

But if there were no economic crisis whatever, we should none the less again be lifting our voice to demand that no limits of any kind be set to the dissemination of facts about birth control and to urge its practice. This is in its essence a question of individual freedom and liberty. Unlike the question of drink or drugs, it connotes, our Catholic friends to the contrary notwithstanding, no injury to public morals or well-being; on the contrary there is no single thing we know of that could bring greater health and happiness and a sounder morality to the masses of the working people, or bring them as quickly. We are especially aiming this issue of The Nation at Congress and men in public life, because of the direct efforts now being made to induce Congress and the State legislatures to expunge from the statute books the legislation which makes it criminal to disseminate birth-control information through the mails and to distribute contraceptives. We are in favor of complete repeal of all such laws. In taking this stand we are merely asking that the country revert to its historic position during the first hundred years of its existence, when there were no restrictions whatever, as is pointed out by Morris L. Ernst in his article printed elsewhere in this issue. We are aware, of course, that in asking complete repeal we are asking what is impossible today. So we are quite ready to accept any legislation and to welcome any court decision which will break down any part of the now existing laws. The courts have done excellent work so far and will doubtless continue to do so. But we wish that anti-social legislation entirely repealed before it becomes a dead letter, before it too is nullified by non-enforcement and joins the mass of matter which would be wiped off the statute books if we should ever have a complete elimination of the unenforced and unenforceable laws.

Meanwhile we have this constructive suggestion to make: We urge a Congressional committee on birth control for a complete inquiry into the whole subject by an authoritative body. We would not limit it merely to the question of whether legislation is desirable or not. We would not limit it merely to the pros and cons of a particular bill or bills. We would have it go into such subjects as the extent of the present dissemination of birth-control knowledge and of the existing nullification of the law, whereby, like so many other statutes, it has become a weapon to be used only when, because of pressure from some bigoted or clerical source, the police decide suddenly to move against a particular person or set of persons. Such a committee could discover that in the case of the Lee Rubber Company in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals the evidence indicated that one particular contraceptive circulated in the mails to the extent of 20,000,000 in a single year. Such a committee might even interest itself in the development of the technique of birth control.

That birth-control advocates are in for a long fight no one can doubt. The ignorance, the cowardice, the prejudices with which they have to contend are sufficient to daunt any hearts less brave than those of Mrs. Sanger, or Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett, or the other pioneers and leaders in this great movement to end unnecessary and unwilling motherhood, to put marriage and the marriage relation where they rightfully belong. In America the chief enemy is, of course, the Catholic church. That that opposition will in time be overcome we do not question; there are too many Catholics themselves profiting by the knowledge of birth control, especially among the rich members of the church, to leave any doubt as to that. The question becomes merely one of obeying the dictates of sound sense, sound morals, and economic wisdom. Today most of our politicians, even those that come from overwhelmingly Protestant districts, are too much afraid to speak out, or to advocate the position some know to be correct. Especially is this true of Congress. But greater odds were faced by Abolitionists and the woman suffragists, who yet lived to see their causes triumph in far shorter time than anyone dreamed to be possible. So will it be with birth control.

Economic Isolation

MR. HOOVER has dropped those messy European problems, according to the Washington correspondents, and "will devote his entire time to the domestic problems of the United States." His position, we learn further and more emphatically, is that "the 'home job' has assumed such proportions as to merit virtually his undivided attention." This is not only the position of Mr. Hoover; it also appears to be the position, we regret to add, of the great majority in Congress, as well as of a substantial and apparently increasing number of newspaper editorial writers. It is a very comforting doctrine, but hardly one that will stand close scrutiny. Does Mr. Hoover himself believe it? That depends, apparently, on the political needs of the moment. Mr. Hoover does not wish to admit that the present or the past Republican Administration has the slightest responsibility for the present crisis; therefore he has been insisting with increasing frequency that the depression is "world-wide" and entirely the result of the deplorable policies of Europe. Now he solemnly assures us that all the cures for this world-wide depression lie at home. This was not Mr. Hoover's opinion a few weeks ago, when he delivered his annual message to Congress. At that time, after his customary gesture in shifting all responsibility for the crisis to Europe, he was at least logical enough to add: "As our difficulties during the past year have plainly originated in large degree from these [foreign] sources, any effort to bring about our own recuperation has dictated the necessity of cooperation by us with other nations in reasonable effort to restore world confidence and economic stability."

The plain truth is that an international economic crisis can be the result only of factors that have an international effect. There is not the slightest doubt that one of the chief causes of the present depression is our outrageously high tariff. In seeking to shift the blame for the crisis to foreign countries, Mr. Hoover remarked that ten countries had been unable to meet their external obligations, and that fourteen had temporarily abandoned their former monetary standards. But Mr. Hoover did not stop to say that by practically refusing to receive goods from them, we had made it almost impossible for other countries to make large payments to us, and that, by compelling them to send gold in place of goods for the payments that they did make, we had finally succeeded in draining them of gold to such an extent as to force them to abandon the gold standard. Nor did it occur to Mr. Hoover to point to the obvious fact that in the long run exports must be paid for with imports, and that to the extent to which we cut off our import trade we must necessarily cut off our export trade, so that all our exporting industries, including agriculture, must languish. When Mr. Hoover now says that he is going to devote himself entirely to "domestic problems," what he really means is that he intends to ignore entirely the basic causes for the world's disease, and to fix his attention solely on the American symptoms, always with a weather eye on next November.

The Blessed Isles

THE popular conception of Hawaii as an earthly paradise has been rudely shaken during the past few weeks. When the Massie case, as a result of the charge of murder brought against Mrs. Fortescue and Lieutenant Massie, with their associates, became public property the reaction among naval officials and many lay persons in this country was sharp and instantaneous. It is exemplified clearly in the telegram to Mrs. Fortescue from her friend Mrs. Eva Stotesbury of Philadelphia: "I would have done the same thing in your place and so would any other good mother." This point of view, of course, assumes that Mrs. Fortescue is guilty of murder in the first degree. It is too soon to say whether or not a jury will so find her. But it must be clear to any person of reasoned judgment that if "any good mother" would have done "the same thing," she would have thereby turned herself into a mother whose "goodness" was very much open to question.

Let us say again what we have said on many other occasions: Rape is the worst of crimes; the victim is entitled to every sympathy, to protection and consideration of every possible sort; and the offenders, when their identity is established, should be subjected to the full punishment of the law. But lynch law in Hawaii is no more to be condoned than lynch law in Mississippi. With this attitude clearly in mind, we may proceed to some of the later reports from Honolulu. On the evidence of the Governor of the Territory, former Governor Wallace R. Farrington, and Victor

S. K. Houston, Hawaiian delegate to Congress, the charge that Honolulu is a hotbed of lawlessness, general disorder, and racial antagonism is altogether false. Governor Lawrence Judd also takes occasion to controvert some of the statements of Admiral Stirling's report relative to the rape trial, and adds that, although he finds himself in disagreement with the commandant, "I have not made a single statement which I cannot prove by documentary or other competent evidence." His most important correction is in the matter of counsel for the defense of the men Mrs. Massie accused. Admiral Stirling indicated that large sums from unknown persons had subsidized eminent counsel to undertake the defense; Governor Judd declares that "Senator Heen and Mr. Pittman both have made written statements that their fees were comparatively small and were paid entirely by relatives of the defendants." Representative Houston, in giving to the newspapers copies of Judge A. E. Steadman's charge to the jury in the Massie trial, repeated the fact, evidently not well known in this country, that the law of Hawaii forbids a jury to convict in a case of rape solely on the identification of the victim. Corroborative evidence is necessary. It becomes evident, therefore, that the trial was conducted with considerably more reason and restraint than appeared to be the case from Admiral Stirling's account of it. It may further be added that many persons in Honolulu believe the men accused of the attack to be not guilty. According to Mr. Farrington: "The attorneys for the defense . . . established an alibi that caused even trained reporters who had followed the case in its every detail to doubt whether the police had the right men."

The House Committee on Naval Affairs, the Senate, the Department of Justice are all to conduct or have conducted commissions of inquiry. The Legislature of the Territory is to consider reform of the police administration in Honolulu. But before any of these investigatory or reform bodies meets, every battleship, naval officer, seaman, and soldier should be recalled from the territory. We exercise a civilian authority over the islands. There is no reason why that authority should not be competent to reform where reform is needed, and in the case of the four persons accused of murder, or the four other persons accused of rape, to see that justice is speedily and satisfactorily done.

Pictures for Sale

DR. JOHNSON, so the schoolbooks inform us, freed the writer from his patron. Thanks to the growth of a reading public, it became possible for the author to support himself by his own labors and to receive an honest pay for an honest day's work. He had a market in a sense that he had never had one before, and there is no doubt of the fact that the change was a change for the better. But it is not always remembered that the painter or the sculptor has never achieved any similar readjustment to modern society. Like a writer before the invention of printing, he has only a unique example of each work to sell and, except in the case of the strictly commercial artist, no real outlet for his work. Unless his pictures can be sold for very high prices, they cannot be sold at all; he is as dependent upon the patronage of the rich as any medieval poet ever was; and there is no possible way in which the machinery of modern society can come to his rescue as it came to the rescue of the writer when literature became—as it did—the first commodity to enjoy the advantages of mass production.

Most painters have no desire to paint tomato cans or Arrow collars, but most of them would welcome a public. What they really need is an enlightened attitude on the part of cultivated people and a realization of the fact that a picture which can be bought for no more than would be put into a new armchair for the drawing-room may nevertheless be a picture worth having. Dozens of talented artists who do not happen to be famous would be glad to sell their canvases for no more than that, and hundreds of people would no doubt be glad to buy them if it were not for the fact that it is so unconventional a thing to do. Paintings are for millionaires and museums; prints for the walls of ordinary people. And yet there is nothing which would do more to give security, self-respect, and a livelihood to the rank and file of aspiring artists than a market for that work which is, under present conditions, worth nothing at all unless it is worth so much that the average man could not buy it.

Apparently a realization of something of this sort lies behind the manifesto just issued by the Painters' and Sculptors' Guild, which has its headquarters at the New School for Social Research and which will hold the first of its projected shows in the school building. None of the members of the guild has "arrived," and the group stands for no particular "movement" in painting or sculpture, but the manifesto reveals an honest, unpretentious desire to do something to make the position of the talented but unrecognized artist possible. What he needs most is not "success," as that is commonly understood, but the ability to continue his work, and the guild hopes to make that possible by offering canvases to the public at a price just sufficient to pay for the materials and the maintenance of the artist. It will solicit no contributions and ask no charity but it will exhibit pictures and statues which can be bought at reasonable prices by persons who like them and want to have them in their homes for no reason beyond the fact that they find them pleasing.

It will not be easy to change a psychological attitude as deeply rooted as that of the average man toward the work of an unknown painter. Schemes not dissimilar to this have been proposed before without, unfortunately, having got very far. But we wish all success to the new guild nevertheless, and we cannot see how the position of the painter can ever be improved unless something of the sort should some day create a real market for works of art. The aspirant to no other profession ordinarily finds himself brought face to face with a blank wall so quickly as does the painter who has no private means and who discovers almost immediately that he must attain notoriety or starve. Neither public museums nor public tributes to the value of art are of any value to him for the simple reason that, at best, they do no more than increase the interest in artists who have already attracted the eye of the small group which makes reputations. But the possibility of selling work to individual members of a large public would bring hope to those whose future now seems hopeless. Nor is this by any means all. The public itself would benefit, and might very well learn more about the meaning of the plastic arts by the simple process of choosing from among unfamiliar pictures than it has ever learned by looking earnestly at those whose merits have already been certified.

Youth Votes for Peace

HOW stands the legend of undergraduate indifference to current issues, in the light of the vote taken by the Intercollegiate Disarmament Council in seventy colleges on questions regarding war and peace? A high percentage of the students cast ballots—84 per cent of the entire student body at Amherst, 78 per cent at Yale, and 70 per cent at Mt. Holyoke. That the returns are representative is indicated by the participation of large and small institutions, of various types, in widely separated sections of the country. Among the colleges were, for example, Dartmouth, Wellesley, Virginia Polytechnic Institute, Rollins, Kansas, and Southern Methodist.

In the long vista of warrantable gloom, this is indeed a cause of cheer. For not only have 92 per cent of the 24,345 students voting declared, in general terms, for reduction of armament; no fewer than 63 per cent have urged independent disarmament by the United States without waiting for other countries. On this issue, at least, when an opportunity is offered for the expression of opinion, our college students are not only thinking, but thinking boldly. One out of every seven who replied even went so far as to propose 100 per cent independent disarmament. And if skeptics incline to view these results as due to sentimental idealism, growing out of remoteness from contact with public affairs, let them ponder the vote on military training—a matter of intimate concern in many colleges where it is compulsory, and a question of moment for every young man who faces the possibility that training for war may prove to be an actual rehearsal of what is to come. Here, again, the balloting is consistently anti-war, 81 per cent opposing compulsory drill and 38 per cent—in our judgment, a remarkably high proportion—desiring the abolition of military training altogether in all colleges.

What effect this veritable cry for peace will have on the faculties of our colleges and universities remains to be seen. Official boards, trustees, and presidents, though usually in favor of peace, often have a way of disregarding the wishes of their students when these depart from tradition or run counter to the ambition of vested military interests to use youth for their own purposes. But we are hopeful that this poll may stimulate teachers, especially, to keep on courageously with their task of freeing their institutions from the clutches of war ideology.

While student interest is still keen, however, there are certain further queries we should like to pose. Is disarmament enough? Are the undergraduates who have clearly registered their unwillingness to follow the drums along the avenue of preparedness for war equally ready to enlist, definitely and unequivocally, in the world-wide campaign of war resisters already organized among the young men and women of twenty-two countries? Will they soon be counted among the active workers in the War Resisters' League, the Fellowship of Reconciliation, or similar expanding agencies eager to enrol young persons in the crusade to drive war off our planet? Are they sharing in the struggle to create a social order which will make peace possible? In the long run the answers to such questions will determine the effectiveness of these awakened undergraduates.

Speaking of Revolution . . .

By HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

“DIES irae, dies illa”—well, the saeclum does not exactly solvēt into the favilla, but I am fifty years old today and you will have to pardon me if I do a little semi-centennial reminiscing.

By and large I am glad that the greater part of life is behind me. No, it has not been a bad life, as lives go, nor has it been wholly unsatisfactory. The first twenty years were pretty terrible but that was just one of those things—well, the less said, the better. After all, parents are merely an incident and very often they are just an accident, so why blame anybody?

During the next thirty years the fool things I did were entirely of my own making. I shall probably never be very bright about certain things and I doubt whether I shall ever quite cease doing a vast number of exceedingly foolish things, but I have ceased to worry about them. What seems much more important to me is to find a reasonable modus vivendi which will allow me to get along without too much friction in this new world which has sprung up since the end of the Great War.

For, speaking Slavice, I was born in St. Petersburg, I spent the most interesting part of my days in Petrograd, and I shall end my days in Leningrad. From St. Petersburg to Leningrad is more of a jump than from the Rome of Caesar to the Washington of Roosevelt. I have been obliged to make that jump. But I am like one of those beginners on skis we see nowadays in the newsreel. I have navigated fifty or sixty feet of open space nicely enough. I have actually landed on my feet without breaking my neck. But I am wobbly in the knees. I am having a very hard time trying to find my balance. I am swaying from left to right and from right to left. I may make it. I may not make it. I have a couple of husky kids, much more experienced at this modern sport than I am. They are doing their best to help their pa get safely across the line. But Lord help us, what a jump! what a jump!

There is one thing, however, that fills my heart with sorrow on this particular day. Until a few years ago I myself belonged to the younger generation. Almost overnight I was graduated into the class of the “older generation.” And now there is hardly anybody left who will feel that he has a natural right to tell me where I get off, to speak harsh words of disapproval, and to inform me in unmistakable terms just exactly what sort of idiot I happen to be. From now on it is “Yes, sir” and “No, sir.” But the old familiar “You hopeless, unmitigated, double-barreled grandson of a mule”—that, alas, belongs to the past. I am not a man without a country. I am something much worse. I am a respectable citizen of great dignity whom nobody any longer can patronize merely on account of his extreme youth and lack of experience. My contemporaries, of course, will continue to call me names. But that is different. They will do so by choice and not by right of eminent avuncular domain.

A few years ago I made a great discovery. I still had (I still have, bless him!) an uncle of the old school. I had lost sight of him during my many years of voluntary exile. When I left my native land he was in the prime of his middle-aged glory. After a few years in the East Indies, where he had taught the natives of Sumatra how to turn useless primeval forests into profitable tobacco fields (profitable for the Dutch investors but profitable also for the natives, who often received as much as forty cents a week for their labors), he had been appointed managing director of one of the largest agricultural establishments in Zeeland. He knew his business. In less than five years he had made it one of the show places of the country. Whoever raised a hog or grew an ear of corn in the Old World hoped to have an opportunity some day of going to Holland to see how they did those things in uncle’s domain, and when I say domain, I mean domain, for the old gentleman had a philosophy of life which was simple in the extreme.

“Listen, little boy,” he used to say, for glory be to Allah, although he had to look way up in the air in order to see the effect of his words, I was still to him a very small boy in a sailor’s suit, with a sailor’s cap bearing the legend “Royal Navy,” and with very, very little sense. “These men here who work for me are nice fellows but all this modern stuff about labor unions is poppycock. They want decent wages and they want to feel that no matter what happens they are safe. I pay them decent wages and no one has ever been fired here except for gross incompetence. But I run this show. I run it because I can run it better than they can ever hope to run it. I know it. They know it. So all of us are perfectly happy as we are. Now let us go and see the cows and don’t talk to me again about labor unions, my child.”

We went to see the cows. Uncle was trying out a new experiment. Forty cows shared a pasture with twenty sheep and ten horses. Uncle explained the ratio to the little boy and the little boy listened. Then the little boy asked a question.

“Uncle,” he said, “suppose you increased the number to fifty cows, thirty sheep, and twenty horses. What would happen then?”

“Then, my child, they would all of them get a great deal less to eat, but they would survive, I suppose.”

“Well, suppose you increased the number to a hundred cows, fifty sheep, and thirty horses. What would happen then?”

Said the uncle sternly: “You hopeless idiot, even if you are a little boy, remember that you are my nephew and don’t ask damfool questions! Then they would all starve to death!” Q. E. D.

American Loans to Latin America

THE story of recent American financial imperialism is being told by numerous witnesses who have been appearing before a Senate committee in Washington. How this imperialism works may be seen from the following summary of some of the more important loans made to Latin American governments in the last few years. Almost without exception the loan in each case has been followed by the granting of concessions or monopolies to American corporations. The State Department, it may be noted, is on record as being opposed to loans to foreign countries that are intended to create or finance monopolies, or to finance the purchase of munitions.

BOLIVIA

In 1924 the Equitable Trust Company, a Rockefeller-controlled institution, floated Bolivian bonds to the extent of $29,000,000 on the American market. The loan is now in default.

A few weeks later the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, also controlled by Rockefeller, secured a concession for 1,000,000 hectares of petroleum lands in Bolivia.

In 1928 Dillon, Read, and Company floated a $22,000,000 bond issue in the United States. The bonds are now in default.

Out of this amount, $5,060,000 went to Vickers, Ltd., as payment for arms and ammunition, while $1,500,000 went for the building of military roads near the Paraguayan border.

BRAZIL

In 1929 the National City Company sold to the American investing public $8,500,000 of bonds for the state of Minas Geraes, Brazil.

In the same year the American and Foreign Power Company, subsidiary of the Electric Bond and Share Company, acquired the electric power, light, and street-railway properties serving Bello Horizonte, capital of Minas Geraes.

COLOMBIA

In 1931 the Tropical Oil Company and the Andean Pipe Line Company, both controlled by Standard Oil of New Jersey, advanced $1,000,000 each to the Colombian government. During the same year a suit against them in the Supreme Court of Colombia was dropped.

In 1930 the National City Bank arranged a $20,000,000 credit with the President-elect of Colombia. The American Minister to Colombia, Jefferson Caffrey, participated in the deal. Colombia in return was to pass certain legislation required by the bankers.

A year later—June, 1931—the National City Bank withheld the last $4,000,000 instalment of the $20,000,000 credit until after the Barco concession, a rich oil field, owned by the Mellon Gulf interests, was approved by the Colombian Congress. During this period of delay President Olaya sent telegrams to the State Department reminding it that he was fulfilling his part of the deal by settling the Barco concession.

CUBA

Gerardo Machado, prior to assuming the presidency, represented the Electric Bond and Share Securities Company as its agent in negotiating concessions in Cuba.

After President Machado's inauguration he caused to be introduced in the Cuban Congress a bill giving the Havana Electric Light and Railways a lease, in perpetuity, on the Havana power system and its street railways. Another bill sponsored by him remitted about $1,000,000 in taxes to the company.

The Chase National Bank, operating through the son-in-law of President Machado, floated a $100,000,000 loan for Cuba in 1929.

A large part of the proceeds of the loan was paid to Warren Brothers for the construction of the Cuban National Highway.

CHILE

The National City Company in 1929 sold a bond issue of $32,000,000 to the American public for the Lautaro Nitrate Company, Ltd.

In 1929 Guggenheim Brothers secured control of the Lautaro Company.

In 1929 the American and Foreign Power Company negotiated what amounted to a monopoly power concession for a large number of Chilean municipalities. When the contract came before President Ibañez for approval, he denounced it publicly as unfair and discriminatory, and canceled the contract.

Julius G. Lay, counselor of the American Embassy, then conferred with the representatives of the National City Bank regarding the restriction of Chilean credit, and subsequently both Lay and Ambassador Culbertson suggested to the Chilean government that cancellation of the contract would cut off Chilean loans. The contract was then approved.

PERU

Seligman and Company, together with the National City Company, floated a $15,000,000 bond issue for Peru in 1927, secured by the Peruvian tobacco monopoly.

The American Tobacco Company got a contract to operate the monopoly.

In 1928 Seligman and Company, together with the National City Company, floated an $85,000,000 loan to Peru. According to testimony before the Senate committee, a son of President Leguia was paid a "commission" of $415,000 in connection with this transaction.

The Foundation Company of New York got contracts for certain street-paving and other public works.

Seligman and Company floated a $1,500,000 loan for the city of Callao, Peru, in 1928.

Frederick Snare and Company received a contract for the construction of new port works at Callao. By supplemental contract Snare and Company undertook the management of the government's port works at Callao in the capacity of agents for the Peruvian government.

An Emergency Currency

By HENRY HAZLITT

IN a theater fire more people are liable to be killed in the stampede than by the flames. In a financial panic much more damage is done by senseless hysteria than by the inherent weakness of conditions. The suggestion in the present article is put forward as a possible way of dealing with the situation if a sudden irrational lack of confidence in our banks should develop. It must be admitted at the very beginning that the problem is far from a simple one. Most casually suggested plans for protecting the banks against panicky depositors would inevitably bring about the very collapse of credit that their proponents imagine they would forestall. One may take as an example the proposal sometimes put forward in private conversation that if conditions grow worse it may be necessary to declare a "banking moratorium." Passing over the question of how pay rolls would be met and groceries bought during the period of such a moratorium, or of what would immediately happen to trade and values, one has merely to ask what would be the result on the day the moratorium terminated. Nearly every depositor would be in line at every bank to draw his money out.

The plan here suggested is the exact opposite of this. It rests on the assumption that the need in a time of crisis is not to prevent frightened depositors from drawing out their money, but to allow them to convert their deposits immediately into cash to any extent they wish. With this need in mind the present writer proposes the creation of an emergency currency, or at least the setting up now of machinery that would make possible the instant issue of emergency currency if that currency should be demanded. Emergency currencies are, of course, not unknown in times of crisis. In the panic of 1893, when a number of banks adopted the extreme measure of refusing to pay cash for the checks of their own depositors, and when it seemed possible that trade might be forced to a basis of barter, a number of large employers of labor made plans to issue a currency of their own, to be redeemed when the banks resumed cash payments. There were actually large issues of clearing-house loan certificates, which remained in use nineteen weeks. In the panic of 1907, $238,000,000 of such clearing-house loan certificates were issued, and remained in use for twenty-two weeks. Moreover, banks in Pittsburgh and Chicago, where manufacturers' pay rolls created the need for large sums of currency, issued an emergency currency, the amount of which was estimated at upwards of $96,000,000. Finally, the Treasury offered $50,000,000 of government bonds and $100,000,000 of one-year government notes to banks with a view to providing the basis of new circulation; $25,000,000 of the bonds and $15,000,000 of the notes were taken.

Once more an emergency currency was issued in a crisis, this time in June, 1914. Shortly after the 1907 panic the Aldrich-Vreeland Emergency Currency Act had been passed to make possible the quick issuance of currency in the next crisis. It provided that banks could exchange the contents of their portfolios for currency notes in an actual emergency. To make certain that the currency would not be issued or remain in circulation for longer than the period of emergency, a tax was provided on the use of the notes. The act remained apparently a dead letter until the development of the war crisis; then, in the first three months after July, 1914, $380,000,000 worth of the emergency-currency notes was put into circulation. Of the total authorized issue it is interesting to note that 57½ per cent was secured by merchants' notes, 28½ per cent by miscellaneous securities, and 14 per cent by State and municipal bonds. All this currency had been retired and canceled by the end of June, 1915.

The situation today, it is true, is in one or two respects radically different. The old bond-secured national-bank notes were an extremely inelastic currency; the present Federal Reserve notes are an extremely elastic currency. Nothing could illustrate the difference better than a comparison of the 4 per cent premium on actual currency that existed for a while in 1907, when it was estimated by Secretary Cortelyou that $296,000,000 of cash was being hoarded, with the increase of $1,000,000,000 in Federal Reserve notes in the last year to take care both of hoarded money and of part of the needs of communities which bank failures have compelled to return temporarily to a cash basis. But the creation of Federal Reserve notes is subject to two important limitations. First, these notes can be issued only against various forms of commercial paper having, in general, a maturity of not more than ninety days. Secondly, they can be issued only against the paper held by member banks of the Federal Reserve system. It is not intended here to question the soundness of these limitations; the integrity of the Federal Reserve system requires them. But it is desirable to raise the question whether, in a crisis of the gravity of the present, it would not be wise to consider the creation of a temporary currency against the assets of non-member banks and against other assets than ninety-day paper.

For this purpose it might be advisable to create a governmental emergency discount bank authorized to rediscount the paper of banks not members of the Federal Reserve system, and to issue currency against such paper; while a bank subject to a particularly heavy drain, which had already rediscounted all its available short-term paper, would be permitted to borrow a high percentage against the market value of its bond holdings and other assets, and to receive emergency currency for them.

As compared with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the emergency discount bank here proposed would have several advantages. It would, of course, deal solely with banks, but its operations would be extremely flexible. It could issue very little currency if very little were called for, and a great deal if a great deal were called for. What is much more important, it would not be necessary for the emergency discount bank to float huge bond issues, as the Finance Corporation is obliged to, at a time when even United States bonds are at a heavy discount. The corporation is authorized to sell up to $2,000,000,000 worth of bonds. But it was not an easy matter to sell a $2,000,000,000 bond issue even with the fervor and pressure of war times; to sell such an issue in one of the greatest crises in a century, and to follow this with other huge government bond issues necessary to balance the budget, to say nothing of possible issues for relief or construction, presents a very formidable program. The effect on public confidence would be a serious one if any of these bond issues were not completely subscribed for. As heavy government bond issues will be unavoidable in any case, the chief problem is to reduce their volume as much as possible. One way to do this is to issue currency and not bonds against the assets of banks seeking help. This method has the further advantage of saving heavy interest charges. Instead of paying out interest on bonds, the discount bank would be receiving interest on the amount of the loans to banks which the currency represented. This interest would be used partly to pay the administration expenses of the bank and partly to absorb possible losses on bad loans; anything above this would be government revenue.

The emergency discount bank would, of course, discount at "penalty" rates—that is to say, the banks would be called upon to pay slightly higher rates for currency loans than they were receiving for the paper or bonds they were discounting—and these penalty rates would assure a retirement of the currency when the need for it had passed. While the new notes need not be directly redeemable in gold, any more than the still-outstanding national-bank notes or United States notes (the "greenbacks") are directly redeemable in gold, they should be kept at a parity with all other forms of currency. They would, of course, have exactly the same physical appearance as other currency, just as a five-dollar greenback looks to the casual observer exactly like a five-dollar Federal Reserve note.

It cannot be too emphatically pointed out that what is here suggested is in no sense a proposal to create wealth by the printing-press. It is not put forward in the crude belief that the depression is the result of any general "money" shortage, or that the new currency would raise prices directly. In brief, it is not intended as an "inflationary" measure; its purpose is, rather, anti-deflationary. Its aim is not directly to increase the amount of bank credit (though it would tend to do so indirectly), but to transform "deposit currency" that might be destroyed or locked up into note currency that would circulate. Its effect, in short, would be to substitute unquestioned government credit for the temporarily questioned credit of individual banks. It would be a form of currency, it is true, that would lack the ideal elasticity and the unquestioned soundness of Federal Reserve note currency; but it would be far more elastic than the national-bank notes, and incomparably sounder than the existing greenbacks. The emergency notes would be retired as the banks paid up their borrowings, or as the slower assets were liquidated. The penalty interest rates would eventually compel this paying up and this liquidation. The life of the emergency discount bank and of the notes could, as an additional safeguard, be limited by law to a period of not more than five years, when note issuing could again be left entirely to the Federal Reserve banks. I think it in the highest degree inadvisable that the kind of rediscounting and of note issue here proposed be turned over to the Federal Reserve banks, not only because this would not serve the non-member banks (in which by far the greatest number of failures have occurred), but because the emergency nature of the measure would tend to be forgotten, and if the bars were once let down it would be next to impossible to get them up again.

This suggestion for an emergency currency is not put forward entirely without reservations. It may be that the National Credit Corporation and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, between them, may be able to take care of any situation that may occur. But if these do not prove flexible enough or adequate, then an emergency-currency plan of this type seems the only supplement or alternative. We must mobilize our banking resources to keep all solvent banks open, and to enable depositors to get as much currency as possible immediately against the actual assets of banks that prove to be insolvent. The possible deficiencies of an emergency currency of the kind here proposed would be as nothing against the consequences of a possible wholesale closing of banks and consequent prostration of trade should a particularly hysterical panic develop.

What I Believe*

By EDMUND WILSON

SO far as I can see, Karl Marx's predictions are in process of coming true. He did not foresee the Russian Revolution; he expected revolution first in some more highly industrialized country like England. But the tendencies he was able to observe in the middle of the last century have gone on just as he said they would, and are apparently producing the results which he foretold.

We have had employment made more and more uncertain by the changes in mechanical methods and by the more and more efficient management of industry, and finally more and more people thrown out of work altogether in proportion as business has become more centralized and manufacture more ingenious. We have had the progressive accumulation of wealth and power—means of production and natural resources—in the hands of a very few people, who will not turn their profits back to the public or use their power for the public good—who are such barbarians that they will not even collaborate on a plan of sensible self-government among themselves, but only pray each to the god of Business to bring back their victories again. We have the unwholesome separation of the city and the country into "two hostile camps," as Marx, quoting Urquhart, said, "of clownish boors and emasculated dwarfs," with the city dwellers cut off from the soil and the farmers caught in the toils of the bankers. We have overproduction due to capitalist greed and the lack of national or international control; and we have had periodic depressions due to the same causes, culminating in this abysmal and world-wide breakdown. We have the organization of industry into huge units too unwieldy for private enterprise to handle and ripe to be taken over by the people.

* The sixth of a series of articles on this subject by well-known men and women. Others will appear in subsequent issues.—EDITOR THE NATION.

One phenomenon predicted by Marx we have not yet developed in America to the degree of acuteness that Marx contemplated: we have not even after two years of depression seen the general cleavage of society into a conscious bourgeoisie and a conscious proletariat—we have not yet seen a general conflict between these two classes. The aims and ideals of the bourgeoisie in America have seemed to be absorbing the working class, and this has made us inclined to scoff at the Marxist bogies. But if we consider Marx's specific predictions about America, we shall not be so sure of a bourgeois salvation. He pointed out immediately after the Civil War, when the work on the great Western railroads was scarcely begun, that "the flood of emigration from Europe" was throwing "men on the American labor market more rapidly than the current of emigration from the Eastern States to the Western could carry them onward"; and that as a result of "the handing over of an enormous proportion of the public lands to speculative companies for exploitation by means of railroads, mines, etc., the centralization of capital" was going forward "at a headlong pace. No longer is the great republic the promised land of emigrants. Capitalist production is there advancing with giant strides." The Beards in their "Rise of American Civilization" have shown how the industrial strain in the East—the labor troubles and radical movements—of the pre-Civil War period was relieved by giving free Western farms to those who were squeezed in the capitalist vise. Horace Greeley, who had become a Socialist, changed to the slogan, "Go West, young man!" But today the whole of the United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific is clamped in the capitalist jaws. When times are hard everybody suffers, and even the people who work the screw, unable to get any more money out of the squeezed, are in danger of going bankrupt. We should probably have come to the end of our rope seventeen years ago if the war had not opened new markets for our manufacturers and bankers. And now that capitalism in Europe has come to the end of its rope, too, we have no way of letting out ours.

The result of this tension, if it continues long, will certainly be to create even in middle-class America the social conflict which Marx foresaw. The farmers and workers will combine against the capitalists as they have periodically tended to do in the past, and they may carry a good many of the white-collarites with them. How much this conflict will have the effect of breaking down, on the part of the insurgent groups, the American middle-class psychology it is impossible now to know, and this is, indeed, the great problem of our future. Is a genuine revolution possible inside that middle-class psychology? Being myself a bourgeois American, I have tried hard since the war to believe so; but I have lately had serious doubts.

The great advantage, the great superiority, of Marx over other economists was due not to his being more learned or more expert at managing statistics, but to his psychological insight. People talk about economics as if it were a science of the behavior of money, and as if dollars and cents were entities which had an independent existence and obeyed laws of their own, like electrons. The truth is that economics is merely the study of how people behave about money, and Marx, though he possessed the true scholar's temperament and had all the statistics at his fingertips, never lost sight of this fact. His great strength lay in his imaginative grasp of human history; and the real "laws of capitalist production" of which he writes are merely the instinctive workings of human acquisitiveness, selfishness, and self-deception—the all but universal instinct to sweat, bleed, and keep down other people whom we happen to have at our mercy, and either to rationalize our predatory acts as policies adopted for the public good or to manage not to know about them at all. This is the kind of idea that one comes by, not by mathematical calculations, but by looking steadily and deeply into one's heart; and this is something that few are able to do and remain to tell the tale. But Marx, like the other great Jewish prophets, was one of those who were able to do it, and it is to this that he owes his great authority. And the place to study the present crisis and its causes and probable consequences is not in the charts of the compilers of statistics but in oneself and in the people one sees.

I propose therefore to give a short account of myself. Marx showed—I suppose for the first time—how people's theories of society and economics, no matter how well reasoned or sober, have a way of turning out to be defenses of their social position and financial interests; and it is probably true that in order to be able to value people's opinions properly, you ought to know who they are, what their income is, and where they get it from. And I shall thus supply to Marxist criticism the economic facts about myself at the same time that I offer myself as a specimen of the current American bourgeoisie.

My family have, then, on both sides belonged for several generations largely to what used to be called the learned professions—my mother's family go back to the New England Mathers. My grandfathers, great-grandfathers, father and uncles were all almost without exception doctors, lawyers, college professors, or ministers. They have all been at least comfortably well off, varying from ministers in small country parishes to doctors with profitable practices—but they have none of them, by modern American standards, been particularly rich. My father's and uncles' generation were obviously alienated by their old-fashioned education from the world of the great American money-making period; they managed to do pretty well in it, but they never seemed much at home in it. And they were indifferent to money-making beyond a fairly modest standard of prosperity which provided them with travel, a good table, and private schools for their children—even when their opportunities for cashing in on the rackets and speculations abroad must have been considerable. My father, for example, was a lawyer in New Jersey and at one time Attorney General of the State; but his love of independence and his distrust of big business were so great that he stuck all his life to his miscellaneous local practice and resisted all temptations to become a corporation lawyer in a State governed by corporations. He would not even buy the stock of the corporations, and after one or two unlucky speculative experiments early in his career, used simply to invest his money in the stock of the local bank.

One of the results of this has been that I have grown up in modern prosperous America with a slightly outside point of view, due not merely to the professional tradition in the family, which had something in common with the scientific tradition, but also to the fact that my family have never really departed very far from the old American life of the countryside and the provincial cities, with its simpler habits and tastes, and have never really been broken in to the life of machinery and enormous profits.

However, in spite of this, I have inhabited the social territory disciplined by that machinery and dazzled by those profits; I have been put through about the same sort of mill as all the other young bourgeois Americans of my generation. At boarding-school and college I used to react violently against this mill, but except by expressing heretical opinions I never tried to revolt against it. When I got out of college and began living in New York with old friends of my school and college days, I became more profoundly dissatisfied. I had hoped to get away from college when I graduated, to find myself in a more varied world where my keel would strike on basic realities and I should go ashore at last; but though I was working for the first time for pay, it seemed to me that my life in New York was college all over again. When America went to war, I enlisted—not because I cared much about the war, but because—aside from the social pressure—I wanted to get away from my old life; and I enlisted as a soldier instead of going to an officers' training camp as most of my friends from college were doing, partly at any rate because I wanted to get as far away from that old life as possible. The side of school and college that had really given me satisfaction and that reconciled me to their deficiencies had been the "culture." I was fond of culture, which I believed at that time to be the possession of the best people and one of the reasons for their superiority. As time went on, however, it began to dawn on me that the best people were content with a very thin grade of culture, that when you tried to go into the adventures of creation or the exploration of the causes of things, they didn't follow you, and that the aristocracy of the intellect and spirit—in America at any rate—existed only in the stacks of the college library. My life had seemed to me both false and dull; and though I disliked the army extremely, I got a good deal of satisfaction out of it. My relations with people, whether my fellow-sufferers, the officers over us, or the people we were thrown with, seemed to me real now in a way that my school and college relations had not. In fact, when one day in France I got sick and had to go to bed and got a chance to think about past and future, it seemed to me that I could never go back to the falseness and dullness of my pre-war life again. I swore to myself that when the war was over I would stand outside society altogether. I would do without the comforts and amenities of the conventional world, and I would devote myself to the great human interests which transcended standards of living and conventions: Literature, History, the Creation of Beauty, the Discovery of Truth.

But when the war was over, I did come back, and that is where I am today—though I have found various ways of letting in light and air, getting heat, and arranging extensive vacations. And I know that I have found out something about that world that most of the inhabitants do not know—even when they are better informed than I am. I know, from having shifted at the time of the war out of the group with whom I should have been supposed to function, that class antagonisms, conflicts, and injustices are real, that they rarely get any publicity, that the class on top virtually controls the organs of publicity, that the capacities of human nature for remaining blind to the consequences of its actions where its comfort and prestige are concerned are so tough that it cannot usually be induced even to notice what it is up to without a pretty violent jolt from below, and that there is no hope for general decency and fair play except from a society where classes are abolished. And so when I hear the Communists today rousing the working class on the basis of assumptions of Marx's which are thus confirmed by my own experience, I pay a good deal more serious attention to them than most of my bourgeois confreres do. As I talk to employers and workers today, it seems to me that they are as far apart as officers and men during a war, and that the people whose labor makes industry possible and the people who merely invest in without participating in the management of industry, are as far apart as combatants and non-combatants. Even though the owners may be benevolently disposed and devoted to good works, and even though the working people may have been cherishing the best intentions in the world of getting to be like the bourgeois, the capitalist system is such—so it seems to me now—that any efforts on the part of the owners to alleviate the increasing strain on the workers is likely to lag fatally far behind the severity of the need for them.

At the same time, even when I was in the army I was never really so far from my bourgeois connections as it sometimes seemed to me that I was. There were officers in the unit who were friends of the family of one of my old apartment mates, and he was in the unit, too; and my father toward the end of the war was able to get me transferred and promoted to the rank of sergeant. And since the war I have never been uncomfortable—though I have never by prosperity standards had very much money. I have worked mostly for highbrow magazines; my top salary was $7,500 a year, and I didn't get that very long. I have always managed, however, to live slightly beyond my income, and have been rescued by small family inheritances which have allowed me a margin for classical reading, liquor, and general irresponsibility. And as I have got used to these bourgeois luxuries, I naturally shrink from the prospect of an era where everybody will have to earn all he gets.

In spite of this fact, however, I always felt so little at home in the American prosperity era, though I made earnest efforts to enjoy it and to believe that it was beneficial to other people (not exercising enough insight to know that it was bound for the rocks), that I am not sorry to see it all go glimmering, and the well-to-do bankers, brokers, bond salesmen, stockholders, and business men, who always seemed to me to live fatuous lives and yet to call the tune that the rest of the country danced to, no longer able to be fatuous on the same scale. I feel convinced that the money-making period of American history has definitely come to an end. Capitalism has run its course, and we shall have to look for other ideals than the ones that capitalism has encouraged. I don't know where they are coming from. The owning-class Americans seem to me half-baked and half-educated people, who deserve the worst that Mencken and Sinclair Lewis say about them. Yet the emergency may produce its leaders, and these may come not out of the world of middle-class psychology at all—not out of business or professional politics or even reform politics, not out of bourgeois journalism—but out of a new type in American labor. One finds a new kind of man today in the radical labor movements—he belongs to the younger generation and he differs perhaps from any of the young American radicals we have ever had in the past. The older men who have gravitated to the left after long experience with American labor, and who have kept the radical movements alive through the post-war period when most people deserted them, are today being reinforced by young men who start their career as convinced and cool-headed revolutionists with a clear idea of their relation to American society and of America's relation to the world. There are not many of them, but they are important. They have no illusions about general prosperity based on the present economic system, such as sidetracked so many of the Socialists and the American Federation of Labor. It is hard to imagine them abandoning their present principles. And as a matter of fact, they are not likely to be tempted to. The longer hard times continue, the more convinced of their position they will be, and the more young men of integrity and intelligence who come to maturity in the working-class world will take the same road as they.

Such men are not democratic in the old American sense; they do not believe in the ideas of the average man any more than Mencken does—they do not believe in votes. They look to Russia, in spite of all the differences between Russian and American conditions, as a model of what a state should be—because it is as yet the only example of the communistic society they desire. They want, in fact, a working-class dictatorship. Some of them assume that we shall presently see a business dictatorship when the bottom has definitely fallen out of credit, and they count on this stimulating a radical reaction even in middle-class-thinking America. And I, though I am a bourgeois myself and still live in and depend on the bourgeois world, have certain interests in common with these proletarians. I, too, admire the Russian Communist leaders, because they are men of superior brains who have triumphed over the ignorance, the stupidity, and the shortsighted selfishness of the mass, who have imposed on them better methods and ideas than they could ever have arrived at by themselves. As a writer I have a special interest in the success of the "intellectual" kind of brains as opposed to the acquisitive kind, and my present feeling is that my satisfaction in the spectacle of the whole world fairly and sensibly run as Russia is now run, instead of by the acquisitive bankers and business men and the shabby politicians who now run the greater part of it, would more than compensate me for any losses that I might incur in the process. And I appeal to other theorists and artists to be careful how they play the game of the capitalists. It is bad for their theory and their art to try to adapt themselves to a system which is the enemy of theory and art. Their true solidarity lies with those elements who will remodel society by the power of imagination and thought—by acting on life to make something new; not with those whose work is done and whose grip has failed and who are now being carried along merely by the force of a slackening momentum to which they are unable to supply fresh force. That vision was naive that I had during the war, of science and poetry as great independent entities superior to social institutions—it was the product of having come to know them in the isolation of school and college. I did not understand then how science and art are always entangled with the institutions of the particular social world which, for its good reasons, provides them with leisure; but there was this truth in it—that art and science have been straining since the beginning of history to deal not with the individual or the class or the nation or the race but with the whole of humanity—with the comprehensive or the universal—and that the true satisfaction of their impulses comes only in proportion as they are able to do so.

These, then, are my present opinions. I have opinions about other matters, too. But I believe that the discussion of other matters must wait until the problems of the social classes, with the political and economic questions they involve, have been definitely settled.

I take no stock in the idea one sometimes hears that before we reorganize society, we ought to be sure of the "values" which we are sanctioning. In the first place, we could scarcely at worst get anything worse than our present values. In the second place, society never gets reorganized until there are a great many dispossessed people who have a powerful interest in reorganizing it; and in such a state of affairs the "values" are the primary and insistent ones of food and shelter, survival itself. Until these little matters of property which are at present poisoning all classes and occupations are finally cleared up, there can be no "values" in general morals, aesthetics, or metaphysics that amount to anything.

These views do, however, as I have stated them, involve certain deeper beliefs, certain fundamental assumptions, which are not self-evident to many people, which are incapable of being finally proved, and which I can only state without defending. I believe, then, in human evolution; I do not see how it is possible to reject the evidence that contemporary humanity, with all its faults, has developed from beings much lower, or to resist the hope that we may be destined to develop into something higher still. I believe in progress as the eighteenth-century people did, and I believe as they did that the development of machinery is part of it. I do not, however, believe in progress in the sense in which the nineteenth-century capitalists used the word, taking it over and making it mean mass production, capitalistic profits, and the triumphs of colonial trade—a conception entirely different from the visions of the earlier philosophers, who had not foreseen that the rising middle class would be able to seize upon machinery as a powerful instrument for human exploitation. It seems to me as foolish to talk about machines as if they were ogres which have arisen to devour us as to talk about the counters of credit as if they were substances which expanded or contracted in accordance with physical laws, or as if they were migratory birds which crossed the ocean at certain seasons. I believe that it is the capitalist use of machinery—its use by a class of owners for private profit—which has made it such a formidable monster. And I should be glad, as I have indicated above, to see a society where such a class was abolished. It seems to me plain from my reading of history that the tendency of society is progressively leveling. When the middle class upset the feudal landlords, and the serfs and the slaves got free, we had the modern bourgeois-governed world; now there is only one more step to go.

It seems to me necessary either to believe something of this kind or to accept the creed of one of the churches. I know that some people manage to combine the two, but for myself, I am convinced that the traditional religions, however valid or inspiring in the past, were made possible only by ignorance, and that all the Western churches are obsolescent—in power over the minds that count if not in actual numbers. I do not believe that there is a hereafter in which what happens on earth will be justified and the whole human situation given a meaning. I believe that any meaning it can have will have to be given to it here by ourselves.

What Polish Jews Are Facing

By BORIS SMOLAR

THE hard times in Europe are serving as a pretext for an intensified drive upon the Jews by anti-Semites who seek to make political capital for themselves by discovering the "cause" of the depression. The brunt of the suffering is now borne by the Jews of Poland, who were first the victims of a country-wide onslaught which began with attacks upon Jewish students in the universities, and who are now perhaps even more seriously affected by the strong economic-boycott movement which followed upon the cessation of physical attacks. The economic stringencies of the Jewish position in Poland may be ascribed to five causes: (1) the general economic depression which the entire country is experiencing; (2) the heavy taxation, of which the Jews carry a disproportionate burden; (3) various economic-discrimination measures directed against the Jews; (4) the Sunday closing law; (5) state monopolization of industries.

Like many other countries of Europe, Poland is feeling very deeply the world economic crisis. Soviet competition has cut largely into Poland's revenue from its principal exports—timber and grain. Moreover, situated as it is between Soviet Russia and Germany, countries which it considers its natural foes, Poland maintains an army disproportionately large for its size and its limited resources. It does not depend for its security on the army alone and is compelled to maintain a strongly organized civil administration as well. Fully one-half of the government budget of 2,750,000,000 zlotys is expended on salaries alone.

In order to raise funds to cover its budget the government has developed an intricate system of direct and indirect taxation, the burden of which it has placed upon the urban populace. In this manner the Jews, who are for the most part an urban element, shoulder the largest share of the taxes. The Jewish populace, which constitutes but 10 per cent of the entire Polish population, pays notwithstanding 40 per cent of the total taxes levied in the country. The 345,000 Jewish small traders, who form 75 per cent of the small traders in the entire country, are hardest hit by the taxation system. Since the budget of the government is so constituted that 58 per cent of its income is derived from direct taxes upon commercial enterprises, 44 per cent of the direct taxes is paid by the Jewish small traders. These traders, who constitute a third of the entire Jewish population in Poland, are therefore in a critical financial position. Their capital is practically swallowed by taxes. One after the other they are going bankrupt. Their situation would not be so catastrophic if the government had aided them through the extension of credits which it has made available to non-Jewish small traders. But such is not the case. Of the 132,000,000 zlotys granted in 1930 by the Polish State Bank to various banks and credit cooperatives, the 481 Jewish small credit cooperatives received but 361,000 zlotys.

The Jewish artisans, of whom there are some 150,000, fare little better than the traders. They are doubly the victims, suffering both from excessively high taxation and at the same time from discrimination. No Jewish artisan, for example, has the right to utilize the assistance of an apprentice unless he is licensed by the government. No artisan can, however, receive his license unless he produces a diploma attesting that he has completed special Polish courses. The Jewish artisans for the most part are aged Jews. They have practiced their vocations from boyhood and were never before required to produce diplomas. Most of them have never even visited a school. They read and write no language other than Yiddish. By a decree issued December 15, 1927, these aged artisans are required to go to school to study Polish history, to learn the geography of Poland, to read and to write Polish fluently. Without this knowledge their proficiency as artisans is impugned. They are prohibited from employing apprentices and are even refused artisan licenses.

The several hundred zlotys which these poor old Jews must pay to the government for their belated and enforced education is in itself a sufficient burden in their present impoverished state. The situation is made tragic, however, by the fact that at this stage of their lives they find it virtually impossible to grasp such subjects as history, geography, or grammar. They have never known of compulsory education. Not even under the strict regime of the Czar were history, grammar, and geography indispensable qualifications for good artisanship.

These "education" qualifications which the Polish government demands from aged Jewish artisans serve directly to eliminate the Jew from the artisan field. Thus is created artificially a better field for the Polish artisan who replaces the Jewish artisan. Naturally the Polish artisan speaks Polish better than the Jew. He knows Polish history. He has a direct nationalistic interest in knowing Polish geography. Hence he is not affected by the educational requirements as is the Jew. Thus he becomes the gainer at the direct expense of the Jew. There is a very decided danger that the requirements will ultimately oust the Jew completely from the artisan field.

The trade schools constitute another serious menace to the Jewish artisan, old and young alike. To become a fully licensed artisan it is now necessary to meet the following three requirements: (1) to serve as an apprentice for three years in the shop of a recognized master under a signed contract; (2) to attend a trade school for three years in order to supplement the knowledge acquired during the period of apprenticeship; (3) to undergo a special examination. The difficulties for the younger Jewish generation are bound up with the law compelling attendance at trade schools. The Jewish apprentice is not in a position to attend these schools, partly because in many cities where Jews live such schools do not exist, and partly also because Jews are maltreated by their non-Jewish fellow-students. Under such circumstances a situation is being created whereby the number of Polish artisans is growing annually while that of Jewish artisans is decreasing. Even in specifically Jewish trades such as tailoring and shoemaking the Jewish artisan is losing ground.

Nor, indeed, are the Jewish industrialists and professionals prospering. At least 30,000 Jewish families of this latter group are today tremendously affected by Soviet competition. Ten thousand of them are timber merchants. Twenty thousand are grain merchants. The timber industry in Poland has always been a Jewish industry. The Jews have controlled the export of timber abroad and served also as middlemen. Today neither England nor any other land buys timber from Poland. They import their timber from Soviet Russia, since Poland is not in a position to compete with Soviet prices. Ten thousand Jewish families are therefore destined to seek other means of livelihood. The same is true also with regard to the Jewish grain dealers. It is estimated that prior to the war 100,000 Jews in Poland were engaged in buying and selling grain. They acted, too, as the middlemen between the peasant and the foreign market. Many of them were also the concessionnaires who provided grain for the Polish army.

Today there is no large Polish grain export abroad. Here again Poland is unable to compete with Soviet Russia in prices on the foreign market. The little grain which Poland exports abroad is a government monopoly. The government has established special institutions for grain export, granting them a variety of privileges which private Jewish exporters have never enjoyed. The government has also established agricultural cooperatives which replace the Jew in buying the grain from the peasant and in selling it to the government for army provisions. The 100,000 Jews who were engaged in the grain trade in Poland are now gradually disappearing from the scene as grain dealers. Like the timber dealers, they are victims of Soviet competition, but unlike the timber dealers, they are also victims of the government's efforts to monopolize industries and trade and to eliminate the private trader.

The government monopoly of industries is one of the major causes contributing to the elimination of Jews from trades and employment. A practical boycott exists against employing Jews in any of the industries monopolized by the government, such as tobacco, alcohol, and salt.

The decree to monopolize the tobacco industry was issued in 1922. Gradually all the private tobacco enterprises were bought up by the government. These tobacco factories, the largest of which were located in Warsaw, Grodno, Bialystok, and Lublin, employed 3,000 Jewish workers, some of whom had been employed for twenty and thirty years. As soon as the government took over the factories, the systematic elimination of Jews began. Today there are only 3 Jewish workers employed in the two government factories in Warsaw, which employ 1,600 non-Jews. Somewhat more than 1,000 Jewish workers were engaged in these factories before the government took possession. In the tobacco factories of Grodno, where the Jewish workers constituted 95 per cent, their number has been reduced to a negligible percentage. In October, 1926, 700 workers were dismissed from the Grodno factory, possibly for the purpose of economy. Among them were 500 Jews. The dismissal of Jewish workers carried a definitely anti-Semitic character. In Lublin 150 Jewish workers lost their jobs in the tobacco factories. A similar reduction was made in the tobacco factory in Vilna. The Jewish workers constituted 70 per cent of those fired from this factory under the pretext of economy, although the Jews working in the factory comprised not more than 30 per cent of the entire personnel.

Jewish workers in the monopolized alcohol industry suffered an identical fate. More than 100 Jewish workers were fired from the alcohol distilleries in Warsaw when the government took over the alcohol monopoly. Sixty Jewish workers were fired in Chelm. Jewish workers were also fired in large numbers from the distilleries in Lublin, Slonim, Pultusk, and Volkovisk. In one of the largest distilleries the administration categorically declared that it had received verbal instructions not to employ Jews.

The monopolized industries are not the only commercial enterprises where open discrimination is practiced against Jews. A boycott policy is pursued with regard to employing Jews on the railways, in the post offices, and in other government enterprises. A vigorous anti-Jewish policy was also implemented when the government took over the oil industry. Jewish employees in thirteen cities who had been employed by the oil firm "Mazut" for dozens of years were fired when the organization ceased to function as a private enterprise. There are only 18 Jews employed in the government offices in a total of 75,000 officials—this notwithstanding the fact that Jews form a third of the entire population in Warsaw.

This discrimination against the Jews is also noticeable in the municipal institutions. While the Jews are 33 per cent of the entire population of Warsaw, the Jews employed in the municipal institutions of this city comprise only 4 per cent.

Anti-Jewish discrimination is sharply felt in the universities, where Jewish students meet all kinds of difficulties, particularly in the medical faculties and the technical institutes. Eight thousand Jewish students who graduated from Polish high schools are now studying abroad because they could not secure admittance into the Polish universities. Two thousand of them are studying in Germany, about 4,000 in France, the others in Czecho-Slovakia, Switzerland, and Austria. During the last six years the number of Jewish students in the Polish universities has decreased absolutely and relatively. While the general student body in the Polish universities increased 15 per cent, from 39,000 to 45,000, the number of Jewish students during the same period decreased 10 per cent. Of the 45,000 students in the Polish universities approximately 8,600 are Jews. The number of Jews is especially small in the polytechnic and medical schools. In the Warsaw polytechnic school the Jews number less than 10 per cent. A total of 3,590 Jewish students graduated from high schools in Poland last year. Only half of them, however, were admitted to the universities. The rest were compelled to go abroad to continue their studies in foreign schools.

Because the Polish peasantry, which forms two-thirds of the population of Poland, does not enter the high schools or universities, the Jews, who are entirely a city element, would under normal conditions be entitled to a proportion of 33 per cent in the universities. Normally there should therefore be at least 15,000 Jews among the 45,000 students who now attend the various Polish universities.

The discrimination against Jewish students apparent in the medical and polytechnic schools is not evident in other faculties. The percentage of Jewish students in the medical faculties of the Polish universities is today only 19 per cent. On the other hand, the percentage of Jews in the faculties of political science and philosophy ranges from 24 to 26 per cent.

"The doctor's here again and it ud better be a boy, 'cause there's no more room in our bed."

The Pope's Position on Birth Control

By MARGARET SANGER

ONE-THIRD of the women who come to the Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau in New York are Catholics and the remainder are about equally divided between Protestants and Jews. This has been so for several years, and it indicates that, at least in one important locality, religious affiliation makes no difference one way or the other in the practice of birth control. However, the official teaching of the Catholic church, even though ignored by many of its members, is sometimes an obstacle to general approval of the birth-control movement by political leaders unwilling to oppose the authorities of that church.

My own position is that the Catholic doctrine is illogical, not in accord with science, and definitely against social welfare and race improvement. I hope to make this clear by analyzing the statements of Pope Pius XI in his encyclical letter "Of Chaste Marriage," which was issued about a year ago.

Evidently the Pope was alarmed by the rapid advance of the birth-control movement, for he complains that an "utterly perverse" morality is "gradually gaining ground" and "has begun to spread even among the faithful." He therefore instructs the faithful how to regulate their conjugal life without the benefit of science and according to theories written by St. Augustine, also a bachelor, who died fifteen centuries ago. All through the encyclical the Pope lays stress on authority. He alludes to himself as one "whom the Father has appointed over His field," and holds that the Catholic church is the only authorized guardian and interpreter of a "divine law" applying to marriage. Some of these assertions may be questioned by theologians, but be that as it may, let us try to follow the Pope's reasoning about conjugal matters.

To begin with, he admits that sexual desire is in itself something that can at least claim respectful consideration. This appears in the following passage:

For in matrimony . . . there are also secondary ends, such as mutual aid, the cultivating of mutual love, and the quieting of concupiscence, which husband and wife are not forbidden to consider so long as they are subordinated to the primary end and so long as the intrinsic nature of the act is preserved.

Since "the conjugal act is destined primarily by nature for the begetting of children," we understand that when husband and wife experience the sexual urge, they may act in the natural way providing the aim is to make the woman pregnant. But would the Pope permit intercourse in cases where pregnancy is impossible, as, for instance, after a woman has passed beyond the age of child-bearing? He says:

Nor are those considered as acting against nature who in the married state use their right in the proper manner, although on account of natural reasons, either of time or of certain defects, new life cannot be brought forth.

Thus even good Catholics are not always forbidden to perform the sexual act for other purposes than procreation. It is permitted in cases of barrenness, sterility, after the woman has become pregnant, and after the menopause.

It would be interesting to know whether or not the Pope thinks that husband and wife under other circumstances than those above listed ought to limit their sexual life to a single act for each pregnancy, on the theory that the act is only for procreation. In other words, must a couple, during the child-bearing years, limit themselves to one act (assuming fruitfulness) and one child every year or two? Evidently the Pope has enough sense of humor not to tackle this phase of his moral problem. Common sense, however, tells us that here again the Catholics themselves doubtless permit a vast disproportion between the comparatively great number of "quietings of concupiscence" and the comparatively small number of resulting pregnancies. Furthermore, I believe it is a fact that the desire for a child frequently comes to men and women at moments when they feel no sexual longing, while, on the other hand, the spontaneous physical and emotional urge for intercourse is seldom accompanied by a specific desire for a child.

How many children should there be in a family? The Pope quotes the Biblical "Increase and multiply and fill the earth," together with the indorsement of the good St. Augustine, who died a thousand years before America was discovered. It strikes me that St. Augustine, however, is not a true believer in the doctrine, for I understand that he had only one son (illegitimate) and that he said, "No fruitfulness of the flesh can be compared to holy virginity." The Pope declares further:

But Christian parents must also understand that they are destined not only to propagate and preserve the human race on earth, indeed, not only to educate any kind of worshipers of the true God, but children who are to become members of the Church of Christ, to raise up fellow-citizens of the saints and members of God's household, that the worshipers of God and our Savior may daily increase.

To repeat these two points in everyday language, the Pope commands married women to bear numerous children, (a) to fill the earth, and (b) to increase the membership in the Catholic church.

Assuming that God does want an increasing number of worshipers of the Catholic faith, does he also want an increasing number of feeble-minded, insane, criminal, and diseased worshipers? That is unavoidable if the Pope is obeyed, because, as we shall see, he forbids every single method of birth control except continence, a method which the feeble-minded, insane, and criminal will not use.

Suppose that a couple want to have children, but only a few. Suppose that they wish to space the births so that one baby can get well started in life before the other one comes. Suppose that the mother's physical condition makes it dangerous, and possibly fatal, for her to bear another child. Suppose that poverty makes limitation desirable. What can they do about it? Separate legally? No. But they can separate physically and spiritually by practicing continence.

A word about nature is needed here. Conception takes place through the combination of an ovum with a sperm.

Sperms are microscopic seeds introduced from the man's body by the million in a single sexual act. Nature herself wastes almost all of these millions of sperms. But if a single sperm joins up with an ovum, one of the microscopic seeds which are produced by the woman's ovaries, the result is conception. From this beginning grows the embryo which in time becomes a child.

Remember that no new life begins unless there is conception. Keep the sperm away from the ovum and there will be no conception. The Pope approves the prevention of conception by keeping men and women apart, which means that he does not think it wrong for ova and sperms to grow and die by the millions without producing new life. The Pope even permits married couples to prevent sperms from meeting ova by refraining from intercourse. He calls this "virtuous continence," and he adds, "which Christian law permits in matrimony when both parties consent."

Just think of that. If the husband does not consent to continence, the wife has to keep on getting pregnant unless she disobeys the Pope by using contraceptives. Incidentally, unless I am misinformed, American wives in certain States are not entitled to support from their husbands if they refuse conjugal intimacy. There have been many decisions to this effect, I believe.

I believe that continence is one of the surest ways of breaking up marriage. It is the denial of love, the frustration of nature. Furthermore, in many cases, according to medical science, continence in marriage is positively harmful to health if practiced for any length of time. It can bring on serious nervous derangement. Although it may be acceptable to certain individuals as a method of birth control, it cannot wisely be recommended for general use.

We come now to the subject of contraception. Contraception means keeping the sperms away from the ova during and after the sexual act and thus preventing conception. Various methods of contraception have been widely used all over the civilized world for a long time, but they are all condemned by the Pope. He says in the encyclical:

Any use whatsoever of matrimony exercised in such a way that the act is deliberately frustrated in its natural power to generate life is an offense against the law of God and of nature, and those who indulge in such are branded with the guilt of a grave sin.

In another paragraph he calls contraception a "sin against nature." He even tries to frighten Catholics by declaring that God sometimes kills people for preventing conception. Reference is made to a Biblical story. The Pope says, "... when the conception of the offspring is prevented. Onan, the son of Judah, did this, and the Lord killed him for it." The argument is entirely misleading. Read the story of Genesis XXXVIII, and you will see that God killed Onan because he refused to have a child by the widow of his brother, whom God had killed. If Onan had tried continence instead of another method he would have been slain just as promptly.

Before going farther I wish to quote the very Reverend W. R. Inge, Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, who has written that "the real alternative to birth control is abortion." It is an alternative that I cannot too strongly condemn. Although abortion may be resorted to in order to save the life of the mother, the practice of it merely for limitation of offspring is dangerous and vicious. I bring up the subject here only because some ill-informed persons have the notion that when we speak of birth control we include abortion as a method. We certainly do not. Abortion destroys the already fertilized ovum or the embryo; contraception, as I have carefully explained, prevents the fertilizing of the ovum by keeping the male cells away. Thus it prevents the beginning of life.

The contention that it is sin to have dominion over nature is simple nonsense. The Pope frustrates nature by getting shaved and having his hair cut, as well as by practicing continence. Whenever we catch a fish or shoot a wolf or a lamb, whenever we pull a weed or prune a fruit tree, we frustrate nature. Disease germs are perfectly natural little fellows which must be frustrated before we can get well. Nature frustrates her own processes by the most astounding wastage, as we have already seen in the case of the sperms and ova, which she produces for the man and the woman by the million only to let them perish.

When the Pope speaks about nature he seems to forget that the human mind is also part of nature. The thoughts we think and the emotions we feel are the work of nature. He does not seem to realize that the enjoyment in sexual intercourse is largely psychical. It is a mental and spiritual as well as a physical enjoyment. The stronger the love and the finer the characters of the married pair, the greater is this physical enjoyment during intercourse. To impose continence is to prevent the finest union of love, to frustrate mental and spiritual nature in its urge toward perfection. Contraception in no way interferes with that oneness which is most necessary—even though the Pope calls it a secondary end—to the preservation of married happiness.

But the Pope has no respect for the mental powers of the individual. He writes:

Wherefore, let the faithful also be on their guard against the overrated independence of private judgment and that false autonomy of human reason. For it is quite foreign to everyone bearing the name of Christian to trust his own mental powers with such pride as to agree only with those things which he can examine from their inner nature . . . a characteristic of all true followers of Christ, lettered and unlettered, is to suffer themselves to be guided and led in all things that touch upon faith or morals of the holy Church of God, through its supreme pastor, the Roman Pontiff, who is himself guided by Jesus Christ our Lord.

That is what the Pope says. Now let us see what Jesus says. St. Matthew quotes Him thus: "Have ye not read that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female, and said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh?" St. Mark quotes the same statement. But did Jesus say that every wife had to bear children as fast as they would come? Did He ever advocate rearing large families as a duty toward God? Did He ever say anything against the limitation of offspring? Did He ever say anything that by any twist of argument can be interpreted to mean that He disapproved of contraception? If He did, why does not the Pope cite chapter and verse?

Having answered, point by point, those parts of the Pope's encyclical which refer to birth control, I want to add that his attitude in general seems to be conditioned by ■ disapproval of human enjoyment and an apparent relishing of the theory that suffering is good for our souls. He speaks of himself as "looking with paternal eye . . . as from a watch-tower." It is a tower set in splendor, surrounded by walls that shut out the world of broken homes, of sick and sorrow-laden mothers, poverty-stricken fathers, and pathetic, unwanted children. In that remote tower he sits comfortably, takes counsel from a pile of old books and from bachelor advisers, and then writes scolding sermons about the marriage problems of intelligent people. I wish he could come down into real life for a few weeks, walk the earth and mingle with the poor "ye have always with you." He would hear true stories from Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish women which I should think would be enough to shake sense into the head of any man.

As for the Catholic political opposition to our proposed amendment of an obnoxious federal law, I contend that if the Catholic church cannot force its members to obey the Pope's commands regarding birth control without the help of the United States government, that is a good omen for our cause. The birth-control movement grows in strength and wisdom despite religious objections and legal handicaps. It advances because it supplies a human need, and it cannot stop, because that need never ceases.

No philanthropic cause today offers the benefactor a finer opportunity for service which will at the same time relieve individual suffering, promote social welfare, and tend to improve the race in America.

Congress and Birth Control

By ROBERT S. ALLEN

B LANKETED by the din and clamor of politics and legislation, one of the most interesting educational campaigns in many years is quietly and thoroughly being carried out among the members of Congress this session. Mrs. Margaret Sanger and a small group of devoted assistants have undertaken the big job of making a member-to-member educational campaign on the subject of birth control. Legislation at this session is not the object. Mrs. Sanger realizes fully that with a session almost automatically limited by the assembling of the Presidential conventions in June—the average politician is particularly timid about "moral" issues in election years—seeking a vote on a question like birth control is impossible at this time. The winter's effort, therefore, is being directed entirely to laying a broad educational base for a legislative drive at a more opportune time.

In more normal days such men as Senators La Follette and Norris, who are most sympathetic to the birth-control movement, would be free to give their time and influence to pushing a bill. Now they are overwhelmed with work connected with the economic measures they are sponsoring. Representing as they do the only progressive force in Congress, they simply have no time to give to questions other than those immediately related to the great economic crisis. This is true of all the Progressives in both branches of Congress. The whole burden of fighting the reactionary and timid policies of the leaders of both major parties devolves on them, and they are over their heads in work.

Mrs. Sanger and her associates are planning as part of their educational campaign public committee hearings on a birth-control bill later in the session. Their measure has as yet not been formally introduced, but this is now in the process of being arranged. The bill will be substantially the same as that sponsored in the last Congress by former Senator Frederick H. Gillett of Massachusetts, on which an exceedingly interesting hearing was held before a Senate committee. The measure would eliminate from the law restrictions which prohibit doctors from transmitting birth-control information and which forbid the distribution of birth-control devices.

Mrs. Sanger has assigned to herself the task of personally interviewing the entire membership of the Senate. Miss Alice Palache, her associate, and several volunteers are seeing House members. To assist them in this huge effort, Mrs. Sanger is organizing a local committee among interested women's groups and organizations in Washington. The experiences that Mrs. Sanger and her associates are having are extraordinarily revealing. Describing them to a friend, Mrs. Sanger remarked that after she had completed her work she expected to be fully equipped to "write a book giving the low-down on Washington, myself."

In the most unexpected quarters sympathetic knowledge of birth control is being encountered. One very wealthy and very conservative Republican Senator from an Atlantic seaboard State wound up his talk with Mrs. Sanger by giving her a lecture on the desirability of birth-control. He declined, however, to sponsor a bill. There was a too active Catholic element in his State, he frankly admitted.

Another Senator, a Southern Democrat, told Mrs. Sanger he saw no need for legislation. "All my friends know all about that," he explained. "Why bother about passing a law?" When told that the law was needed to make birth-control available to those most in need of it, the poor and the humble who could not afford to obtain it surreptitiously, he shrugged his shoulders, and refused to be impressed. For the most part, however, the members from the South dislike discussing the subject. Some seem to be quite startled to have a woman caller raise the question. They are courteous and interested, but draw back from the topic. Yet it may be noted that many have very limited families. This, in fact, is practically true of the entire membership of Congress, and often of those determinedly opposed to modifying the law.

Two conditions stand out as the chief obstacles to be overcome if birth-control legislation is to be enacted. The first is the bitter and vociferous opposition of the Catholic church. The second is the inability of all but a few members to see the social significance of birth control. The bellicose hostility of Catholicism is nothing new. At the hearing last Congress those representing that point of view converted a serious, earnest discussion of the subject into an emotional melee. One of the chief offenders on this occasion was Mrs. Mary T. Norton, Democratic Representative from New Jersey, and now, by right of seniority, chairman of the House Committee on the District of Columbia and thereby the unofficial "mayor" of Washington. Mrs. Norton is a political henchman of Mayor Hague of Jersey City, and holds her seat through the backing of that notorious boss. At the hearing on the Gillett bill she made a violent harangue against birth control and with great vehemence assailed its sponsors. Incidentally, she has no children. In their talks with members, Mrs. Sanger and her associates continually encounter this Catholic opposition, both directly and indirectly. It is without doubt the greatest single obstacle to be overcome.

The inability of members to grasp the deep and wide social significance of birth control, although many readily agree to its need in individual cases, is a difficulty that Mrs. Sanger is convinced can be overcome by exactly the kind of quiet educational work she and her associates are doing. In their interviews with the members they are concretely tying up birth control with the entire economic situation, stressing its immediate and direct relation to unemployment, child labor, crime, and low living standards. This economic approach is proving a powerful argument in overcoming orthodox moralist opposition, and is the basis of the educational campaign and the legislative fight.

Peculiarly enough, the wet-and-dry wrangle crosses the path of the birth-control movement. This is because most of the friends of the movement are dry Protestants, whereas the opponents are wet Catholics. It is a weird tangle, but one characteristic of politics and particularly of legislation. It frequently happens that votes of members are determined by wholly extraneous questions and factors in no way involved in the merits of the issue at stake or directly related to it. Mrs. Sanger and her associates view the outlook for federal legislation in the future as encouraging. Many members have told them that they consider birth-control legislation inevitable, although the present is not a propitious time for seeking it.

Birth Control and Social Engineering

By HENRY PRATT FAIRCHILD

IN an ancient document, less familiar now than formerly, there occurs a graphic account of the appearance of one of the oldest problems of humanity and its characteristic solution. It has to do with two men named Abraham and Lot:

And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together. And there was a strife between the herdsmen of Abraham's cattle and the herdsmen of Lot's cattle. . . . And Abraham said unto Lot, "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee. . . . Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me."

These men were the heads of two great patriarchal families. Their "substance" included their retainers and dependents, as well as their economic resources. Their problem was one which has always been inseparably connected with the multiplication of the human species.

From time immemorial human groups have increased in size until the land could no longer bear them, and such economic equipment as they might possess (as in the case above "flocks and herds") could not function adequately, and became an encumbrance rather than an asset. The natural and inevitable result has been strife. The logical and seemingly effective remedy has been to separate one part of the group from the rest and to send it off in search of new land.

This expedient offered possibilities as long as there was new land to be had. In the beginning there was a seemingly boundless supply of land. The problem was to get to it, to overcome the perils and resistance offered by the indigenous fauna and flora, and to make the physical adaptations necessary for survival in an unfamiliar environment. These requirements could be met only very slowly by primitive man. His appropriation of new land could not be carried out in any such summary way as Abraham suggested to Lot.

As a result, the spread of the human species over the habitable surface of the globe has been enormously protracted, and has sufficed to provide an outlet for a part of the surplus humanity clear down to our own day. But just because of its slowness this expedient has never been adequate to take care of any major portion of the natural increase of the species, and as a consequence strife has been ever present among those who still found themselves crowded upon areas of land unable to bear them. One phase of this strife has been the ruthless economic competition which crowds the weak into extermination. Another has been the more conspicuous, highly organized, and socially coordinated struggle that we call war. By these two forms of conflict man has perennially collaborated with nature in eliminating that excess of the species for which no subsistence could be wrung from the land.

The capacity and proclivity of living creatures to produce offspring far in excess of any possibility of survival are two of the most striking and best-established facts of biology. But high fecundity is not necessary for rapid increase, since reproduction is potentially on the basis of a geometric ratio. The simple fact is that there is no species of living organism in nature whose capacity of increase is not sufficient to overflow the earth in a very brief period if there is nothing to stop it. The invariable consequence is that every such species, relatively soon in its independent existence, reaches a point where no further increase is possible within the habitat to which it is restricted, in the face of the competition that it has to meet from other organisms sharing the same habitat. From that time on its numbers must remain virtually constant in the long run, though there may be temporary fluctuations between rather wide margins. The universal law of nature is the law of stationary population.

Man is no exception to the principle of excess fecundity. No one knows how rapidly the species might increase if its full physiological capacity were set free. But we do know that it could at least double every twenty years, for it has done so in certain cases of sufficient magnitude to afford a demonstration. Now at this rate it would take only about 600 years to produce the entire present population of the globe from a single pair. When we recall that instead of this brief period some million-odd years have been required to roll up this total, it is clear that human reproduction has been under some powerful restraint at all times.

The really remarkable thing, the thing that differentiates man from the other animals, is that, in spite of this restraint, the human species has hitherto been able to maintain a continuous, though irregular, increase in numbers, and to escape the extreme application of the law of stationary population. It is of the greatest importance for the present and future welfare of the race to understand by just what means this result has been accomplished.

The first great expedient has already been mentioned—the progressive appropriation and exploitation of new land. The other main recourse has been the development of an economic culture whereby the existing resources of the land have been made more completely and more rapidly available for human subsistence and enjoyment. The progress of this economic culture has been marked by certain outstanding achievements of great significance—the invention of the implements and methods of hunting, the discovery of the domestication and breeding of animals, the invention and discovery of the basic principles and methods of agriculture, the discovery of fire, the development of materials for tools and implements through stone and bronze, iron and steel, the invention of writing, and finally that extraordinary combination of inventions and discoveries which produced the industrial and commercial revolutions that ushered in the present era.

These stupendous technical advances in conjunction with the constant appropriation of new land constitute the basis upon which the multiplication of the human species has rested. It is by these that man has escaped the iron law that governs all other living organisms. It is upon further advances similar to these that he must rely for any possible increase in the future.

In estimating the probable nature and scope of these future advances, and attempting to foresee the possible further growth in numbers of mankind, there are two or three basic considerations that it is well to keep in mind. The first of these is that at the beginning of the nineteenth century the population of the earth was only about 700,000,000. Estimating the age of mankind as 1,000,000 years, this means that the average annual increase of the species, over the whole stretch of human existence, has been only about 700 persons. This is very close to nothing at all, and shows that man's escape from the law of stationary population, in spite of his much-vaunted human abilities and achievements, has been by a very narrow margin indeed.

The next fact, perhaps even more striking in its implications, is that within the past century and a third the species has added about 1,300,000,000 to its grand total. This is an average of 10,000,000 persons a year, or a virtual trebling in 130 years. Does it require any elaborate statistics, charts, or tables, or any awe-inspiring display of erudition, to show that the population history of the nineteenth century cannot possibly be duplicated in the next century or two? The simplest arithmetical procedure will suffice to show that the totals involved in any such duplication are simply fantastic.

To emphasize the impossibility of any such eventuality, it should be realized that the great expedient of land appropriation, which has served man in such good stead over all these ages, is no longer available. There is no more new land to be had. All the habitable portions of the globe, including many that are very slightly so, are already portioned out among the existing nations. The only way to get new land now is to take it from somebody else, and while this may be a means to national aggrandizement, it is not a device for supporting a larger world population. Indeed, this has been the only expedient open to many land-hungry nations for a long time past. Even in the days of Abraham and Lot "the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelled then in the land" also, and had eventually to be shoved out of the way with a ruthless hand. To be sure, the substitution of a highly civilized group of people for a primitive one, as in the case of the white settlement of America, opens the way for a considerable aggregate increase. There still remain a number of important possibilities of this sort the world over. But broadly speaking, the expedient of land appropriation as a means to population increase has come to an end in our own day. The immigration movement to the United States was its last great phase, and the sudden termination of that movement marks the end of an epoch in human experience.

As for the further development of economic culture, no one would wish to hazard an estimate as to its maximum potentialities. Men are going to continue indefinitely to invent and discover new ways of reducing the materials of the earth's crust into forms adapted to quick and satisfactory human consumption. But he would be an optimist indeed, not only in the present period of depression and distress but even in the most glittering blaze of material prosperity, who would predict that further technical advances will be able to provide indefinitely for such a rate of increase as characterized the nineteenth century, not to speak of the potential inherent capacities of the human animal as such.

No, there is every reason to believe that population must be restrained in the future as it has been in the past, and much more drastically than in the past four or five generations. The only practical question is as to the means whereby the restraint is to be exerted. The only real choice is between natural and unnatural—or human—methods. It has already been suggested what nature's characteristic mode of procedure in this field is. Nature's method is to allow the innate reproductive capacity of each species to express itself fully in offspring, and then to dispose of the surplus individuals by various means of slaughter. Whether the total number of births during the lifetime of a pair of organisms be 10,000,000 or 100,000,000, only two on the average can survive to maturity and become parents in their turn. In other words, nature controls population solely by death.

It has remained for man alone to discover means of controlling population through births. As already pointed out, man has not been able to free himself from the necessity of controlling population, nor is it likely that he ever will. But the development of the science of physics, chemistry, and particularly biology has put into his hands increasingly effective and unobjectionable means of substituting a relatively mild and genial form of control for the harsh and devastating methods of nature. This achievement has been hailed by some scientists as standing on a par with such epochal discoveries and inventions as the use and making of fire and the art of writing. Its potentialities for promoting human welfare are measureless.

This accomplishment has not all taken place at a single step. Probably the first steps in this direction took the form of a modified type of death—the destruction of the undeveloped foetus after conception and before birth. When performed by scientific and effective methods, abortion is doubtless a great improvement over nature's method of killing the new-born. But the intelligent, informed, and humane mind of modern civilized man cannot be content with this halfway measure. Abortion is, after all and at best, killing. Only through the measures commonly called birth control or, in a narrower sense, contraception can the control of population be reduced to that minimum of suffering, inconvenience, and self-denial that seems unavoidable on this earth.

The most significant aspect, therefore, of birth control is as an indispensable instrument in the hands of modern, socially conscious man, to be used in the subjection of population growth to the same deliberate, rational, and farseeing manipulation that he prides himself on applying to every other great human interest. This is something quite apart from its utility in solving the problems of personal and family life. It is a phase of that broad, intelligent, scientific self-direction of human groups which can rightly be designated social engineering.

All the emphasis hitherto has been laid upon the control of population in its quantitative, or, to use a recently introduced term, its larithmic aspects. There is also a fertile field for social engineering in the qualitative, or eugenic, aspects of population. Here, too, birth control in its broadest sense is an indispensable instrumentality. It is a promising sign that these two phases are coming to be more and more clearly delineated, and yet harmoniously combined, in the great inclusive interest of population.

Finally it should be observed that control of population need not always be restraint. It may be promotion. If the situation ever arises when the stimulation of population is clearly recognized as a social need, a well-established and intelligent habit of birth control will be found to be an effective aid to revision upward as well as downward.

Asiatic Conflict and Overpopulation

By C. V. DRYSDALE

WERE it not for the grave preoccupation of the Western world with the present serious economic crisis, the menacing situation in the East would be its chief concern. India has been seething with discontent and sedition for the past few years; and China and Japan have come into serious conflict in Manchuria—a conflict which has so far only been restrained from developing into open warfare by the League of Nations, which has met practically open defiance of its decisions. Although the League has exercised a valuable restraining influence in many minor disputes, this is the first time that it has been confronted with a really serious crisis; and if it has succeeded in curbing the warlike spirit of the Japanese, it has suffered in dignity and revealed its inherent weakness.

This weakness is due to the sentimental idealism which has pervaded the League and peace movements generally, and their refusal to face the fundamental fact of the struggle for existence due to overpopulation. This is the great fact before which even Norman Angell's "Great Illusion" is impotent. Idealism and reason are alike powerless before starving men and starving nations; and all old nations with high birth-rates are starving.

China, Japan, and India are three starving nations. Chronic starvation has held the mass of the Chinese and Hindus in its grip for centuries; their apathetic fatalism and lack of national spirit have prevented them from being a menace to other nations. But Japan is different. Her overpopulation and poverty are now severe, yet they are of comparatively recent growth. Owing, no doubt, to the restriction of population which appears to have prevailed among them up to sixty years ago, the Japanese have become an intensely virile, patriotic, high-spirited, and progressive race; quick at adopting all the developments of Western civilization and keenly resentful of any slight on their national honor.

The history of population development in Japan is in striking contrast to that of other countries. The total area of Japan proper is 147,651 square miles, or 382,315 square kilometers, of which about 60,200 square kilometers are cultivable. During the Tokugawa Shogunate, which commenced early in the seventeenth century and continued until the Meiji restoration of 1868, the country was administered on feudal lines, and the great landowners appear to have discouraged a rapid increase of population. At any rate, the population only rose from 26,000,000 in 1723 to 27,000,000 in 1846, and to 33,000,000 in 1872, which was equivalent to a density of population of 550 per square kilometer or 2.2 per cultivable acre. The first record of the birth-rate, which was made in 1872, gave it as only 17 per thousand, which is about the same as the lowest figure to which European birth-rates have now fallen.

But with the Meiji restoration Western culture was favored, and Japan has adopted science and industrialism with astounding rapidity. As in European countries, this has led to rapid expansion of her towns and population; and her successes in the Chinese war of 1894, the Russian war of 1904, and the last great war have raised her to the position of a large Power and exalted the status of her military caste, who have sought to inspire the people with a militarist and expansionist spirit. Accordingly the population rapidly increased from 33,000,000 in 1872 to 41,500,000 in 1893, to 55,500,000 in 1913, and to over 60,000,000 in 1923, and it has since been increasing by about 700,000 a year; while the birth-rate has increased to about 34½ per thousand. As a result, the density of population has now risen to about 1,000 per cultivable square kilometer, which gives only about a quarter of an acre per head; and as the industry of Japan has not yet succeeded in securing a favorable balance of exports, owing largely to her dearth of coal, oil, and minerals except copper, she is almost wholly dependent on her own food production. Even with the most intensive culture her people are seriously undernourished.

Notice what has happened to the death-rates. According to the doctrine of Malthus, population is held in check by food supplies, which as a rule can only be increased slowly. Hence, a high birth-rate should produce a high death-rate, and the death-rate can only be materially reduced by reducing the birth-rate. This was the fundamental basis for the neo-Malthusian or birth-control propaganda; and the fall of the English birth-rate from 36 to 17 has been accompanied by a fall of the death-rate from 21 to 12 per thousand as expected; which means that the average duration of life of the English people has increased from only forty years to about sixty years. But we are of course told that this is due to improved hygiene, sanitation, medical and surgical service, and "social services," and not to the fall in the birth-rate.

Japan, however, has increased her birth-rate. She has certainly not neglected science, sanitation, and the like, but her death-rate, from being only 11 per thousand, has risen to about 20. If these figures can be accepted, Japan has almost exactly reversed our experience, and the average duration of life of her people has fallen from about sixty to something like forty-five years. Taken in conjunction with the extremely small area of cultivable land per head, there is no possible doubt that Japan is now terribly overpopulated.

Although the Japanese greatly dislike leaving their native land, iron necessity has compelled them to emigrate. But to their intense resentment other countries have closed their doors. At the Paris conference of 1919 Japan claimed the principle of racial equality, which was refused; but she was given a footing in Manchuria, which is rich in the minerals she lacks; and she has accordingly developed railways and industries there. Only about 1,000,000 Japanese, however, have actually emigrated to Manchuria, as they do not seem to be able to endure a cold climate; there are also in Manchuria about 6,000,000 Manchus, 2,000,000 Russians, and 25,000,000 Northern Chinese of the warlike Tartar type who have never assimilated the general Chinese fatalism, and who have swarmed into Manchuria to escape from the grinding poverty and hopelessness of overpopulated China. A clash was inevitable. The Japanese government cannot be expected to leave to the mercy of lawless marauders the railways and factories they have developed at great cost; and the weak Chinese government is not likely to be able to restrain the excesses of these hunger-driven hordes.

India is in an even worse plight. She has a population of about 350,000,000, of which over 70 per cent can only obtain one meager meal a day. With a birth-rate of about 36 per thousand, or about 11,000,000 new infants each year, her death-rate is about 33 per thousand, and the average duration of life of her people is about twenty-seven years.

It is to be hoped that statesmen will at last have their eyes opened to the grim reality of the struggle for existence due to overpopulation. The League of Nations can never be worthy of, or have a right to expect, the respect and confidence of humanity until it enunciates as its first principle that no nation has a right to claim increase of territory on account of increase of its population; and that it is the first duty of every nation to limit its population to its resources, so that its people can live in comfort at home, before they can be permitted to enter freely into other countries. Every nation which transgresses this principle, and shows aggressive tendencies, should be warned by the League that if it causes a breach of the peace it will be held as guilty, and will have the whole influence of the League against it in any subsequent settlement.

Had this principle been enunciated years ago, the exclusion of Eastern immigrants from Western nations would at least have appeared reasonable, instead of an example of race or color prejudice. It is right for countries of low birth-rates and high standards of comfort to bar the immigration of poverty-stricken aliens of high fertility, who would depress that standard; but it should be on those grounds, and not as an insult to their race.

"The population question is of vital importance. I wish we did not shirk it so much." So wrote Lord Morley, who later became Viceroy of India; but he and all others have continued to shirk it. Fortunately, many of the more enlightened Asiatics have been wiser, and the lecture tour of Margaret Sanger in Japan and China in 1922 stimulated them to action. Japan, with the aid of Baron and Baroness Ishimoto, has secured birth-control clinics and will probably soon enter rapidly on the path of true civilization. India and China are following suit, and birth control will soon become the true "Light of Asia."

Birth Control, Religion, and the Unfit

By CHARLOTTE PERKINS GILMAN

EARNEST persons, studying social difficulties, find them gravely complicated by "the unfit." The unfit are common enough, from those of mere average incapacity, like ladies living on alimony, to admitted defectives living on our taxes. They are not only passively injurious as not earning their own livings, but actively injurious as consuming the livings of useful people.

We are mortified at our moronic average, alarmed at the increasing numbers of those far below it. Further, we find that the unfitter they are, the more lavishly they fulfil what some religionists assure us is the divine command—to increase and multiply and replenish the earth. Confronted with this difficulty, we propose to check the undesirable increase by the simple device of sterilizing the unfit. Unfortunately, when urging necessary legislation on the subject, we meet not only religious objections, but those of the unfit who are voters.

On further thought, seeking to antedate the disadvantageous reproduction, we seize on the benefits of birth control, a practice which does not interfere with the pleasures of the unfit but saves society from their reduplication. Again we are met by the indifference of the unfit as voters, and mere ignorance and stupidity are likewise often backed by the enormous power of religion.

Every religion believes itself to be the Truth, and warmly desires to increase its membership, not intelligence and ability being requisite, but numbers. On no account does it wish to check the increase of constituents, and low mentality among converts offers no obstacle. What terrors has our moronic level, the average intelligence of twelve-year-olds, to those who believe that of such is the kingdom of heaven?

Thus we find individual fundamentalists strongly opposed to any prudential checks to the increase of population, and in particular the immense authority of the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic church forbidding as a sin the use of contraceptives. Members of this faith not only are forbidden to practice birth control themselves, or even to study the facts and figures as to its social necessity, but they are urged to prevent other people from studying the question.

In a recent State convention of the League of Women Voters, when the committee on social hygiene had placed the subject of birth control on their proposed program of study, it was announced even before the discussion opened that the Roman Catholic members of the league would resign if it was favored. This was a foolish move. No one was asked to practice birth control or be instructed in it. No one was required to belong to this social-hygiene group, which proposed to study the economic and political aspects of a question which is forcing attention all over the world and demanding legislative action in this country. Any disapproving members were quite free to vote against its adoption on the program. But was it not unwise to seek to prevent other people from studying it through the threat of a wholesale resignation by members of one church?

It was unwise in stirring up religious prejudice. Unwise in reviving the old menace of church interference, and revealing the new menace of the increasing power of that church in this country. Unwise in opening up the inference that it preferred its members to vote without information, and that it desired unchecked increase in membership, no matter how unfit.

Quite apart from these special views lies the real importance of the question, both personal and social. Personal is the protest of the woman, who after all is more immediately concerned in the matter of birth than the man. Must she, if worn, exhausted, usually tortured, often killed in the process, bear children regardless of her own wish or ability, to the detriment of the entire family? Or may she choose, saying "Not this year," or "Not till we can afford it," or "Six is enough"? Deepest of all is the interest of the child, who has a right to vigorous parents and a well-cared-for youth. Improvement in our human stock is visibly needed.

But strong as is the personal claim for an intelligent parenthood, the social need is stronger, both in economics and in politics. In China and Japan we may see these effects well illustrated. With the more peaceful people the pressure of population results in a "saturated solution" of humanity, a mass of millions living on the verge of starvation and pushed over it by any large disaster as of flood or famine. With the more warlike Japanese we see an intelligent and competent people increasing beyond the maintenance capacity of their small mountainous country. Living on imported food, they are impelled, like England, to conquer and colonize in countries unable to resist them. Either this, or they must crowd and starve and die in economic suffocation, or they must limit their population.

Every country must sooner or later confront the same alternatives: crowd and starve, fight and die, or limit the population. Since it is not difficult to estimate what number a given country can support, and what average family will maintain that number, and since we may so maintain it without pain, danger, or even loss of pleasure, our descendants in a wiser age will marvel that there was any hesitation before so plain a duty.

The main obstacle is religion. Believing that we are divinely commanded to multiply, we have yet failed to do the simple example in multiplication which shows so clearly the results. If in our year 1 there had been but one couple alive, if they had but four children and died at about forty, at that modest rate of gain the end of a century would have shown a twelvefold increase, twenty-four people. Call it tenfold, for greater ease, count your centuries two thousand, and by the tenth you find two hundred billion. By our own time we should have opened the twentieth century with a nearly packed earth of two quadrillions of people. As we have but a little under two billion, and as we began a long way back of the year 1, it becomes painfully evident that we have died like fish spawn.

Child-bearing is not so easy and painless as birth control. Throughout all our history women have been urged and compelled to bear enough children to meet the constant waste of life which their numbers necessitated. It is a method worthy of the blind force we call nature, but shamefully unworthy of the intelligence of human beings. It is for women, the bearers and rearers of children, to decide on the numbers needed. Where nations need a larger population, women should bear more; if the country is crowded, they should bear fewer; parents above the average, parents to be proud of, should give the world as many children as they can.

Birth Control in Disease

By S. ADOLPHUS KNOPF, M.D.

IN my lifelong work for the prevention and cure of tuberculosis, I have seen many a woman afflicted with this disease who became pregnant and whose lung condition was seriously aggravated thereby, causing premature death. These experiences caused me to become an ardent advocate of scientific, judicious, and ethical birth control. Had timely and careful prevention of conception been instituted, those mothers might have lived many more years, because uncomplicated tuberculosis is curable in most instances.

The tuberculosis germ is everywhere, and only when we are strong and healthy does it fail to do us any harm; too frequently repeated pregnancies, even in strong women, will undermine the system and make it less resistant. To prevent tuberculosis, every married woman should have an annual health examination and at least a two-year interval to recover from pregnancy before getting into that condition again.

When there are already too many children and the husband's earnings are small, the result is underfeeding, overcrowding, and often insufficient clothing in cold weather. These three causes undermine the system, so that the germ of tuberculosis can get easy hold. Large families are often compelled to allow their children to help add to the family budget. If there is anything which especially predisposes young people between fifteen and twenty to tuberculosis, it is having had their growth and general development stunted by childhood labor. Many children elude the supervision of the overburdened mother and, alas, too often stray from the path of virtue; in later years the boys are inclined to join gangs and become lawbreakers. These children frequently become victims of tuberculosis because of the enfeebled condition of the mother, who could not transmit much physical strength to the later born, and the inevitable underfeeding.

Everybody knows that sun, good air, and food are helpful in the prevention and cure of tuberculosis. It must be evident how little of these can be had in an overcrowded tenement house with from six to ten people living in two or three rooms. Underfeeding and overcrowding are responsible for many cases of tuberculosis. Every consumptive is a source of infection unless he is careful to destroy his infectious sputum. When the tuberculous mother becomes pregnant, it is exceedingly difficult to prevent the baby which she carries under her heart from becoming infected. Although the disease is not usually considered hereditary, the circulation of the mother's blood with that of the unborn child is so intimate that the secretions of the bacilli in the blood render the child more susceptible to tuberculosis. Even if the mother is careful and does not kiss the new-born child, the close contact will usually result in the child becoming directly infected. Thus if the tuberculous wife becomes pregnant, her own life and that of her child are seriously jeopardized.

Such catastrophes can be avoided by the proper and timely application of contraceptives. Prevention of conception in tuberculous or strongly predisposed women is one of the important factors in the reduction of the tuberculosis mortality rate. How much greater would this reduction be if birth control became more universal, if all physicians were properly educated in the prevention of conception, and if all women knew that by applying to their physicians or birth-control clinics for advice their lives, if in danger, would be spared.

However, it is not only tuberculosis which becomes aggravated by an added pregnancy. Many other ailments, such as kidney, heart, nervous and mental diseases, often cause the untimely death of mothers whose lives might be preserved if proper contraceptive methods could be instituted in time. One condition which leads often to serious mental trouble is the so-called anxiety neurosis: the woman's constant fear of becoming pregnant when her physical or economic condition will not permit any addition to the family. When pregnancy does occur, the woman, in desperation, often resorts to abortion, which frequently leads to chronic invalidism or death. These criminal abortions are largely responsible for our country's fearful maternal mortality rate. One would think that the whole American medical profession would be aroused to prevent such conditions.

It is an injustice and an untruth when our opponents maintain that birth control—that is to say, the judicious, scientific application of harmless measures to prevent conception—is the same as abortion. Abortion is life-destroying; birth control is life-saving.

While there are a number of States where physicians may give contraceptive advice, there are strict federal laws which make interstate exchange of medical information or the importation of scientific literature or articles helpful in saving women's lives impossible. Five years in federal prison or a $5,000 fine or both await the violator of this inhuman law.

What misery and suffering would be spared to women and children if all laws against birth control were annulled and its practice under medical supervision were considered a public utility, as in Holland, and not a public menace, as our opponents maintain! What would not be gained if we followed the example of Holland, where birth control has been officially sanctioned for over fifty years! Fewer mothers would die from tuberculosis and other diseases, leaving orphaned children. Young people who now hesitate to marry for fear of too large families would not fear if they knew that they could space the arrival of children according to their economic condition. There would be fewer marital maladjustments, fewer divorces, less illegitimacy; prostitution, syphilis, and crime would diminish. In the little land of Holland there is a gradual increase of population although birth control is legalized. Quality counts more than quantity. There is better economic and physical well-being of the people at large. The men called to military duty are two inches taller than the average height fifty years ago. The maternal and general mortality rates are the lowest of all civilized countries. Let us do likewise and become also a model for other nations.

The Spiritual Aspect of Birth Control

By GEORGE B. LAKE, M.D.

WE of the Western races, and particularly so in the United States, it seems, are greatly concerned with material values; and that is right and proper, for it is our contribution to the world's experience and development. Danger arises, however, when we begin to feel that tangibles are the only values, for the most powerful and advanced minds among the "orthodox" scientists are now telling us that what we have looked upon as "solid matter" is merely a form of manifestation of energy—a tenuous collection of electric charges, thrown into a pattern by some stupendous Intelligence behind it all, of which our intelligences are parts. And "what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

During the past decade or less, birth control has been rather widely discussed in its hygienic, economic, and social aspects, and widely reprobated on grounds of dogmatic theology, which latter is entirely outside of its field because, like all other matters with which human beings are concerned, it is neither right nor wrong in itself, those qualities depending solely upon how it is used and by whom. The time has now come for considering the great spiritual values which undoubtedly inhere in it.

Contraception has been practiced by the more civilized members of the human race as far back as there is any historical record of anything approaching civilization. That is one of the reasons why civilization developed. It is regularly practiced today, solely or chiefly by the more enlightened people of our time, because the methods now available require a rather high degree of intelligence and unselfishness for their successful use. Birth control for the masses will come only with the development of biologic methods of contraception, which now seems to be in the rather immediate future.

Procreation is not the sole or even the chief end served by the sexual mating of human beings of opposite genders. Such unions, between civilized and enlightened persons, are the beautiful and ennobling physical expression of a union of souls and a potent means whereby such higher unions are consummated and developed, the bearing and rearing of children being a later, though important, part of the development.

When a man and woman enter upon the legalized and recognized sexual and social relationship we call marriage, a considerable period of time is required for the adjustment of their physical, emotional, and mental natures to each other. The early months or years of married life are full of delicate psycho-physical adaptations and equalizations and are fraught with possibilities of the richest and most satisfying experiences imaginable, or, on the other hand, of life-long frustration and disaster. The activity of our divorce courts testifies that these mutual concessions and compromises are not always made.

If during these critical months or years the delicate balance existing between the man and wife is upset by the physical disturbances suffered by a woman during pregnancy and the economic and social anxieties which too often accompany the immediate prospect of being saddled with the responsibility of caring for another, and helpless, human being, the possibility of a satisfying and spiritually productive adjustment to life is often irretrievably wrecked.

Nor is the honeymoon period the only time when the living of an unembarrassed and fully expressive sex life is desirable and necessary. As a man and woman go on living together, growing into a sweeter and stronger love and developing intellectually and spiritually, their expanding consciousness and devotion require frequent physical expression, in order that griefs may be minimized, joys increased, and the bonds of tenderness and sympathy strengthened.

The so-called lower animals and barbarous men mate and breed promiscuously and without restraint, in obedience to an unreasoned instinct; but as the race emerges farther and farther from savagery, the aesthetic and emotional factors in sex life loom larger and larger. Psychic inhibitions, of which fear and anger are the most destructive, can render the conjugal embrace wholly unsatisfying or even impossible to cultured and sensitive persons.

Among the causes of fear afflicting married persons in their amatory relations, there is probably none so frequent as is dread of an undesired and inopportune pregnancy. Moreover, deep and serious thought must be given to the devastating emotional and spiritual surroundings of the unwanted child, born into an atmosphere of anxiety, or even of hate.

The time has come when the human race must either take the next step in its spiritual evolution or retrogress. Life does not stand still. Woman has to a large extent been liberated from her economic and political bondage, but she cannot stand beside man in the fulness of freedom, as the other half of his soul, until she is emancipated from the fetters of involuntary motherhood. None need fear that such emancipation will result in the extinction of the race, for the maternal urge is as imperative as is that of sex.

If men and women are to fulfil their basic cosmic functions as developers and perfecters of each other's souls, the physical expression of their soaring love must be released from the shackles which so often bind it to the physiologic function of procreation; and until we remove the archaic and hypocritical legal restrictions on the dissemination of information to this end, we have little reason for calling ourselves a civilized nation.

Birth Control and Sex Morality

By WILLIAM ALLEN PUSEY, M.D.

THE physician, more than most men, is forced to a realization of the utter inconsistency and futility of society's attitude toward sex. He of all men is constantly forced to a realization that sex is the dominant subtle influence of life. Hunger may surpass it as an insistent appetite, but the satisfaction of hunger is associated with no social complications, and is not often a serious problem to civilized man in the Western world. The relation of the sexes is the unsolved problem of Christian civilization. Nature makes the sexual appetite insistent. Society says that the appetite must be suppressed, but, it need not be said, does not abide by its precept. The irresistible biological fact and the attitude of society furnish a constant conflict in which nature is inevitably the victor. One cannot frankly contemplate this situation without realizing that the social attitude is not only insincere and dishonest but stupid and fraught with tragedy.

To face this situation frankly does not mean that the only biological solution of it is unrestricted sexual license, but it does involve the conclusion that any successful handling of the sex problem necessitates a reasonable provision for the enjoyment of sex. It should be society's business to see that this is attained by providing proper conditions of married life. In rare circumstances satisfactory marital relations can be built upon a platonic foundation, upon the higher aspirations and tastes of life alone, but it is nevertheless true that sexual life is the elemental fact upon which satisfactory family life as a rule depends, and without satisfactory sexual experience married life is apt to be irreparably damaged.

It is here that the importance of birth control comes into the problem. Nature gets rid of an excess of any species by the most rigorous and relentless destruction. Instead of accepting this dire method, intelligent man always exercises some form of birth control. And it is in this effort at birth control in married life that such havoc is played with marital happiness. In the lack of knowledge of how to attain the end that must be attained—in other words, in the lack of knowledge of proper methods of birth control—penalties are put upon what should be the proper pleasure of sexual life in marriage that often utterly destroy it. It is particularly in the plastic period of young married life, when success and failure in marriage are in the balance, that this unhappy factor has its widest play and does so much to bring about marital failure. And this situation arises largely as a result of the anxiety and failures that come from unsuccessful efforts at birth control. There could be no greater contribution to the morality of the world, as well as to its happiness, than would be the removal of this barrier to marital satisfaction.

Even in irregular sexual life there are, I believe, good grounds for the advocacy of birth control. It is a sad fact that under the conditions that civilization sets up sexual immorality is common. It is of course altogether deplorable, but it is a fact that, with men—and women—as they are, is inevitable. Even in women it is by no means restricted to those who are beyond the bounds of human protection or of humane efforts for their care. The professional prostitute has no problem of birth control; nature usually takes care of that, but anyway she is not racked by the fear of the shame of an accidental child, or by any compunction about abortion. But for all except the hardened prostitute the situation is different. Under the standard which society sets up but does not observe, an illegitimate child is a fact for which there can be no atonement, either by the mother or, what even to those mothers is more important, by the child. With the sexual instinct as it is, with society stimulating the appetite by every device that ingenuity can suggest—by prurient literature, drama, and art, especially by suggestive dress—with the possibility of marriage refused to many women, with the atonement for the illegitimate child beyond any possibility, women of any intelligence or decent instincts who find themselves in this condition—and there are plenty of women of this sort who find themselves in this condition—can see only one possibility of escape and that is abortion. They will resort to it regardless of any penalties that the law may set up or of the risks of death that it entails. They cannot do anything else. The aggregate of human agony that results is beyond any computation. In order to avoid argument I am not saying that these women are not deserving of their agony, but I would call attention to the fact that it would be better for society if the situation were handled differently. Birth control is better than abortion.

Education and Birth Control

By JOHN DEWEY

THE opposition to the birth-control movement is not a unique or isolated fact. It is an expression of an ever-recurring struggle between darkness and knowledge. We are given to thinking that science has overthrown all enemies to its advance. This may be true of the technical aspects of science, those which have no clear social bearings. It is not true when newly discovered knowledge has important bearings upon the conduct of life. There is always a rearguard of ignorance, prejudice, dogma, routine, tradition, which fights against the spread of new ideas that entail new practices. It has been so in astronomy, physics, biology. It is not surprising that it is so in the case of medicine.

The line of battle changes. The particular ideas that are resisted change. But relatively the fight is constant. Men do not any longer, except a few cranks, strive against the Copernican astronomy. But some conflict between new truth and what is old and entrenched goes on, and probably will go on as long as man lives with a past behind him and a future ahead of him.

We forget how comparatively recent is any scientific knowledge concerning the processes of procreation and conception. It was only late in intellectual history that they were discovered to be chemical in nature, and that something of their mechanism was learned. Now, new knowledge always means the possibility of new control. With this particular scientific discovery there arose the possibility of intelligent control of blind natural processes. This is the logic of the birth-control movement. Just as expanding knowledge of electricity brought with it the electric light, telegraph, telephone, dynamo, so scientific knowledge of the transmission of life enables mankind to bring that process under human direction. Because knowledge always means increased control, there can be no doubt of where ultimate victory will lie in this particular conflict. The conflict between ignorance and knowledge becomes one between chance and control.

Meantime, however, individuals are prevented by law and by public sentiment from access to the knowledge which would give them more complete control of their conduct—laws and public sentiment that were formed when adequate scientific knowledge was lacking. How can anyone who believes in education and in enlightenment of the public through education fail to be opposed to this restriction on the flow of intelligence? The opposition to it should be all the stronger because what is proposed is only a legislation which places the source of this flow in the hands of scientists and physicians. There is always wholesome sanitation wherever there is free circulation of intelligence. We need light and circulation of air in intellectual and moral matters as in physical. Suppression and secrecy breed unfairness, mental and moral disorder. Our plea, from the side of education, is that there be removed arbitrary restrictions to that movement of knowledge and understanding which brings the action of the blind forces of nature under the control of intelligence.

The other point I wish to make is just as simple. All educators today attach great importance to the development of individual capacities. They are all opposed to merely mass education, to regimentation, the lock step, to uniformity imposed upon boys and girls, no two of whom are alike. But as long as multitudes of families have too many children and those children badly spaced, it is not possible for each child to have proper individual attention—physical, intellectual, moral. I have no hesitation in saying that no matter what educators may say and do in behalf of better development of individuals as individuals, their ideals cannot be realized unless there is intelligent control of the size of families. Mere mass and number will stand in the way with the great majority of families.

I can think of no change which would be more beneficial than one which would make us prize quality more and quantity less. Our American zeal for size is one thing that stands in the way of our giving proper attention to higher values. The exaggerated importance attached to size has affected our schools and the instruction they give. It stands in the way of a multitude of desirable improvements. If parents were in a position to make quality of life supreme in their own households, the larger problem of the schools would be taken care of.

How We Nullify

By MORRIS L. ERNST

A CONVENTION was held in Philadelphia in 1787. Fifty men were discussing the formulation of a new constitution. This group composed the Constitutional Convention of the United States of America. The men gathered at the convention were discussing free speech, free press, and other basic contributions to the history of government. At their homes their wives were discussing the price of tea, the latest play or poem, and, no doubt, also the most modern methods for preventing conception. From that time on, for about a hundred years, there was no ban in the United States on the spread of birth-control information or apparatus. As proof thereof, go to your public library. In every city of the nation any interested person who looks over the files can find in practically every American newspaper published up to about 1870 columns full of advertisements setting forth the merits of various alleged contraceptives.

As I write I have on my desk a copy of the New York Herald of October 18, 1842. "Prevention Powders," "To Married Ladies," "Portuguese Female Pills" are some of the headings of advertisements which today would be deemed inadequate and unaesthetic prescriptions. But the art of contraception was young. Considerations of aesthetics were scarcely contemplated, although a certain amount of research and progress was indicated prior to 1870. But advertisements were legal. At about that time Comstockery stalked into the land under the aegis of J. Pierpont Morgan, and a rigid censorship of information about, and apparatus for, birth control was imposed upon the American people. Every means of communication was barred for this field of thought. It became a crime to ship such data through the mails, the customs, the express offices; and, in addition, nearly every State in the Union made it an offense to dispense contraceptive advice.

Many men and women were sent to jail during the period commencing with 1870 for spreading information which was entirely legal during the preceding century of our national history. The Vice Society of the city of New York must be given full credit for turning off the light. From 1870 on, the medical profession was compelled to bootleg advanced scientific thought. European knowledge in connection with the prevention of conception was smuggled into our clinics. Advertising of sound medical products had to be carried on by stealth, and contraceptive devices in consequence were sold at premium prices. Quackery was encouraged.

In the United States we seldom, if ever, repeal moral legislation. It is my belief that long before all the birth-control laws now on the statute books have been repealed, they will have been openly nullified. Our treatment of birth-control blue laws will not be very different from our attitude toward the Sunday blue laws of New England still extant under the ordinances and statutes of the New England communities.

Already we have cut away vast chunks from the birth-control statutes. In 1918 the Court of Appeals of New York State first used the ax when it declared that birth-control information could be legally dispensed by doctors and nurses if necessary for the "prevention of disease." At that point the court could have placed a narrow legalistic construction on the word "disease," but instead, it directed the community to the general wide definition of disease to be found in a lay dictionary.

In 1929 a second big section was taken out of the law. At that time, at the behest of representatives of a Catholic Big Sisters group, the Police Department of the city of New York, under Commissioner Whalen, caused the Birth Control Clinic in New York City to be raided. Dr. Hannah M. Stone and various members of her staff were haled into court. A contraceptive device had been prescribed for and sold to a policewoman who had entered the clinic under an alias for the purpose of entrapment. The medical profession of the community was aroused primarily because a number of confidential patient cards were taken from the clinic during the raid and never returned by the police. The sanctity of privileged communications had been so violated that the medical profession for the first time was willing to declare itself openly on the question of birth control.

At the trial the issue involved the further broadening of the definition of "disease." Did the Court of Appeals mean that the disease must be venereal in nature? Is disease a broad enough term to include a threatened ailment to the mother because of additional offspring? Would "ailment" cover the threatened health of the family? What about traces of parental tuberculosis? How far would the testimony of psychologists as to the emotional attitude of a woman toward childbirth be permitted as a determining factor in the definition of disease? In that particular case it so happened that the police stool pigeon had indicated that she was the mother of three children, aged one, three, and five, and that she wished to prevent another pregnancy. The evidence of the medical profession, as well as the reports of the federal-government Health Service, clearly indicated a great increase in mortality of offspring born under conditions of improper spacing of births. The chances of good health for the stool pigeon's fourth baby, if born within a year of her youngest child, would be far less than if she waited another year. Both she and the child would be threatened with an ailment or disease, defense counsel contended, in the event that another pregnancy followed so quickly. In addition, various physical ailments were discerned by the doctors at the Birth Control Clinic at the time of the examination of the policewoman. Supplementing this evidence, Dr. Foster Kennedy, Dr. Frederick C. Holden, Dr. Robert L. Dickinson, Dr. Max D. Mayer, and Dr. Louis I. Harris testified during the course of the trial. These medical witnesses believed, as a matter of medical knowledge, that both mother and child were threatened with disease not only by direct infant mortality or loss of the mother's life, but also by the shattering of the mother's glandular or emotional system through the improper spacing of births or through the birth of offspring when the mother was not in proper physical condition. An absurd aspect of this case arose from the fact that under the stupidities of our jurisprudence a non-medical jurist was endowed with power to determine a medical fact. It became incumbent upon the magistrate to review medical testimony and, in effect, to analyze the correctness of medical diagnoses.

Dr. Stone and her coworkers were set free by the court. By this second case the definition of disease was further enlarged. Infection and contagion are not the sole frontiers of threats to good health.

The third important case involved the distribution through the mails of contraceptives. A manufacturer of a contraceptive device endeavored to enjoin a competitor who had stolen the firm trademark in a competitive business. The injunction was denied in the lower federal court, but the Circuit Court of Appeals, by an intelligent and revolutionary opinion, granted the injunction, incidentally indicating that the Lee Rubber Company had been selling that particular style of device to druggists and doctors throughout the land to the extent of 20,000,000 a year. The issue in that case was highly amusing. The law states that it is illegal to send through the mails articles "intended for preventing conception." It was urged that these articles were not exclusively devised for the prevention of conception since they were also devised for the prevention of disease, and the court, in effect, held that an article to come under the ban must be exclusively intended for the prevention of birth, and that if it had any other lawful purpose, it might be sent through the mails, at least to doctors and their agents. By this case it became clear that under certain circumstances contraceptive apparatus may lawfully be sent through the mails.

In a fourth case recently decided by Judge Woolsey it was determined that books dealing in detail with contraceptive information may be legally imported into the United States. The test case involved the Putnam edition of "Contraception," by Dr. Marie C. Stopes. This book describes in great detail contraceptive devices and contains diagrams and pictures thereof. Judge Woolsey held that prohibition under the customs-law ban only applied to the contraceptive articles themselves and that literature on the subject was not proscribed. By this decision the best of the European knowledge on the subject may legally be imported into the United States. Thus the doctors may receive the devices by mail and the knowledge by importation.

During the last few years a great number of books dealing with contraceptive devices have been sent through the mails with the full knowledge of the government officials, who for one reason or another have thought it wise to make no issue out of such mailings. It is my guess that within a few years a case will arise under the following circumstances: A book discussing birth-control methods, but treating the subject from the point of view of prevention of disease, will be sent through the mails. I believe that the courts will then hold that because the Lee Rubber Company case permitted the contraceptive article itself to pass through the mails, it would be absurd to ban pictures of such an article or words describing it. About five years thereafter there will probably be another raid made by police officers, and the definition of disease will be further expanded so as to include the case of a mother of five children, husband drunk most of the time, family income $14 a week, home unfit for decent human life. The court will hold that disease is a broad enough term to include the threatened physical or spiritual ailments bound to occur to the occupants of such a home. Some years thereafter a test case will involve the danger of offspring to the health of a woman who is in perfect physical condition but who has psychological fears of the birth of a child. The court will become solicitous of female temperament. Even a neurosis may shatter a law. During this time the scope of the law in most jurisdictions will make no distinction between married or unmarried women, but eventually we shall have a case which will involve the threatened ailment of an unmarried woman. Then the courts will hold that a wedding ring is not the only requisite for relief from disease.

At present the advocates of free press and free speech are battling in divided camps. There are those who contend for freedom of thought like that propounded by the Founders of this nation. I, for one, wish to go back to the practices of the first one hundred years of the nation. There is another group which claims to be more practical and is willing to accept compromises. In the main, they urge that the censorship of birth control should apply only to the general public and are willing to concede that the doctor alone should be immune from the censorship. For my part, I believe that the compromisers are the impractical ones unless their policy is dictated by the conviction that it is impossible for any nation to censor material for only a part of the public. Possibly those who are in favor of compromising on this issue feel sure that if birth-control material and information can be made legal for the offices of doctors and prescription rooms of druggists, there will be no practical way of preventing such literature reaching the eyes of the general public.

In the Driftway

SHERWOOD ANDERSON, when he left the world and went to live in Virginia, built himself a house, and about the house he tells the following story. It was a large, rather pretentious stone dwelling, the like of which had rarely been seen in those parts. The neighbors were not only his carpenters and stone masons but his constant advisers and general helpmeets. One day an old man came to the house in process of construction, a man named Jake, who was not only nearing his eightieth birthday but was known to be suffering from a fatal disease. "I want to help you build your house," he said. Anderson asked him what he could do. "I can work stone; I'd like to make the stones for your lintel." Asked if he had ever done stone work, he said: "I've been a stone mason for forty years." The master-carpenter, who knew him well, declared Jake had never done a day's stone work in his life. Nevertheless, Anderson was enough impressed to allow him to try his hand. If he could fashion a few stones satisfactorily, he was to be paid five dollars. And to this he readily—even happily—agreed.

* * * * *

FOR weeks he puttered about, choosing, dragging, chipping, fashioning. At last the stones were done, and they were done beautifully. He took his five dollars and went off, and a few days later came word that he was dead.

He had lived alone in a little cabin far off from town. They found him stretched out on a poor pallet, but in the little yard back of the house was—his masterpiece. There lay two stones, carved with his name, cut with grooves to make them secure when they were stood upright in the earth. And on the ground between them were carefully marked out the outlines of what he had intended for his grave. They buried him there as he had wished, and set the stones up for markers. There he lies, the man who wanted to help with the house. He was not and had never been a stone mason. But out of his secret and irresistible desire to be one had come, with infinite patience and labor, the proficiency and skill he needed.

* * * * *

THIS touching story of Jake and his stones is arresting in an age of speed-up production and the dreary job which is done because it must be. Most persons today do for their livelihood a task which they had rather not do at all. It is no wonder that when the working day is over they at once attempt to escape—to the movies or the speak-easy, to any form of entertainment that will help them forget their work. The Drifter has often imagined a world in which every man and woman exercised all his capacities at tasks which he or she had chosen and preferred doing to all others. There would still be, of course, many unpleasant functions that had to be performed, for obviously certain tasks could be agreeable to no one. If he were dictator—even the Drifter has sometimes briefly considered what in that remote event he would do!—he would order that machinery be devised for just these unwelcome occupations. Anything that a man could not be found to do cheerfully and profitably must be done by a machine. There would, of course, always be some persons who liked to operate the machines. And the Drifter would go farther. Those tasks which could not either be done happily by men and women or expeditiously and painlessly by a machine need never be done! If this imperial fiat could be confidently uttered, he fancies that most of the other ills which trouble civilization would be taken care of. For everybody would then be like Jake the stone cutter, and all the surplus energy in the world would be put to proper and enduring use.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

For Mooney's Freedom

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Effectively to focus public attention on the nation-wide demand for Tom Mooney's pardon, an afternoon conference has been called at Washington, D. C., Sunday, January 24, at 2:30 p.m., at the Hotel Hamilton, Fourteenth and K Streets. Tom Mooney's friends from various cities throughout the United States are being invited.

This conference will be followed by a public meeting at 8 p.m. at the Friends' Meeting House, 2111 Florida Avenue. The speakers will be:

Senator Edward P. Costigan, of Colorado;
 Senator Bronson Cutting, of New Mexico;
 Senator Burton K. Wheeler, of Montana;

Mr. Edward Nockels, Secretary Chicago Federation of Labor;

Rabbi Edward L. Israel, Chairman General Conference of American Rabbis;

Father John A. Ryan, Director National Catholic Welfare Conference;

Worth M. Tippy, Executive Secretary Social Service Commission of Federal Council of Churches.

Edward Keating, Editor of Labor, will be chairman.

Nation readers have helped in the effort to vindicate Tom Mooney; therefore we strongly urge that they attend the Washington meetings, together with their friends.

ABRAHAM LEFKOWITZ, Chairman

Tom Mooney Pardon Conference of New York

New York, January 15

"Lost Boy"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Some twenty-five years ago I was one of those civic-minded persons who advocated the Juvenile Court for delinquent children. It was then considered the greatest boon to the misunderstood child to be given a chance to be heard by a judge (no one dreamed then that there might be in the near future a woman judge of the Juvenile Court) in a separate court away from the trials of the adult and hardened criminal. We all remember well what men like Judge Lindsay and Judge Mack did in those early days for the children who came under their jurisdictions.

It has been painfully disillusioning to go into the average court where children are being tried today. The judge and the chief probation officer may be part-time men engaged in the practice of law or some other business, whose angle of vision is tinged by the material aspect of things rather than the vital one of the protection of the child before them against a hard, materialistic world. I have sat through many hearings that made me quiver with apprehension for the future of the child being tried. Often I have been impelled to go to the judge after court hours to make a plea for a defendant child. How often I have yearned for the ability so brilliantly displayed by Mr. T. C. Upham, the author of the play "Lost Boy," recently put on the boards at the Mansfield Theater!

To sit through a performance of this play tightens the skin on one's head and makes one's back creep with chills. The portrayal is so realistic that I sat on the edge of my seat and I had to hold myself back several times from crying out in defense of this suffering, misunderstood lad whose life and spirit were being squeezed out in the process of the formalities that we set up for the young in our inflexible, rigid adult world!

Social workers talk glibly now of the "hand-minded" child and the chance to which he is entitled in the scheme of things; but the truant officer seldom investigates the actual causes of the child's absence from the classroom; the teacher scolds him when he becomes a repeater in his grade; and the other pupils in his class laugh at him when he is behind in his work and cannot recite his lessons correctly. Then, to escape the poisonous atmosphere of the classroom, he runs into bullying boys on the outside, and even there, unable to cope with the actual mischief-making of the street urchins, he again becomes a failure, a misfit, and an undesirable. It is this type of boy who, when left behind on the scene of a crime, will take the blame upon himself, risking all to gain the regard of his fellow-men, or else a sense of loyalty will prevent him from squealing.

I appeal to the public who must love justice and fair play, at least for our innocent children, to go to the Mansfield Theater and see for themselves what in our ignorance and neglect we do to the precious lives of our underprivileged children. I appeal still more to our teachers and school principals and Juvenile Court personnel to see this play.

Not to give particular mention to the youth, Elisha Cook, Jr., who takes the leading role in the play, would be to do him a great injustice.

New York, January 12

EVA ROBIN

The Peace Caravan

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your inclusion of the work of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom on your Honor Roll for 1931 is of course gratifying. It may interest you and your readers to know that much of the league's executive efficiency and accomplishment, which you praise, centered about the trans-continental peace caravan, of which Mabel Vernon, the league's finance secretary, was the originator and director.

Denver, January 9

ANNE MARTIN

[The Editors of The Nation regret that in bestowing well-merited praise on Dorothy Detzer for her admirable efforts in the general work of the Women's International League, they did not also mention Miss Vernon and Miss Katherine Devereux Blake for their work in connection with the Peace Caravan.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

The Real Discoverer of Duprene

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to file a protest against your omission of the name of Father J. A. Nieuwlands of Notre Dame University from your Honor Roll for 1931. Dr. Nieuwlands is the real discoverer of duprene, as was made abundantly clear in his paper before the Indiana Academy of Science which was presented here last December. As a Protestant, I trust that the Nobel prize will some day be awarded to Father Nieuwlands, for in my judgment he abundantly deserves it. I am writing you in order that you may give honor where honor is due.

Indianapolis, January 6

FREDERICK D. KERSHNER

The Blue and the Gray

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It might interest you to know that the Civil War, alias the war between the States, is over. I find proof of the fact on a gasoline bill sent by the Gulf Refining Company, which states that the Washington-Hoover Airport Service Station is located on the Jefferson Davis Highway at South Washington, Virginia.

Philadelphia, January 7

DAVID W. AMRAM

For Long Island Readers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I should like to get in touch with Nation readers and their friends in and around Huntington and Cold Spring Harbor, Long Island, who are interested in forming a discussion group. My address is Box 248, Huntington Station, L. I.

Huntington, N. Y., January 14

JACOB BRAM

Finance

Crystal-Gazing in Wall Street

ANYONE who has been reading that voluminous literature which is published daily by Wall Street brokerage firms forecasting the movement of stock prices must have been impressed with the extent to which the "averages" serve as a basis of prediction. It is almost a cabalistic art, founded on the theory that the establishment of certain levels on the price charts, the penetration of these levels by current price swings, and particularly the behavior of certain groups of prices (railway shares with relation to industrial shares, principally) foreshadow the ensuing movement, up or down. As is always the case with an oracle, much depends on how the phenomena are interpreted, and which phenomena are selected for interpretation.

In bare outline the technology of the system is about as follows: The area between the most recent maximum and minimum prices, as determined by the price index selected, constitutes a "trading range." Thus, at the present writing, the Standard Statistics Company's index of ninety stocks, which includes groups of industrials, rails, and utilities, shows a high point of 66.7 on December 19 and a low point of 60 on January 5. Prices recently have been moving within those boundaries, nearer to the maximum than to the minimum. The upper level of 66.7 constitutes a "resistance point," the theory being that should prices again climb up to that level and attempt to break through, a great deal of stock would promptly be thrown on the market by those mistaken individuals who had previously bought at that point, had seen their holdings depreciate in value, and now seized the opportunity to get out without a loss. Should prices continue upward in spite of this pressure, the inference would be justified that the buying was of better quality than the selling, and it would be an augury of further advance.

On the other hand, it is presumed that a volume of potential buying is waiting to assert itself around the lower level (60, in the illustration here used). If prices should decline and break through this point, it would be argued that the latent demand was non-existent, and a substantial further decline to a new "bottom" would be expected. A further refinement of the chart theory has it that a movement of prices of industrial stocks outside of the trading range must be "confirmed" subsequently, or anticipated, by a corresponding movement of the railway average. In other words, should the industrials touch a new high while the railroad index lags below its previous maximum, the industrial advance would be considered abortive, to be followed by a downward reaction; whereas a movement of railway shares into new high ground would, theoretically, be followed by a similar and sustained movement of the industrials.

It cannot be denied that in a surprising number of clear-cut cases this sequence has "worked." That part of the theory relating to the significance of the railway averages, in particular, has demonstrated its validity; but it appears that the margin of proof must be wide beyond the possibility of misunderstanding. Recently the railway shares have touched a new high level, some 23 per cent above the January low, while the industrials almost simultaneously did likewise, with a gain of about 11 per cent, but neither of the new high average prices is as much as two points above the previous highs—those of December. Something more convincing than this is needed. If prices continue to reflect improvement in the railway outlook, and if the industrials follow, the chart readers will claim a Q. E. D. Others, if they choose, may ascribe the rise to less abstruse causes.

S. PALMER HARMAN

Books, Art, Drama

This Nonchalant Pause of Earth

By FLORENCE KIPER FRANK

This nonchalant pause of earth that turns
Toward the renewal of the spring
Is alien from the flesh that burns
To its brief perishing.

Now do the churlish bones protest
Serenity of mellow trees,
And the quick veins can find no rest
Where water is at ease.

Under the unprecipitate moon
The blood cannot accept its fate.
Upon the languid air of noon
Sight is insatiate.

The heart is rebel in the side
Against the indolent decay,
Fretting the rhythm of its pride
Within the golden day.

The Perfect Secretary of War

Newton D. Baker: America at War. By Frederick Palmer.
Dodd, Mead and Company. Two volumes. $7.50.

MR. PALMER'S volumes are based on Mr. Baker's personal papers, his correspondence with President Wilson and the war-time leaders of the country, the confidential telegrams between the War Department and General Pershing's headquarters in France, and much other first-hand material. Therefore he has had an unexcelled opportunity to write the final and definitive story of Mr. Baker's career as head of the War Department during our participation in the World War, a story especially timely because of the possibility that Mr. Baker may be the Democratic nominee for the Presidency next June. But this opportunity Mr. Palmer has not seized. He has given us a most readable one-sided narrative of Mr. Baker's career in the War Department. More than that, he has recorded, with vigor, enthusiasm, and comprehensiveness, the gigantic efforts made by this country during the less than two years we were in the war, and his narrative compels renewed admiration for the speed and the military efficiency of that stupendous achievement. As a bird's-eye view of the nation at war it can hardly be surpassed, and Mr. Palmer has known how to weave into his narrative many facts and statistics without in the least weakening the reader's interest. As for the military operations in France, of which Mr. Palmer was in large degree an eyewitness, we cannot think of any other brief portrayal of them as valuable. The story marches along. Moreover, it presents a most appealing picture of the ability, the devotion, and the incredible laboriousness of Mr. Baker during the fateful years 1918-19, especially of his infinite patience and long-suffering under the most malicious, spiteful, and unjust attacks upon his actions, his personality, and his motives. The book will undoubtedly lead many to an entirely different opinion of Mr. Baker from that which they held during the days of the struggle.

When that is said, however, there is not much else to be added in praise of Mr. Palmer's work. For it is journalism and not history, and partisan journalism at that. It wholly lacks scientific detachment, as it does the genuinely critical attitude—this despite the fact that in a letter published in the first volume Mr. Baker, under date of January 6, 1930, wrote to Mr. Palmer that he had read "every book you have written and they have uniformly demonstrated your patient fidelity to history." Mr. Palmer's tale is, moreover, a complete eulogy; it seems as if his hero could do no wrong. I cannot recall an instance in which it appears that Mr. Baker erred after he took office, "with a fighting jaw and a whimsical eye." Mr. Baker, it seems, anticipated the wisest generals, surpassed the foresight of the most experienced statesmen, and knew just when to overlook and to avoid executing the orders of his commander-in-chief when the occupant of the White House blundered, as, for example, in ordering the General Staff to desist from making plans for war upon France, England, and other nations. So far as one can tell from this book, Mr. Baker's management of the war could not have been improved upon in any way. Others will not be so certain, particularly if they recall some of the war-contract provisions.

One reason for Mr. Palmer's satisfaction is that he writes from the military point of view. The author of an excellent anti-war book, "The Folly of Nations," Mr. Palmer, who ten years ago wrote that a militant Christianity should never be found "justifying war, never excusing war," must in his latest volume delight every militarist. Never a word here against war, but a complete acceptance of the military ideology, a complete adoration of the military caste. What gratifies Mr. Palmer most about Secretary Baker is that he was such a pliant scholar in the hands of the generals. On taking office he turned to General Hugh L. Scott, the Chief of Staff, and said: "General Scott, you know all about this. I know nothing. You must treat me as a father would his son." It is hardly necessary to add that General Scott took him at his word, and so did others in uniform bestow their paternal care upon the new Secretary, who walked dutifully in the paths laid out before him—Mr. Palmer notes happily how Generals Scott and March instructed him "in true military principles." He records with particular approval that one of Mr. Baker's first acts was to ask General Scott what the country should do in the matter of punishing General Villa for the attack upon Columbus, New Mexico, and the killing of American citizens there which had just taken place. Scott wished the American force already in pursuit in New Mexico to continue its invasion and to send a larger force after it. Without stopping one moment to hear the facts, to ponder upon the risks this violation of the sovereignty of a weaker neighboring nation involved, or even to discuss with the President or the Department of State what the proper policy should be, Mr. Baker replied to General Scott, "without raising his voice: 'Then let us proceed.'"

While this delights Mr. Palmer's soul, he characteristically fails to record that that Pershing expedition into Mexico returned in humiliation without having achieved its purpose, which was bombastically proclaimed to be the capture of Villa "dead or alive." Yet it is impossible to withhold praise from Mr. Baker for many of his official acts, notably for his policy of keeping politics out of the War Department, and of giving entire responsibility to Pershing and backing him up to the fullest extent after he assumed the responsibilities of Commanding General in France. But in the main Mr. Palmer's admiration is obviously due to Mr. Baker's steady subordination of any civilian control to that of the generals, to his blindly following the wishes of the military men. Did Mr. Baker repeatedly violate laws and statutes and risk going to jail? Why, splendid, splendid; Mr. Palmer rubs his hands with joy and points to it as another step in what he calls "the evolution of democracy toward what was to be known as an industrial dictatorship" and "an autocracy of war." Were there virtue, manliness, and courage in America's hosts in France? Well, that was simply because of West Point: "West Point, in its proud professional cult, had kept the watch-fires of discipline burning, and now they were to light the drill grounds of the masses of our manhood"! On pages 79-81, Volume I, Mr. Palmer tells the story of how Mr. Baker's father joined J. E. B. Stuart's rebel cavalry. No less than seven times thereafter he refers to the "son of Jeb Stuart's trooper."

Now, perhaps it was necessary for Mr. Palmer thus to bow down before the military and to reconstruct the spirit and atmosphere of war days in order to work himself up to concert pitch, to put the enthusiasm into his writing which gives it its verve and force. But if that is the case no one must be led into thinking that this is either history or accurate narrative. In this book, certainly, he has forgotten all about that "patient fidelity to history" with which Mr. Baker charged him. This is the more curious because he admits that the atrocity stories were merely propaganda on both sides; that there were no submarine atrocities (this on the word of Admiral Sims); no Belgian children with hands cut off; that in signing that bogus report of German atrocities in Belgium, Lord Bryce was merely "doing his bit," unhallowed as it may have been, for democracy and his country; that the similar German stories of atrocities were equally abominable libels upon the Americans and the Allies. None the less, Mr. Palmer's narrative is shot through with acceptance of other war-time lies which investigation would have disproved. The worst of these is his reviving in these words that hoary old falsehood as to the sinking of the Lusitania: "That the sinking had been premeditated was proved by the warning of April 29, from the German Foreign Office to Americans, not to sail on the Lusitania." Had Mr. Palmer troubled to read that notice, he would have found no reference whatever to the Lusitania in it. For his information here is this diabolical notice in full:

NOTICE I

Travelers intending to embark on the Atlantic voyage are reminded that a state of war exists between Germany and her allies and Great Britain and her allies; that the zone of war includes the waters adjacent to the British Isles; that, in accordance with formal notice given by the Imperial German Government, vessels flying the flag of Great Britain or of any of her allies are liable to destruction in those waters and that travelers sailing in the war zone on ships of Great Britain or her allies do so at their own risk.

Imperial German Embassy

Washington, D. C., April 22, 1915

Had he delved further he could have found just how many weeks before the sailing of the Lusitania that advertisement was received at the German Embassy in Washington. He could even have read in excellent translation the narrative of the U-boat commander who consummated that horrible massacre upon the high seas—a deed so inhumane and indefensible as to call for no distortion or misrepresentation of facts. If he had simply reasoned a little bit about the affair he must have known that it was an impossibility for any U-boat to pick up a given ship on any particular voyage since the courses were constantly changed and the rate of speed was entirely dependent upon weather and the orders of the Admiralty. Did the Lusitania on its arrival off the Irish coast reduce its speed to fifteen knots so that it might meet the U-boat at the right moment and right place? Did the Germans arrange to have the dense fog lift just at the moment the Lusitania approached the submarine? If they could pick up the Lusitania by premeditation, why did the Germans not get the Mauretania, the Olympic, and all the rest? Thus is history falsified.

Again, in speaking of the Spanish-American War, Mr. Palmer trots out a still hoarier falsehood: "The hand of McKinley . . . was forced by the public indignation" which led to the slogan "Remember the Maine." Had Mr. Palmer read the official documents, or even Rhoades's history, he could never have made such a statement; he would at least have learned that Spain had yielded everything that Mr. McKinley asked, that Mr. McKinley pocketed the dispatch and suppressed its publication, and, as Mr. Rhoades puts it, went into the war simply and solely in order to obtain political kudos for his party. Throughout the book runs the argument for the greatest military preparedness, so that it will unquestionably be the most popular textbook in the Army War College. Today Mr. Palmer believes that "the instinctive will of a people about national self-preservation forms its military policy"; and that "a strong navy was the lock on the door against the burglar"—which doubtless explains why, when we were without a navy for one hundred years, with all our potential wealth we never had a foreign war that was not of our own seeking.

But even from the point of view of writing a military tract, there are many inexcusable slips in Mr. Palmer's text. Thus, he declares that President Wilson's preparedness speeches were made in the "summer of 1916," whereas they were delivered in January and February, and he connives at the official misrepresentation of the President's speech in St. Louis, February 3, 1916, and records him as having said that he wanted a navy "second to none," whereas what the President really said was that he wanted "incomparably the strongest navy" in the world. Twice he erroneously declares that, like Generals Pershing and Wood, General Thomas H. Barry was jumped from lower rank over many of his superiors to a generalcy; as a matter of fact, General Barry passed through every grade, and served two years as colonel before becoming a brigadier. Mr. Palmer, who so adores that military school, says that the statue before the War College which was taken down at the outbreak of war was one of General von Steuben, the Prussian drill-master of Washington's army; instead, it was a statue of Frederick the Great presented to the War College, and joyously accepted with deep reverence by its officers, from no less a person than the War Lord, Kaiser Wilhelm himself. The Governor General of the Philippines becomes at Mr. Palmer's hands "Franklin" Burton Harrison, and the distinguished hotel manager Mr. Bowman becomes John E. McBowman; Miss Anna Shaw, Mrs. Anna Shaw; General Francis J. Kernan, Francis E. Kernan, and so on. It is not true that George Harvey "ended the career of the once-powerful Harper's Weekly"; that was carried on for some years afterward by Norman Hapgood.

On page 305 Mr. Palmer tells us that on May 20, 1918, Congress authorized the registration of all who had become of draft age after the first registration of June 5, 1917; on the next page he tells us that on August 24 Congress "amended the Selective Service Act to enrol all youths who had become twenty-one since June 5, 1917." He asserts that after the President's Lusitania note Germany "secretly hastened a large submarine-construction program" (should they, when at war, have announced it to the world?); it was in August, 1918, just before the Armistice, that Germany placed orders for really extensive submarine construction. Errors like these naturally cast doubt upon the reliability of many other statements. And so does, for example, Mr. Palmer's discussion of Mr. Baker's treatment of the conscientious objectors. He admits that the Baker policy (contrary to instructions from President Wilson) "turned severe in sending to jail those who would neither work nor fight." But he does not say anything about the horrible tortures that they were subjected to in our prisons by military men under the direct orders of Newton D. Baker, men such as Colonel Sedgwick Rice in charge of Leavenworth, and the commander of Alcatraz Island in San Francisco Bay, under whom these martyrs to their consciences were spread-eagled to the doors of their cells. There were dreadful brutalities leading to deaths and maimings for life; Mr. Baker did not finally stop these tortures until after the war, December 6, 1918.

What is the picture one gets of Mr. Baker? It is that of a man of great executive ability and marked eloquence, but without fixed principles or political philosophy. Like his chief, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Baker was able to move from the principles and beliefs he had long advocated, to turn into the complete autocrat. That he did the job of autocrat efficiently is of far less importance today than the fact that he could swing from his own moorings and justify all his acts by extraordinarily skilful arguments. Mr. Palmer has convinced me that if we need a President of strong autocratic and fascist leanings in the present economic emergency we should elect Mr. Baker, and that he would cheerfully justify every extra-legal act by a skilful lawyer's and dialectician's argument to prove that every step he was taking was quite within the authority of the Constitution, and in keeping with our finest American tradition.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

"The Mystic and Bizarre Emily"

Letters of Emily Dickinson. Edited by Mabel Loomis Todd. Harper and Brothers. $4.

ALTHOUGH this volume solves none of the problems that have been agitating Emily Dickinson's biographers, it is a valuable contribution to the study of her life. To Mrs. Todd, as coeditor of the first two volumes of poems, editor of the third volume, and editor of the first collection of letters, we owe an immense debt of gratitude. When the first enthusiasm for Emily Dickinson yielded to apathy, Mrs. Todd was forgotten; and by the time the inevitable revival came, Mrs. Bianchi was on the scene. Now this edition reminds us of Mrs. Todd's importance in the whole situation, and gives us as well an authoritative collection of the letters. Mrs. Bianchi, taking advantage of the fact that the copyright of the earlier edition had expired in 1922, reprinted a large part of its contents in her "Life and Letters of Emily Dickinson." But the desire to save space led her to omit many letters and fragments of letters, and she took some liberties in her editing. The new edition gives us all that the first contained, together with a few letters and many portions of letters that were omitted in 1894.

Though it goes without saying that we welcome any new material that relates to Emily Dickinson, it has to be admitted that most of the additions are comparatively trivial. There are, however, a few passages that give us fresh insight into Emily's religious difficulties, the state of her health, and the nature of her relations and her brother's with their father. There are also the citations from Colonel Higginson's diary and letters, showing more clearly than ever the bewilderment that his protegee—his "partially cracked poetess at Amherst"—aroused in him. Finally, and most important, there are the letters to J. D. and C. H. Clark about the Reverend Charles Wadsworth—supposed by some to be Emily's mysterious lover. These letters prove nothing; nearly thirty years had elapsed since the supposedly fateful meeting in Philadelphia, and it is scarcely to be expected that, even if Emily had felt some sort of passion in 1854, she would betray it in 1882. But the letters most assuredly do not support the theory; they suggest, if anything, a very different sort of relationship, a relationship as humble and as intellectual as, say, the relationship between Emily and Colonel Higginson.

Yet it must be said that the reading of these letters—the old as well as the new—does give the impression that something happened in 1854. Colonel Higginson felt it. "It is extraordinary," he wrote Mrs. Todd, "how the mystic and bizarre Emily is born at once between two pages." As one reads these letters, which are arranged according to their recipients, one notices in each chapter that stretches for any distance both before and after 1854 the difference that makes itself felt at about that date. It may have been because she heard Dr. Wadsworth preach, or because she met Major Hunt, or because she again talked with George Gould, or because she met some other man; it may have had nothing to do with men; but something made that trip to Philadelphia the turning-point in Emily Dickinson's life.

Interesting as it would be to know precisely what it was that set Emily so squarely upon the path she was thereafter to follow, we must not forget how relatively trivial the matter is. What is important is for all material concerning her to be secured against personal whim and the sense of private ownership. Mrs. Todd has apparently laid her cards on the table. When will Mrs. Bianchi follow her example? The Saturday Review of Literature has made the excellent suggestion that the manuscripts should be turned over to Amherst College. This would be a great step, both because of the possibility that further poems would be discovered and because of the certainty that a careful study of the handwriting would result in important revelations. It is difficult to see how Mrs. Bianchi, if she has any sense of the responsibility that her kinship to the poet has imposed upon her, can resist the appeal.

GRANVILLE HICKS

African Biography

Chaka: An Historical Romance. By Thomas Mofolo. Translated from the original Sesuto by F. H. Dutton. Oxford University Press. $3.

THIS life of the great African warrior, Chaka, is a distinguished contribution to recent biography. Thomas Mofolo, the author, is a native of Basutoland who writes in his own Sesuto, one of the Bantu tongues. We are told in the introduction that this is not his first work, but that he has published two novels in his native language which concern themselves with his people.

The life of Chaka has fascinated all those who have touched upon it. An outcast boy, with the stigma that attaches to the child born of a Zulu mating before marriage, Chaka overcame obstacle after obstacle, ending his life in a debauchery of bloodshed, his name to go down in history as one of the world's great warriors and conquerors. He lived at about the time of Napoleon, and his exploits on the battlefield fully warrant the title of "the black Napoleon" he has been given by white historians.

Nothing of the point of view of the white man is found in Mr. Mofolo's book, where the author is above all an African writing in terms of his own civilization. The characterizations of Isanusi the witch doctor, of Ndlebe and Malunga, sent by Isanusi to help Chaka, are superb. The development of the plot, which shows how Chaka in his lust for power sacrificed everyone who was dear to him—his beloved, his benefactor, and finally his mother; the manner in which his growing suspicion and insistence on reverence toward his person are shown to have made him more and more bloodthirsty; the description of the disintegration of the character of the man under the influence of the witch doctor—all of these show the touch of a skilled hand.

Books of this character are rare enough, but books of this character that achieve the standard set by Mr. Mofolo have hitherto not been found at all. The biography is to be recommended as a tale fascinating enough for any reader. But for the person who is interested in gaining insight into the thought processes of a people whose civilization is entirely different from his own, and whose behavior springs from traditions with which his own have nothing in common, a reading of this life of Chaka will give a point of view that no work by a European observer, however well trained, can possibly give.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

Parasitic Profits

Graft in Business. By John T. Flynn. The Vanguard Press. $3.

THERE is good precedent for believing that men cannot justly serve two masters. It is Mr. Flynn's belief that the deliberate disregard of this rather elementary principle by our business leaders is responsible for much of what he calls graft in business—the indirect, unearned, parasitic profits made by corporation officials who use other people's money and property for their own ends. There can be little doubt that serious weaknesses exist in the present system of interlocking directorates through which bankers and industrialists pledge their services to innumerable groups of stockholders. For through these intricate relationships they not infrequently appear on both sides of the same transaction—they represent both the buyer and the seller. Nowhere is this more apparent, or more vicious, than in the investment-trust field, where it is common practice for investment bankers, the merchants of stocks and bonds, to act as the directors of trusts, the purchasers of those securities. Inevitably, in such circumstances, they are acting in conflicting capacities. Even if their intentions are of the very best, their position is none the less equivocal. Judging from the evidence in this book, it seems pretty clear that the consequences of this dual responsibility are not always to the advantage of the stockholders whom the directors are supposed to be serving. There are, to be sure, other factors in the diversion of secret profits, but the interlocking directorate seems to make temptation doubly tempting.

Mr. Flynn discloses in detail the manner in which eminent bankers and business men have abused the trust relationship. His material comes largely from cases of management failures which have been exposed in court, for it is only in this way that the public, or even the stockholders, finds out some of the secrets of so-called private business. Here one may learn how the director of a railroad purchased a water-power site from the railroad for $600,000 and immediately exchanged it for $5,000,000 par value securities of an electric-utility company which he controlled; how four prominent oil executives arranged to buy 33,000,000 barrels of oil through a dummy corporation and then resell it to their own companies at a personal profit of 25 cents a barrel; how an important steel official, who felt that "his boys"—a small group of executives—should be rewarded with bonuses, gave them over a period of years about $32,000,000, nearly as much as the real owners of the company, the common stockholders, received in dividends during the same period; how the trusted officials of a large New York bank so manipulated an intricate holding-company set-up that they would be entitled to a return of 47 per cent on their personal investment, while the investment of the bank itself would receive less than 7 per cent; and how some well-known New York bankers "reorganized" a rubber company in difficulties, making an alleged profit of $15,000,000 or more for their various services. These and many other examples Mr. Flynn analyzes clearly and unsparingly.

The technique of turning a quick million may vary slightly from case to case, but the principle is always the same—the use of other people's money by those in an influential position to make a sumptuous personal profit. This profit, it should be borne in mind, is quite apart from the normal, reasonable rewards or salaries to which officials are ordinarily entitled for their services. It would be a grave misconception of the problem, however, to consider the men who take these exorbitant commissions, bonuses, what-you-will, as criminals. For they are not. They gain their graft through a strictly legal—though unfaithful—use of our present-day corporate machinery. Moreover, they remain respected members of society, despite these practices.

There can be little improvement in corporate ethics, Mr. Flynn believes, until "this vicious practice [interlocking directorates] is brought to an end." With this in mind he proposes that the use of the holding company be made illegal under all circumstances and that, likewise, the holding of stock in one corporation by another be prohibited—or strictly limited to insurance and investment companies. One can hardly believe, however, that he really has much faith in these reforms. For how much headway will this program make, when the whole industrial movement today seems to be forcing corporate control into fewer and fewer hands? Combination proceeds apace, irrespective of anti-trust legislation, and thus multiplies endlessly the conflicting responsibilities of financial and industrial management. The disfranchisement of the large body of investors is of course a further problem in the growing corporate maze. "How this is to be remedied," confesses Mr. Flynn, "is not very clear. It will result, I think, in certain evolutionary developments which will have a profound influence on our social system." Clearly there is in this little immediate hope either for present stockholders or the general public, which finally bears the burden of mismanagement.

In addition to the respectable form of corporate graft, Mr. Flynn also discusses at length the common garden variety, commercial bribery. This he finds widespread, running in and out of nearly all forms of business. It is practiced by subordinates—clerks and salesmen—sometimes with and sometimes without the knowledge of their employers. To curb the practice, he suggests a federal law backed up by appropriate State legislation. But at bottom he feels the real solution depends on a stronger passion for ethical conduct, not only in business, but in society itself. Mr. Flynn's book, in short, is perhaps more challenging in its implications than in its actual content. For the eradication of graft may require a regeneration more thoroughgoing than is contemplated in any of the remedies here proposed.

W. P. MANGOLD

Books in Brief

Portrait of an American. By Robert P. Tristram Coffin. The Macmillan Company. $2.

This saga of a plain, hard-working Maine lobster fisherman, reader of Shakespeare, father of a large family, storyteller, lover of wild nature, has too much of the panegyric in its style to preserve its presumable intention of being the history of a real American. The portions of the book which deal with the young man's experiences in the Civil War would be particularly good if they did not seem such direct imitations of "The Red Badge of Courage."

Mary Lee. By Geoffrey Dennis. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

A reprint of Mr. Dennis's first and best novel, originally published in 1922. It describes the childhood of an orphan girl, born in 1848 and brought up among a group of Plymouth Brethren in southwestern England. It is narrated in the first person, and the main themes are the loneliness of the heroine and the cruelty of her pious relatives. The Brethren are grotesques portrayed with remarkable vividness, and the author's interpretation of the mind of his heroine is astonishingly real. Lacking Dickens's humor but excelling him in artistry, Mr. Dennis has written a book closely akin in mood to "Bleak House" and "Great Expectations"; he recalls Dickens also in his melodramatic plot and his sentimentally improbable happy ending. "Mary Lee" is a very faulty book, but it is ■ vibrantly alive as any novel published since the war. It is to be hoped that this reprint will make the author better known.

The Pastor of Poggsee. By Gustav Frenssen. Translated by Katharine G. Potts. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

This is the story of ■ Holstein village in peace and war, revolution and reconstruction. And it is the story of one man, a good man with strong natural passions, a man of the people whose simplicity accompanies an instinctive feeling for racial culture. The story is grounded on sound realism. The overtones are sentimental and idealistic—but these qualities are harmonious with the spirit of the people and the place; and they never overstep the mark. It is not a novel of propaganda, but its meanings become clear as the story and principal character develop together. It is peace that all men want, peace and natural human pleasures and satisfactions, both of the body and the spirit. War is always evil—even revolution in ■ good cause. There is ■ flavor of Tolstoyan religious philosophy in its message. But as a novel it is moving, dramatic, and convincing.

Contemporary Thought of India. By A. C. Underwood. Contemporary Thought of Germany. Volume I. By W. Tudor Jones. Alfred A. Knopf. Each $2.50.

The two present volumes in this series have been preceded by treatments of contemporary thought in Italy, France, Great Britain, and Japan and China (in one volume). They are to be followed by the concluding volume on Germany, and volumes on America and the Scandinavian nations. Mr. Jones's volume is ■ helpful attempt to make clear to the general reader the systems of Kant, Fichte, Hegel, Schlegel, Herder, Herbart, Schopenhauer, Nietzsche, and the other great minds of the nineteenth century which gave Germany preeminence in philosophy and which in some instances, notably Fichte and Nietzsche, powerfully influenced social and political movements. The language of philosophy is necessarily so specialized that even Mr. Jones's simplification requires rather patient reading. In the "Contemporary Thought of India" Mr. Underwood shows that politics has preempted the place of philosophy, and the thinker is perforce a politician or a social reformer. The book resolves itself into a discussion of the different degrees of readiness that Indian opinion shows for ■ break from the British Empire and from its own institutions and traditions. Unfortunately Mr. Underwood, whose own opinions are not hard to guess, man-ages in his effort to be objective to be merely inhibited.

The Black Mass. By Peter N. Krassnoff. Illustrated by Rhea Wells. Duffield and Green. $2.50.

General Krassnoff was a prominent figure in the Russian counter-revolution, and he remains one of the leaders in the exiled white Russian party which looks for a return of the old regime. This long short story compounded of mysticism, horror, and propaganda ends with the words, "Communism will die—but Russia will live!" The tale is not ■ success. The black magic of the great Satanist, the celebration of the Black Mass, the rape and suicide of the girl who turned from God to Satan are intended to be of symbolic significance in the light of Russian events.

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON'S JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU

After two years of study and research, Mr. Josephson completes a work which is destined to supersede all other biographies of Rousseau. It is an enduring portrait of an impassioned apostle of moral change who, living in a time of social catastrophe, exerted powerful influences on the future of man and society. Perhaps no other figure of the past is so important to the modern world. $5.00

The great British economist who is always rights speaks again

JOHN MAYNARD KEYNES'S ESSAYS IN PERSUASION

Since "The Economic Consequences of the Peace" appeared, Mr. Keynes's reputation as a reliable economic prophet has been unchallenged. He predicted the collapse of the Treaty of Peace, the abandonment of the gold standard, the end of the policy of deflation. Every word of this book of his collected writings is ■ challenge as well as a forecast. His diagnosis of present conditions commands the attention of the world. $2.50

Pinning down basic facts underlying the world wide depression

ALVIN H. HANSEN'S ECONOMIC STABILIZATION IN AN UNBALANCED WORLD

This is ■ fundamental discussion of great problems of economic adjustment—international stabilization, world-wide unemployment, social control. Because it is fundamental, its valuable advice, immensely important today, will be applicable five years from now. $3.00

"A notable book, unlocking new doors of thought."—JULIAN HUXLEY

GERALD HEARD'S THE EMERGENCE OF MAN

Psychology applied to human history gives us this brilliant rewriting of the accepted story of mankind from the days of half-men, by the author of "The Ascent of Humanity." "So excellent . . . so stimulating, that I should be doing a disservice to refrain from booming it for all I am worth."—

Harold Nicolson. $2.75

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Ave., New York

THE SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE

By DR. HELENA WRIGHT

Introductions by Rev. A. Herbert Gray and Abel Gregg

"Many married couples . . . lack the right understanding and enjoyment of the sex-act itself. It is to help such people that this book is written. The writer wants to give such definite and practical information that no one after reading it can any longer be ignorant of the nature of the sex-act, or fail to know exactly how it should be performed."

Havelock Ellis:—"There is probably no better small manual in simple language for married people."

$2 at all Bookstores

THE VANGUARD PRESS

100 FIFTH AVENUE

NEW YORK CITY

"The first important study of the sexual life of women made by a competent woman."—Havelock Ellis.

FACTORS IN THE SEX LIFE OF 2200 WOMEN

By Katharine Bement Davis, Ph.D.

A careful scientific analysis of the actual sex experience of 2200 women, married and unmarried. Chapter headings include: The Use of Contraceptives; Auto-Erotic Practices; Periodicity of Sex Desire; Homosexuality. A leading work on sexual adjustment, invaluable to teachers, parents and all interested in a saner attitude toward the whole subject. "Interesting and valuable. If widely disseminated, it would undoubtedly promote human happiness."—Bertrand Russell.

12 chapters.

448 pages

Price $3.50

FREE EXAMINATION COUPON N1

HARPER & BROTHERS, 49 E. 33rd St., New York
Send me a copy of Factors in the Sex Life of 2200 Women, $3.50.

- ☐ I will remit $3.50 in 10 days or return book.
☐ Check is enclosed. ☐ Send C.O.D.

Name _____

Street _____

City and State _____

Double Blossoms. A Helen Keller Anthology. Compiled by Edna Porter. Lewis Copeland. $2.

This is a collection of poems from the poets who have felt the significance of Helen Keller's life. Many well-known names are included—Robert Frost, Witter Bynner, Laura Benét, Marjorie Allen Seiffert, Clinch Calkins, John Varney, Evelyn Scott, Countee Cullen, to name only a few. It is interesting to note how poets feel about blindness, which sometimes grants intensity of spiritual insight.

Their Fathers' God. By O. E. Rølvaag. Translated from the Norwegian by Trygve M. Ager. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Since his fine "Giants in the Earth" all Rølvaag's novels have been disappointing. His latest, a sequel to "Peder Victorious," is no exception. The story tells of Peder Holm's married life with Susie, the shallow and slipshod Irish-Catholic girl. Peder matures, grows ambitious, and begins to think for himself along many lines. Susie, instinctively unhappy among these dour Norwegians, turns back to her religion. The emotional and spiritual struggle that goes on between them comes to center on Susie's religion, more particularly on the symbols of it that she brings into the house. The conflict over religion is courageously handled. But Rølvaag's hand is too heavy for domestic drama. It is better adapted to work of the broad and powerful sweep of his first novel.

Art

An Essay on Marin

IF the almost simultaneous exhibition of striking work in three distinct mediums can make a year an artist's, then the last year was surely Marin's. During the summer An American Place published an elegant collection of his racy and delightful letters; and flanking his annual autumnal water-color show it hung a group of his new impressive experiments in oil. All three exhibits were capital; and because of the parallelisms between them, Marin stood revealed with the breadth of effect which emboldens criticism to essay a definition of the rare phenomenon.

The reality imparted by the triple exhibition was the vital equilibrium of a man in rapid motion. Marin's letters, for instance, are full of quick shrewd reactions, and spontaneous mixtures of whimsicality and horse sense, imagination and understanding. A nervous but equal temperament and an unbroken line of life are evident throughout them, by reason of the homogeneity and ease and naturalness of their expressions of varying subjects and circumstances. One sees the author in the likeness of a good little power boat, meeting the changing winds and seas of the world, and adjusting himself to them without loss of direction or of impetus. Precisely what Marin's motor and center of gravity are, we can merely infer. It may be a steady vision of the equilibrium in the apparent turmoil of things; the whole man's secret sympathy with the restless form-giver of life; a complete adjustment to a rocking world. Whatever it is, Marin apparently is very much at home in his element, very much filled with his own world; and also free of the necessity of rationalizing and formulating his own activity. He is the least cerebral of artists, and the most self-assured: plainly without either overweening conceit or undue humility; and perfectly aware of the object of his work. When he speaks of it, he casts clear light on it. In one place we read, "Combinations of nature's products, formed by a certain Kind of Human, and called Art products, have an exalted value . . . in that they put in motion the Spirit, through the eye, and approach the great Seeing." In another place he says, "This my picture must not make one feel that it bursts its boundaries. That would be a delusion, and I would have it that nothing must cut my picture off from its finalities. And, too, I am not to be destructive within. I can have things that clash. I can have a jolly good fight going on. There is always a fight going on where there are living things. But I must be able to control this fight at will with a Blessed Equilibrium." To those aware of the nature of Marin's art, these phrases exhibit a perfect self-consciousness and aplomb, and send one to that art with a zest for the rich and direct communication of the balance adumbrated by the words.

Marin's washes communicate it through an architectural form which brings the eye into motion. This form is neither calculated nor synthetic, but the result of a visual experience automatically interpreted in terms of water color. It represents the world seen by us under conditions of fast motion: the world which looks rhythmic, as though its balance were incessantly displacing itself; the artist has but built it up within the limits of his medium. There, it compels the eye through sequences of those pairs of asymmetrical, overbalanced figures, angular and circular, obtuse and incurved, beak-shaped and bell-shaped, through which nature reveals herself to sight. These shapes both complement each other and in conjunction form other overbalanced figures; and these in turn are complemented by further antithetical shapes; the sequence is more or less prolonged. In some instances it is brief; the sequential pairs are few and widely spaced, and the rhythm is nervous, staccato, spurt-like. In others the series is complex, gradual, and multiple, and the rhythm correspondingly slow and majestic. In all cases the sequences are brought to a rest within the borders of the paintings. Besides, the units of the forms are correlated by a single quality of tone. Thus, the eye, impelled to grasp these temporal sequences of figures and to seek their points of rest, communicates to the whole person both the movements expressed by them and the balances which they achieve.

The time element in Marin's form is not the only agency of ocular motion. All the component elements of the microcosm of water color are so clashingly juxtaposed by him, particularly in his later works, that the receptive eye jumps from position to position in the effort to grasp their relationships. These clashes exist in relationships of color, texture, linear direction, and intrinsic momentum of stroke and wash; the contrasts are frequently extreme. While Marin's color schemes are predominantly cool, they include large and immediate contrasts of warm and cool qualities of color, intense because of their subtlety; and there are continual references of all colors to the extreme of white. The contrasts of texture are equally daring. The eye passes from shaggy washes spattered on the paper to areas smooth as satin; from tactile realizations of roundness to tactile realizations of flatness; from ethereal veil-like substance to wash possessing a stone-like consistency and weight. The different momentums of the hand registered by the washes likewise contrast: one finds scudding cascades of paint opposed to slow pools of it; and movements swift as airplanes playing against movements slow as freight trains. Still, these contrasting values are never completely heterogeneous. They are subtly co-responsive; they are what Marin himself calls "neighbor identities"; and he sees their complete correlation as one of the principal exercises of his art. A certain ethereal gray, for example, must be sufficiently consistent to "support" the heavy, gritty brown or cobalt blue he lays upon it.

Besides, the Marins have the beauty and magnificence of things born of the whole coordinate man, created but not made. The technique by which Marin communicates the unity of things seen and felt by the mobile person is itself a living

BIRTH CONTROL

The Great Question of the Day

WHERE DOES YOUR CLUB STAND?

HAVE YOU STUDIED BIRTH CONTROL?

WHAT HAVE YOU READ?

WHAT SPEAKERS HAVE YOU HEARD?

HAS YOUR CLUB ENDORSED BIRTH CONTROL?

The National Committee on Federal Legislation for Birth Control will send you literature and speakers to give the latest up-to-date information on the progress of the movement.

DO YOU KNOW that MANY organizations have endorsed some form of birth control? Among them are:

American Medical Association
(Section on Obstetrics, Gynecology and Abdominal surgery)
Medical Women's National Association
Various County Medical Societies
Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America,
(Committee on Marriage and the Home)
General Council of Congregational and Christian Churches
Methodist Episcopal Church (Various Sectional Conferences)
Central Conference of Jewish Rabbis
Universalist General Convention
American Unitarian Association
New York State League of Women Voters
New York City Federation of Women's Clubs
The American Civil Liberties Union
National Women's Trade Union League

Here is a chance to express YOUR opinion on this important question. Fill in and return the endorsement below.

EVERY ENDORSEMENT HELPS!

COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL LEGISLATION FOR BIRTH CONTROL

MARGARET SANGER, National Chairman
17 West 16th Street, New York

I hereby endorse your efforts to amend the Federal Laws now excluding supplies and medical literature relating to Birth Control from the U. S. Mails.

Name (please print)

Street

City State

Please send literature ☐

Please advise regarding available speakers ☐

Why? . . . asks Theodore Dreiser

. . . should not this giant and rapacious individualism here in America, now operating for the whims and comfort of a few, . . . be curbed, or as I would have it, set aside entirely?" . . . in the article "Individualism and the Jungle"—in the current January issue of

New Masses

■ monthly of Revolutionary Art and Literature

In the issue: THE BOY WHO DIED FOR TAMMANY, a story by Michael Gold; THE BODY OF AN AMERICAN by John Dos Passos; WOMEN ON THE BREADLINES by Meridel LeSueur; HINTS TO THE STARVING by Nathan Asch. POEMS—REVIEWS—THEATRE—WORKERS—ART.

18 ARTISTS—in satirical cartoons and drawings. (Predictions for 1932, Hoover's "Relief" Kitchen, Russia, etc.) and ■ series of field drawings on the Hunger March to Washington by 4 artists.

Single copies 15c—Subscription $1.50 ■ year; $2.00 abroad

NEW MASSES

63 WEST 15 STREET

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.

thing, with nothing of the cold formula about it. It appears perfectly impulsive and unpremeditated, a kind of second nature born of long experience of ■ particular medium; and its application has all the hallmarks of the quasi-instinctive response of the whole man to the creative moment. Thus, the freshness, the sensuous loveliness, the luminosity and harmony of the Marin water color finally escape explanation. The answer to the question of how majestic forms so complexly balanced and exquisitely representative as theirs can retain the purity of a burst of song, and all the song's indefinable glamor, must confine itself to the statement that the artist and the medium are in complete accord; and that the accord is the result of a complete adjustment of both to American life. Water color is a peculiarly American medium. As Hartley wrote ten years ago, "Few outside of Cézanne have done more with it than the Americans Whistler, Sargent Winslow Homer, Dodge MacKnight, Charles Demuth, and John Marin." The capacity for quick decision required by it, and for the expression of the life of the moment and the movement which inheres in it, has made it particularly accessible and attractive to men of the nation whose soil and climate and mode of life demand a nervous balance, a quick responsiveness. And Marin's recent matchless success with the medium would appear to flow simply from his perfect adaptation to American conditions we have noticed in connection with his letters; from his complete incarnation of the American temperament and genius.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Drama Lynching Bee

ONLY rarely is a critic of the drama forced to remind himself of the fact that intelligence, sincerity, and force are not, in themselves, necessarily enough. Compelled as he is to spend the major part of his time in the contemplation of stupid or shoddy ineptitudes, he forgets that even the most honest spectacle is artistically a failure unless it can exalt or heal, and he is shocked when he is brought face to face with a powerful drama of which he is compelled to say simply that it is, somehow or other, "from the purpose of playing." He has been interested and he has been moved but the experience undergone has left no valuable residue behind. It has passed like a nightmare from which one is merely glad to have been awakened at last.

Such is the effect produced by "Never No More"—the dramatized lynching bee most admirably produced and acted at the Hudson Theater by an all Negro cast. Telling in the simplest and directest terms the tale of a typical burning, it never for an instant turns aside from its remorseless narrative, and with the possible exception of one melodramatic bit near the end it never ceases for an instant to be utterly convincing. But the tortured spectator would be glad if it did, and would welcome anything—even a false note—capable of relieving for a moment the strain of continuous horror and of saving him from an author who has determined to spare him nothing. Since the false note does not come, one is compelled to wait eagerly for the final curtain, and one goes out on to the street too glad that it is all over to weigh the qualities of a performance concerning which one knows only that it has been almost intolerably distressing. No doubt the author intended to shock, and by shocking to arouse. It was his purpose to imprint upon the minds of his audience an unforgettable picture of the horrors of lynching and to remedy that lack of imagination which alone can make a public indifferent to such savagery

... You Can't Know Soviet Russia from Books

Like all living things Soviet Russia must be observed to be understood.

Traveling with the Open Road, you see at first hand the workings of Soviet methods and institutions and you find out how they affect human lives.

With five years of experience in arranging Soviet travel and established American representation in Russia, the Open Road is equipped to serve the best interests of Americans traveling independently or as members of specially constituted Open Road groups.

For 1932 the Open Road offers standard services at reduced rates. In writing for itineraries and rates, indicate what phase of Russian life interests you most and whether you prefer to travel with a group or independently.

The OPEN ROAD

Salmon Tower, 11 West 42nd Street, New York City

● Cooperating in U. S. S. R. with INTOURIST

☐ PLAYS ☐ LECTURES ☐

The Theatre Guild Presents
EUGENE O'NEILL'S TRILOGY

MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA

Composed of 3 plays
Homecoming, The Hunted, the Haunted

All 3 plays will be presented on one day, commencing at 5:30 sharp. Dinner intermission of one hour at 7 o'clock. No matinee performances.

GUILD THEATRE, 52d St., West of Broadway

THE THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS

REUNION IN VIENNA

A comedy by ROBERT B. SHERWOOD

MARTIN BECK THEA., 45 St. & 8 Ave. Penn. 8-6100
Evs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

LESLIE HOWARD

in PHILIP BARRY'S New Comedy

THE ANIMAL KINGDOM

Staged by GILBERT MILLER
"The season's most gratifying adventure."
—Percy Hammond, Herald-Tribune.

BROADHURST THEA. 44th St., West of B'way. Evs. 8:40
Mats. Wed. and Sat. 2:30

ARCH SELWYN presents

THE DEVIL PASSES

A NEW PLAY BY BENN W. LEVY

with ARTHUR BYRON, BASIL RATHBONE, ROBERT LORAIN, MARY NASH, DIANA WYNARD, CECILIA LOFTUS, ERNEST THESIGER, ERNEST COSSART.

SELWYN THEA., W. 42nd St., Evs. 8:40 | Prices Evs. $1 to $4
Mats.: Thurs. and Sat., 2:40 | Mats. $1 to $2.50

GILBERT MILLER Presents

HELEN HAYES

in MOLNAR'S New Comedy

THE GOOD FAIRY

HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd St.
Evenings 8:50 Matinees Thursday and Saturday 2:40

A Clearing House Of Opinion THE GROUP Meets at Auditorium 150 West 85th St.

Tuesday Evening, January 26th, at 8:30 P.M.

The Group invites you to its Monthly
ENTERTAINMENT and DANCE
Dancing until Past-Midnight

This Sunday Afternoon (Jan. 24th)
PIERRE LOVING speaks on: "ARE MORALS NECESSARY?"
Tea Served Subscription 50c

NEXT WEEK IN THE NATION

Issues at Geneva

By David Wainhouse

A discussion of the issues and nations involved in the disarmament conference which opens February 3

INDIVIDUAL and COMMUNITY
SOCIAL WORK

The social worker working with Jews must be trained to deal successfully with the socially maladjusted Jewish family and individual.

He must be able to see the problem in the large. He must "see" the Jews of America as a distinctive group aiming at adjustment to the general environment for its own greater happiness and the enrichment of American life.

Holders and prospective holders of a Bachelor's degree are invited to examine carefully the advantages of

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

A number of scholarships and fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each academic year are available for especially qualified candidates.

For full information write to
M. J. KARP, Director

The Training School

For Jewish Social Work

(a graduate school)

71 W. 47th St., New York City

☐ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT ☐

PLAYS TO SEE

- Animal Kingdom—Broadhurst—44 St. W. of B'way.
- Brief Moment—Belasco—W. 44 St.
- Civic Light Opera Co.—Erlanger's—W. 44 St.
- Counsellor-at-Law—Plymouth—W. 45 St.
- Cynara—Morosco—45 St. W. of B'way.
- Fata Morgana—Royale—45 St. W. of B'way.
- Hay Fever—Avon—W. 45 St.
- Mourning Becomes Electra—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.
- Of Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.
- Reunion in Vienna—Martin Beck—45 St. & 8 Ave.
- Springtime for Henry—Bijou—45 St. W. of B'way.
- The Barretts of Wimpole Street—Empire—B'way. & 40 St.
- The Band Wagon—New Amsterdam—W. 42 St.
- The Bride The Sun Shines On—Fulton—46 St. W. of B'way.
- The Devil Passes—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
- The Good Fairy—Henry Miller's—124 W. 43 St.
- The Left Bank—Little—44 St.

as he here describes. But even the finest sermon is useless if preached to empty pews, and if one is determined to do people good in the theater one must first get them into it—a fact which seems to have been forgotten by those responsible for the play now in question. It will fail as propaganda because it will not be heard, and it has failed already as art because it does not contain within itself its own justification or provide any outlet for the emotions which it arouses.

Perhaps a genuinely beautiful play might be written on the same theme if it were concerned with the spiritual repercussions of the events here described, but "Never No More" keeps the attention focused upon physical facts and becomes in effect a melodrama which has been deprived of that simple and satisfactory solution which makes melodrama's elementary delights possible. Instead of being concerned with the meaning of its events, it is concerned with the events themselves, and it devotes the entire second act to the actual lynching, to the building of the fire, the pleas of the victim, and the final tossing to the flames—all of which takes place just off stage while the agonized family looks on. No poetry, no subtlety, and no thought could be noticed in the presence of such brutal facts. The sensibilities and the nerves are violently as well as skillfully assaulted, but only sensibilities and nerves are concerned. No one but a sadist could enjoy the play, and all art must be in some fashion—however complicated or difficult—enjoyable. Otherwise it is not, whatever else it may be, art at all.

In "The Devil Passes" (Selwyn Theater) the sprightly author of "Springtime for Henry" has succumbed to a temptation to which playwrights are unaccountably subject and has written a comedy about God. If he had stopped for a moment to contemplate the uniform badness of all similar attempts from "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" on down to such more recent lapses as Molnar's "Mima" and Savoir's "He," he might have come to the conclusion that the whole attempt is inept, but evidently he did not and the result is interesting chiefly as one more illustration of the fact that the theology of even entertaining dramatists is likely to be excessively boring. Mr. Levy—if we must take him seriously—seems to have fallen into the Manichean heresy and devotes his play to the attempt to show how the devil is really doing God's work by providing those opportunities for evil which virtue gains strength by resisting. Into a house-party composed of boastfully hard-boiled egotists he introduces a sinister-looking curate who shows each how his heart's desire can be obtained at the cost of a dirty deed, and when each has discovered to his surprise his own essential decency, the curate departs, leaving behind the suspicion not only that he was the devil himself, but that the latter is not so black as he is painted. Mr. Levy's dialogue is amusing as it always is, but neither he nor the unusually talented cast can overcome the terrible handicap imposed by a painfully mechanical as well as painfully trivial fable. Perhaps God is really good and perhaps the reasons for doubting the fact may be adequately disposed of, but the argument is rather too complicated as well as rather too momentous to be settled by an anecdote. Frivolity is delightful under many circumstances but not in its more serious moments.

"The Black Tower" (Sam Harris Theater) is a melodrama of the green-lights and secret-doors variety. If you are interested in the career of a mad physician who kidnaps the victims of his sinister experiments conducted in a lonely tower, then see it by all means. Unlike "Never No More" it is not painfully convincing.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

BIRTH CONTROL LAWS

*Shall We Keep Them?
Change Them?
Or Abolish Them?*

by MARY WARE DENNETT

A book which clarifies the whole discussion: tells how the laws in the United States happened to be, and analyzes the propositions for changing them. It tells the story of the first six years of struggle in Congress, and why the bill was stalled.

The only book of its kind
READABLE—VALUABLE—AMUSING

Price $2.50

Published by

F. H. HITCHCOCK

105 West 40th St.

New York City

HUNGER AND LOVE

A Novel by Lionel Britton

Introduction by Bertrand Russell

This novel tells the story of Arthur Phelps, whom the author thus introduces to us on the first page:

"I should think by the look of him, now, he would be somewhere about sixteen. Yes, my lord, he is a dirty little swine, there's no doubt about it. That bit of rag in his pocket, about the color of a motor tire, is what he wipes his nose on. Many working-class boys would call it snitch, but Arthur calls it nose; many would call it snot-rag, but Arthur calls it handkerchief, that you will infer he is to some extent superior; still, it would not be at all a bad thing to send his trousers to the wash."

This overwhelming novel presents the most terrible indictment of present-day society and bourgeois morality ever written.

632 pages

$3.00 at bookstores

THE VANGUARD PRESS, 100 Fifth Ave., New York City

Contributors to This Issue

EDMUND WILSON is the author of a new book, "The American Jitters," which will appear in the spring.

BORIS SMOLAR is the editor of the Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

DENYS WORTMAN is the well-known cartoonist whose drawings appear daily in the World-Telegram.

MARGARET SANGER is the national chairman of the National Committee on Federal Legislation for Birth Control.

ROBERT S. ALLEN is a member of the Washington staff of the International News Service.

HENRY PRATT FAIRCHILD is professor of sociology at New York University.

C. V. DRYSDALE is the president of the Malthusian League.

CHARLOTTE PERKINS GILMAN is the author of several books on sociology.

S. ADOLPHUS KNOPE is a New York physician who has contributed many articles to medical journals on eugenics and birth control.

GEORGE B. LAKE is a Chicago psychiatrist and managing editor of Clinical Medicine and Surgery.

WILLIAM ALLEN PUSEY is a Chicago dermatologist who has written many articles on medical topics.

JOHN DEWEY is the distinguished American philosopher and educator.

MORRIS L. ERNST, a New York attorney, is the author of "America's Primer."

GRANVILLE HICKS is assistant professor of English at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS is in the department of anthropology at Northwestern University.

W. P. MANGOLD is engaged in industrial research and magazine writing in New York City.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1932

No. 3474

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	127
EDITORIALS:
Nearing the Abyss	130
Doles for Industry	131
Improper Guardianship	132
Paul M. Warburg	132
SPEAKING OF REVOLUTION	133
"WE ARE ALL BOLSHIEVKS." By Hendrik Willem van Loon.....	133
THE DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE MEETS. By David W. Wainhouse.....	137
JOHNSON FOR PRESIDENT? By Paul Y. Anderson.....	139
OF TWO ETERNITIES. By Isidor Schneider.....	140
STARVATION AND THE "REDS" IN KENTUCKY. By Oakley Johnson.....	141
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	143
CORRESPONDENCE	144
FINANCE: IS EASY MONEY THE CURE? By S. Palmer Harman.....	145
BOOKS, MUSIC, FILMS, DRAMA:
Poem for My Daughter. By Horace Gregory.....	146
On the Theme of Time. By Eda Lou Walton.....	146
Eloquent Biography. By Isidor Schneider.....	147
Why India Rebels. By W. Norman Brown.....	148
American Secrecy About Red Russia. By Mauritz A. Hallgren.....	148
Books in Brief.....	149
Music: Among the Best Performers. By Arthur Mendel.....	149
Films: Indigenous. By Margaret Marshall.....	150
Drama: Nice People. By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	151
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.....	152

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN FRED A. KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

SAMUEL SEABURY'S REPORT to the State legislature on the "evils" of the political system which has the New York City government in its grip would provoke into open revolt a more sensitive people than the residents of that city seem to be. The report is of an intermediate nature, the Seabury investigation being not yet concluded. In almost any other community its revelations would be considered sensational. The report cites case after case of graft and corruption, example upon example of "the sordid traffic in political influence." It does not depend for its proof upon hearsay or vague rumors, but piles up a mountain of documentary and other detailed evidence in support of its conclusions. Judge Seabury has by no means told the whole story. Admitting this, the report accuses Tammany Hall of having sought to obstruct and delay the investigation at every turn. In reply, a Tammany member of the investigating committee, Assemblyman Louis Cuvillier, has the effrontery to assert that the many evils exposed in the report are but "an incident in the administration of all governments." Concluding his report, Judge Seabury declares that there must be a complete overhauling of the city government, not only in personnel, but in structure and form, and he recommends that a city manager or commission form of government be adopted. His recommendations should be earnestly studied in every city where corrupt municipal rings exist. Would that they might excite in New Yorkers something more than the indifference or cynical amusement with which in the past Father Knickerbocker's citizens have met evidences of municipal graft and misgovernment!

KENNETH MACKINTOSH of Seattle has been nominated by President Hoover to a place on the federal bench in the State of Washington. It is well to know something of this man's record. He was a classmate of Herbert Hoover at Stanford, a member of the Wickersham Commission, and for several years has been a justice of the Washington State Supreme Court. In the latter capacity he has shown himself a consistent foe of labor and liberalism. What Washington thinks of his work on the Supreme Court was strikingly demonstrated in the 1928 election when Judge Mackintosh ran for the United States Senate, his opponent being Clarence Dill. Mr. Hoover carried the State by three to one, but Mackintosh lost to Senator Dill by 35,000. Judge Mackintosh's connection with the Centralia tragedy deserves special mention. On Armistice Day, 1919, a mob of citizens and returned soldiers wrecked the hall of the Industrial Workers of the World, and later raided the city jail and lynched one of the members of the I. W. W. who had been arrested because four men in the mob were fatally wounded in the attack. Two days later the following letter was written:

GEORGE DYSART, ESQ.,

CENTRALIA, WASHINGTON:

MY DEAR DYSART: I want to express to you my appreciation of the high character of citizenship displayed by the people of Centralia in their agonizing calamity. We are all shocked by the manifestation of barbarity on the part of the outlaws, and are depressed by the loss of lives of brave men, but at the same time are proud of the calm control and loyalty to American ideals demonstrated by the returned soldiers and citizens. I am proud to be an inhabitant of a State which contains a city with the record which has been made for Centralia by its law-abiding citizens.

KENNETH MACKINTOSH

Olympia, Wash., November 13, 1919

This man should certainly not be placed in a position of authority in a federal court.

THE BILL TO REVISE the Federal Reserve and national-banking laws, sponsored by Senator Glass, deserves praise for the direction in which it moves. It calls for the removal of the Secretary of the Treasury as a member of the Federal Reserve Board, a necessary measure originally advocated by Paul Warburg, to reduce undue political influence. It seeks to control the disturbing growth of chain or group banking and to permit national banks to establish branches in the States where State banks are permitted to do so. This provision is necessary if merely for the purpose of putting national banks in a position to compete on equal terms with State banks; though it should be considered only a first step toward general State-wide branch banking, and the eventual establishment of branch banks throughout the Federal Reserve areas. The bill does not abolish banking affiliates but proposes a searching examination of them and complete publicity concerning their transactions. In the moderation of this measure the sponsors of the bill were doubtless guided by the fear that more drastic regulation would cause large national banks to take out State charters. The bill seeks to control speculative loans; and, finally, sets up inside the Federal Reserve system a corporation to liquidate the assets of failed member banks and to make cash available for depositors as early as possible.

BY SHIFTING GENERAL DAWES to the Emergency Reconstruction Corporation and appointing Secretary Stimson to the head of the Commission to the Disarmament Conference, the President has improved the quality of the commission. In saying this we are well aware of Mr. Stimson's great unpopularity with the American newspapermen and of his ineptness in handing out news. No one could have done worse in this respect than he did at London. None the less, Mr. Stimson is most eager, as his utterances have steadily shown, to obtain a real measure of disarmament, and more than that, his rank puts the American delegation on the same footing as those of other countries so far as that is possible for us. There had been genuine resentment abroad at the President's failure to put anyone on the commission of higher rank than an ambassador. These last-hour shifts and appointments have, however, injured the solidarity of the commission and very much delayed its getting together on a definite program. Meanwhile, the President's hasty appointment of General Dawes to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in advance of the passage of the bill by Congress has been another blunder, for the law distinctly states that the directors of the corporation are to choose their own officers. As both of these men are Republicans, this has given the Democratic minority a chance to charge that the President is playing politics with the corporation. What a pity it is that the President has not a wider range of appointees to choose from! With him it is always Dawes, Fletcher, or Gibson; or Gibson, Fletcher, or Dawes; or Fletcher, Dawes, or Gibson, with Meyer thrown in every now and then for good measure.

OUR CONSTANT WISH that The Nation might have the means to establish its own Washington Bureau with observers to report each week on what is actually happening in Washington is intensified by the fact that in our leader on foreign loans in the issue of January 20 we were the victims once more of inaccurate or inadequate Washington reporting in the dailies, and therefore did the State Department something of an injustice. We would, of course, not have said that the State Department approved an extension of a short-term credit loan to Colombia of $20,000,000 had we known that it was not correct, as reported, that the State Department passed upon this matter. We also learn that the State Department did not ignore the protest of the Commerce Department with regard to the Bolivian loan of $23,000,000. While we greatly regret having been thus misled into an unwarranted comment, we do not believe that we have done any substantial injustice to the State Department. It should never have had anything whatever to do with foreign loans, should have refused to state whether it had or had not objections to them and have kept its hands off entirely. Only then could it have avoided the present confusion, the charges and counter-charges, and the wholesale misapprehension as to whether the State Department does or does not approve foreign loans which exists in the public mind.

LORD SNOWDEN, who with Ramsay MacDonald and J. H. Thomas deserted the British Labor Party in the hour of its greatest need, is beginning to wobble again. He threatened to resign from the National Government because of its insistence upon a general 10 per cent tariff on all manufactured goods, contending that the projected tariff schedule is entirely unnecessary in view of the depreciation of the pound sterling. It is difficult to forgive Snowden his sins of the immediate past, but it must be acknowledged that here he stands on firm ground. A permanent tariff would in any case prove costly to Great Britain—to say nothing of its disastrous effects upon international trade. But the depreciation of the pound and other circumstances have made such a tariff doubly unnecessary. Were the MacDonald Cabinet's plan for a blanket schedule to be carried through, it would mean, as Snowden emphasizes, that Great Britain had unashamedly embraced protectionism, the most dangerous form of that economic nationalism which has brought world economy and world trade to their present low estate. In spite of his flat disagreement with the majority of the Cabinet, including the Prime Minister, however, Lord Snowden will not resign. Rather than spoil the fiction of national unity, Mr. MacDonald will endure the almost unprecedented spectacle of a Cabinet split on a major issue.

JAPAN WILL NEVER be held in check by mere words, by public remonstrances from Geneva alone. This the League of Nations and the American State Department ought to know. The latest proof of the contempt in which the Japanese hold the insincere peace gestures from Europe and Washington is revealed in their activities at Shanghai. The Chinese have only one weapon with which to oppose Japanese aggression in Manchuria, and that is their boycott of Japanese goods. The Chinese have used this weapon with telling effect; Japan's trade with China, and therefore the well-being of her people, has been seriously impaired. Japan now means to break the boycott with military force. She has sent 1,400 marines and several warships to Shanghai with the avowed determination to reduce the Chinese to utter helplessness. She even threatens to close Shanghai harbor to Chinese vessels! Tokio does not appear to be bothered for a moment by the international complications that might be encountered in carrying out this plan. Several Powers have troops stationed at Shanghai, and they have treaty rights there no less sacred than those Japan claims in Manchuria. The representatives of these Powers will need the utmost tact to prevent a clash with the Japanese invaders. But far more serious is the fact of the Japanese invasion itself. Japan may, by juggling diplomatic phrases, be able to justify in international law her aggression in Manchuria, but she can never justify the hostile stand she has taken at Shanghai.

THE NEW stand-still agreement between German banks and industry and Germany's private short-term creditors is probably as good a solution as could have been reached under the circumstances. The agreement, to be effective for one year, provides machinery for the conversion of short-term obligations, at the option of the creditor, into ten-year notes bearing interest at 6 per cent, and offers inducements to creditors to make such a conversion. With the existing uncertainty it was found undesirable to provide for any repayment of the short-term debt in fixed amounts at fixed intervals; the plan, therefore, is a flexible one, and the amount and times of repayment are to be subject to the decision of a committee. One significant feature of the report is its emphasis on the fact that Germany has already made the stupendous repayment of 5,000,000,000 marks since the autumn of 1930, an amount equal to nearly half the original short-term debt. But the terms of the agreement emphasize its own stop-gap nature. The all-important thing, as the creditors' committee insists, is to restore a basis for credit in Germany, which cannot be done without a final settlement of the reparations problem and of the inter-Allied debts which are intimately connected with it.

COMMUNIST DISTURBANCES appear to be gaining in number and in force. We shall doubtless see more of them as the depression wears on. Some of these outbreaks are obviously directed by the Communists; others have been spontaneous in nature, popular revolts against the hardships of the world-wide panic, which have, of course, played directly into the hands of the radicals. There is no proof that the British naval mutiny of last September was of Communist inspiration, though the radicals were quick to jump at the opportunity to make capital of the disaffection thus revealed. The Chilean naval mutiny which took place at about the same time was, however, openly and frankly led by the left. Since then Bolshevik agitators have conducted what for their purposes have been successful popular demonstrations in other South American countries, notably Peru. More recently the Communists, together with the anarchists and radical syndicalists, have induced great numbers of Spanish workers to join in the direct-action campaign against the newly established republic. The Spanish authorities have turned from promises to bullets in their efforts to quiet the working people. Getting closer to home, the Communists have taken advantage of the confusion in El Salvador that followed the overthrow of the government by a military clique. When it was learned that the Communists had taken several towns, the United States, British, and Canadian governments, realizing the danger to themselves, hurriedly dispatched warships to El Salvador. However, it may be doubted whether this universal unrest can be put down with bullets, or with anything less than world-wide economic recovery.

AN APPARENTLY FRIENDLESS NEGRO, Euel Lee, otherwise known as Orphan Jones, has been convicted in Towson, Maryland, on a charge of having murdered a farmer and his family. However we may regard the verdict itself, it must be said that the trial was conducted under circumstances far different from those which at one time threatened to make Lee another victim of Southern mob justice. The crime was committed in Worcester County on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. Lee was arrested and charged with the murder, but so intense was the feeling against him that the county officials feared to keep him in the local jail. He was removed to Baltimore, then to Cambridge, also on the Eastern Shore, only to be returned later to Baltimore. Meanwhile the people of the Eastern Shore clamored for what they called justice. In the midst of the furor another Negro was lynched in Worcester County, and this increased the agitation among the people. The Maryland Court of Appeals ruled that Lee could be tried on the Eastern Shore, but added in unmistakable language that the court in which he was tried and the authorities of the community would be held strictly responsible for any miscarriage of justice. Eventually, with the help of some of the more sober-minded residents of Worcester County, the State authorities succeeded in having the case transferred to Towson, a small town near Baltimore, where the trial was held in a quiet, dispassionate atmosphere.

FULLY ONE THOUSAND musicians are facing destitution in the city of New York, less than two and one-half years after the great stock-market crash, and a trifle less than two years after Herbert Hoover so confidently informed the American people, on March 8, 1930, that the unemployment was only a little more than seasonal, and that both unemployment and the depression would be a thing of the past in two months, that is, in May, 1930. A fund of $300,000 is being raised to tide over these musicians—a pitifully small sum, particularly when one remembers the fact that many of them are musicians of the first rank, with corresponding responsibilities. Yet this is only one aspect of the injury that the depression has done to us on the cultural side. Who can measure the blow to education—the studios of these musicians who are also teachers are reported entirely empty—in various directions, or estimate the number of young people whose plans for a liberal education have had to be abandoned? Everywhere the story is the same. With half the theaters in New York City closed, as compared with a year ago, there are hordes of actors and actresses without the possibility of earning a cent. There are teachers who look in vain for places, while doctors and dentists and many lawyers, too, find themselves unable to obtain payment for services rendered to perfectly honest people who are eager to pay their debts but cannot. What a terrible responsibility those persons bear who put the United States into the World War, thereby placed in jeopardy the American Republic, and were shortsighted enough to believe in 1918 that they had won a victory!

LYTTON STRACHEY is dead at the age of fifty-two after an attack of paratyphoid fever. Never a prolific writer, his fame will rest upon three or possibly four books, but it appears about as secure as that of any contemporary. History will certainly remember him as the inventor of "the new biography," but it will probably conclude also that no one of his followers achieved any studies quite so finished, so balanced, and so perfect in their own way as his. Mr. Strachey was a cousin of St. Loe Strachey, for many years editor of the Spectator, and was himself essentially a bookish man, but he was also a picturesque personality and the wit which his bookishness enabled him to distil was very different from what is popularly associated with pedantry. We shall probably devote an essay to him in an early number of The Nation. For the present we can only express our regret over the removal of one of the most uniformly delightful of contemporary writers.

Nearing the Abyss

LET no one blink the facts. The European situation, and therefore the American situation, gets steadily worse. More than ever it seems that because of the incapacity of the present governments the world is approaching destruction. To what other conclusion can one come when one reads within a couple of days the news that the Lausanne conference has been indefinitely postponed; that Premier Laval seeks to evade the reparations and debts issue by postponing the consideration of this subject until after the French and American elections; that France, according to the Premier's announcement, will not yield an iota in her stand against disarmament without security; that Edouard Herriot violently assails, not only the Germans, but the United States for keeping itself aloof and not accepting a guaranty pact; that there is a break in the British Cabinet which compromises its action; and that the United States, in the form of an official memorandum, actually goes so far as to forbid the debtor nations to form a united front to present their case to us? Of the impudence of this last we shall have something to say later. As to the general situation, we can only point out that all this is wasting time when there is not a moment to be lost. Can anyone question the reasonableness of the comment of the London News-Chronicle that "unless some method is speedily devised to wind up definitely and finally the reparations liabilities, Europe will drift from the present confusion to absolute catastrophe"? Of this there are daily signs. There is not only the critical financial situation of Austria, Hungary, Rumania, and Greece, but the unemployment in Germany has risen to the unprecedented figure of 5,966,000 (an increase of 300,000 in two weeks), while the belief grows that Germany cannot much longer remain upon the gold standard.

Now if these facts, and many more, and the realization that the Hoover moratorium has only five more months to run cannot induce the politicians of Europe and the United States to handle the situation as sensible business men would, what can bring them to their senses? As things stand, it appears as if the French were determined to make the success of the Geneva disarmament conference impossible. At the same time, neither the English nor the French statesmen have made any definite plan, nor agreed upon any policy for the Lausanne conference, when that gathering finally meets, if ever. Yet it was on December 25 last that Ramsay MacDonald dramatically declared: "The British Government is perfectly ready—ready to meet at once. For God's sake, let us meet at once!" We have already seen a serious rift in his own Cabinet upon the tariff issue, which prevented his Foreign Minister from going to Paris to begin over again the weary round of conversations with the French. Is it any wonder that public sentiment in England looks toward an abandonment of all further interest in the attitudes of the United States and France, and favors devoting all the energies of the country toward developing the Empire by itself? Similarly in the United States the prevailing note is that we must write off all our bad debts, withdraw absolutely from Europe and from participation in every conference, and devote ourselves to carrying on as best we may with as little association with the rest of the world as is humanly possible.

That way, of course, lies destruction. How often must it be said that the world is so interrelated that there can be no possibility of any one country working out of the depression without international cooperation? What we are witnessing is the paralysis of statesmanship abroad. To this we are contributing to the very best of our ability. The day after Walter Lippmann truthfully wrote that there was only one course for Europe which offered any hope, "that is to face the problem in Europe on the principle of European solidarity," we read Mr. Stimson's incredible notice to this same Europe that "the United States Government would look with displeasure on the formation of a united front by the debtor nations." This, it appears, was sent to Europe at the beginning of the year. It was enough in itself to paralyze every effort to bring the European nations to a wise agreement on tariffs, disarmament, reparations, joint action in the matter of currencies, and the gold standard. We cannot conceive of any greater effrontery or stupidity. It is dictation by the United States in a particularly offensive way, and it is bound to increase in all Europe the existing feeling of hostility to our government. As if this were not enough, we have Congress on record that it refuses to consider the reopening of the debt question or an extension of the moratorium.

Next, we have the reiteration of our stupid assertion that there is no connection between debts and reparations, just as if under the Young Plan reparations payments were not intimately related to the debt payments to America, and as if reductions in war-debt payments to the United States would not be passed on to Germany in the form of reduced demands for reparations; just as if Washington did not know that the instant Germany ceases payments to the Allies, the Allies will not pay us. Washington sits back and says every day that "the initiative must come from Europe in any further discussion of reparations and debts," and proceeds to make that initiative just as difficult as possible by forbidding a round-robin to the United States. This is utter folly. Apparently nothing can bring these alleged statesmen to their senses—not the plain evidence of the approaching bankruptcy of Europe, not the Communist uprising in Spain, not the Japanese aggression in Manchuria, not the revolt in India. Must it be said again that those whom the gods would destroy they first make mad? We can at least be grateful to the German Reich that the Chancellor has demanded a final decision on reparations prior to July 1. Until that question is definitely settled, none of the other great economic questions now pressing for solution can be settled. If there is not a show-down by then, it will doubtless be too late. The world cannot drift indefinitely. Every hour brings us nearer to the point where in several countries tortured humanity will rise and seek to smash everything in the hope that a new system of government, or no government at all, will bring them some relief from the terrible suffering and misery of the present situation. Into this the statesmen have got us; out of it they seem unable to find a road.

Doles for Industry

SOME organization to carry out the principal aims of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was indispensable in the present crisis, and President Hoover and Congress deserve praise for their recognition of this need and their promptness in meeting it. That the new corporation will be an ideal instrument for its purpose, however, can hardly be contended. It will be similar in its main outlines to the War Finance Corporation, with a capital of $500,000,000 subscribed by the government. It is to have power to issue bonds and other obligations up to $1,500,000,000 and to make loans from the proceeds. These loans may be made to farmers, to railroads, and to banks and other financial institutions. They may be made at any time during the next year, and the President may, if he wishes, extend this time for another year. No loan may be made for more than a three-year term, though it may be renewed, if necessary, for two years more. The corporation itself will have a life not longer than ten years, and may be dissolved sooner. It is to be managed by a board of directors of seven members, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury (or the Undersecretary), the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, the Farm Loan Commissioner, and four other persons, of whom General Dawes has already been named.

The primary purpose of a corporation of this kind must be to promote general confidence, and government loans to help individual enterprises or to protect individual creditors can be justified only so far as they tend to achieve this end. This is perhaps another way of saying that the principal help should be extended to needy banks rather than to other forms of enterprise. From this point of view the corporation is authorized to make too many different kinds of loans. The act wisely provides that no loans are to be made for the purpose of initiating any enterprise, but unwisely excepts agricultural loans from this provision. It allocates $200,000,000 of the funds of the corporation for loans direct to farmers, and though it provides that other loans shall be "fully and adequately secured," its only provision regarding these loans to farmers is that "a first lien on all crops growing, or to be planted and grown, shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be deemed sufficient security for such loan or advance." When one adds up all the existing agencies for loans, direct or indirect, to the farmer, apart from his local bank, such as federal land banks (the capital of which is to be increased $125,000,000), joint-stock land banks, federal intermediate credit banks, agricultural credit corporations, live-stock credit corporations (all of which may borrow in turn from the new corporation), not to speak of the well-known Farm Board, the need for these additional loans direct to the farmer is very dubious—particularly when one of his greatest difficulties already is his burden of debt. The corporation's proportion of losses under this head may be expected to be very heavy.

The chief reason for authorizing such loans seems political. Another purely political provision is that forbidding the corporation to make loans upon foreign securities or foreign acceptances. What this means, in effect, is that if a bank happens to hold Chicago and Eastern Illinois 5 per cent bonds, selling at about 16, or St. Louis and San Francisco 4½'s, selling at 25, the corporation will lend against them; but it will not lend against British Government bonds selling at 93, or French Government bonds selling at 110. This, of course, will make not the slightest difference to the European governments involved; the bonds have already been sold; but inability to borrow against such bonds might embarrass the banks that happen to have large holdings of them.

The Nation has already expressed the view that it would have been better to make all railroad loans directly through the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to make the banking loans through a separate banking corporation. This corporation or discount bank, moreover, could have issued emergency currency directly against the sound assets of banks (repeating the successful expedient of the Aldrich-Vreeland currency notes in 1914) instead of being forced to float huge bond issues.

The effect of the new corporation will depend to a very large extent upon the wisdom with which it is administered. There is no reason, on the one hand, why it should lend to borrowers who are able to find accommodation at reasonable rates from private sources; this would merely take business away from the commercial banks and would not help the general situation. On the other hand, it should not make any loans to institutions that are clearly insolvent—except, of course, when receivership already exists, in which case loans may be made against sound assets. The corporation's main function must be to help railroads, banks, and other institutions over difficulties that seem likely to be temporary. This means that the great part of its loans will be, so to speak, "twilight-zone" loans so far as safety is concerned; the taxpayer must expect a certain proportion of losses. Apart from the question of safety, the corporation should certainly not make loans to any bank or farm organization for the purpose of keeping either goods or securities indefinitely off the market. If it does not wish to repeat the folly of the Farm Board, it should insist on at least a gradual and orderly liquidation. It must not be made the instrument for holding up any industry's prices artificially, with the customary result of leaving the taxpayer to hold the bag. If these safeguards are taken, and if the funds of the corporation are not dissipated in utterly worthless loans—which would merely postpone the day of reckoning and make it much worse when it comes—then the corporation will act as a useful stimulant to confidence, though it cannot be the cure-all that so much recent Wall Street and Washington comment has implied.

A final word must be said of the corporation as a part of Mr. Hoover's policy. It is essentially a palliative, not a cure. It deals with the results of the depression and not with its causes. It puts all hands to the pumps to bail out the ship, but it does nothing to repair the leaks. Not until Mr. Hoover and Congress see the need for a lower tariff, and for a cancellation or at least a drastic reduction of the war debts—not, in brief, until they turn to the very things that they seem most determined to ignore—will they do anything to combat the present crisis at its source.

Improper Guardianship

THE tale of federal-government exploitation of the American Indians is well enough known in its general aspects. But too often certain phases of it escape attention. Specifically, therefore, the Pueblo lands bill, already introduced in Congress and probably to be considered this session, is worthy of the warmest championship by every possible agency. The bill, seeking ■ it does to make partial restitution to the Pueblo tribes for land of which they were unjustly deprived, should be passed even though, in a year of business depression, it demands three-quarters of a million dollars of federal funds. First, because it will settle once and for all the vexed question of land titles in that section of New Mexico, where land litigation has been going on for nearly a hundred years; secondly, because it will do justice to the Indians and restore to them compensation of which, by decision of the Pueblo Lands Board, they were unhappily deprived. By the terms of the Pueblo Lands Act of 1924 it was decided to compensate the Indians for land title to which had been transferred to whites, and to compensate white settlers who had been put off Indian lands. Appraisers were selected to determine the amount of the compensation; their findings set ■ total of $1,892,878. But the Pueblo Lands Board, ignoring these findings—although it had chosen the appraisers—cut the compensation to about $560,000. The pending bill allows the Pueblos an additional $750,000.

The claim is entirely just, even modest, considering the value of the lands in question. But since it implies at least bad judgment on the part of the government agency which reduced the appraised values, it will be bitterly fought by the champions of the Pueblo Lands Board and of H. J. Hagerman, one of the board members. The Senate Committee on Indian Affairs is sponsoring the bill.

Less promising is the situation of the Apache Indians on the Mescalero Reservation of New Mexico. Here also the Committee on Indian Affairs, of which Senator Frazier is chairman, has issued a report. Briefly it tells ■ tale of heartless bureau exploitation. The Indian bureau which has charge of the reservation is supported by funds derived from the profits of Indian lands; the Indians themselves are in ■ state of privation and suffering; the bureau waxes fat and enjoys full and plenteous life. In 1930 the per capita expenditure by the bureau for every Indian living on the reservation was $306. Senator Frazier's report declares: "If government in all its branches, national and local, were supported ■ lavishly, on a per capita basis, as is the Indian agency on the Mescalero Reservation, the tax fund would total more than $36,000,000,000, or more than a third of the aggregate national income." It is worth adding that on reservations supported largely or wholly by government grant the per capita cost of operation ranges from around $25 to something under $50; that in the case of ■ number of them these amounts purchase efficient and humane service. As for the Mescalero expenditures, again to quote Senator Frazier's report: "The Indians' timber is being squandered on a lot of high-priced employees while the Indians are going without sufficient food and clothing." Robbing government wards of food and shelter to keep bureaucrats at work on fat salaries is not far short of the apex of meanness.

Paul M. Warburg

IT is related of Paul M. Warburg that shortly before the beginning of his fatal illness he said, "I have studied finance and economics and international trade all my life, and now, after these recent events, I have come to the conclusion that I know nothing whatever about any of them." We do not know whether the story is true or not, but it would be quite characteristic of the singularly modest, exceptionally able, and really learned man, whose intellectual equipment for his profession as financier and banker was probably not equaled by that of anyone else in America. Paul Warburg was the descendant of bankers who, for nearly two hundred years, have devoted themselves to the science of banking in Hamburg, where the house of Warburg continues with unsurpassed prestige. More than that, he devoted himself assiduously to the study of the difficult subjects with which by choice he associated himself. His removal to the United States brought about no change in the seriousness of his purposes or in his determination to keep himself abreast of every financial and economic development. It did, however, make of him a most loyal and devoted American.

It was soon after his arrival in this country that he became aware of the painful deficiencies and weaknesses of our banking world, and single-handed set himself to the task of convincing the members of his own profession, the editors of the country, and the intelligent public of the necessity of the central-banking system, which resulted, finally, in the establishment of the Federal Reserve banks. His loyalty to the land of his adoption, and his distinguished service as one of the original members of the Federal Reserve Board did not save Mr. Warburg from being the subject of suspicion and hostility during the World War, because of his German origin. It is to Woodrow Wilson's lasting discredit that he permitted Mr. Warburg to retire to private life when the latter's term expired in the middle of the war, less, in our judgment, because of Mr. Warburg's former German affiliations than because of the jealousy of certain men in high office who were his inferiors. So Mr. Warburg returned to New York and undertook the formation of the International Acceptance Bank. Not even here was this admirable character safe from partisan political attack by some of the demagogues in Congress; fortunately it was not within their power, as was said once by a distinguished French statesman of his enemies, to climb up to the lowest level of his contempt.

No one in a similarly influential position excelled Mr. Warburg in his feeling of responsibility to the public. Never was there a man who recognized more keenly the principle that wealth, like nobility, obliges. His generosity was without stint; his philanthropy ranged all over the world, and it was always intelligent, constructive, and farsighted. A patron of the arts, he never ceased to do what he could to advance the cultural development of the United States. There is hardly an office in this country which he could not have filled with distinction. As it was, his modesty made him shun proffered public contacts for which many another would have sought in vain. A leader among American Jews, it can truthfully be said of him that he set for his race in America an unsurpassable example of public service.

Speaking of Revolution . . .

By HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

"EIN feste Burg ist unser"—Waldorf. With the proud elegance of a set of Mr. Woolworth's most elegant pepper and salt shakers, the towers of St. Nip and St. Tuck rear their shining domes toward heaven, and downstairs a small army of New York's Best proclaims the fact that the cohorts of "Mother, Home, and Heaven" are about to save the Republic for the ninety-thousand-eight-hundred-and-seventy-fifth time since it was founded by a group of radicals, half of them foreign-born, who in their desire to upset the existing form of government by "violence" had not hesitated to accept the military assistance and the pecuniary support of at least four different foreign nations.

"Ein feste Burg ist unser"—Waldorf. Those who believe in the second coming of Christ had had their meeting in the morning. Those who believe in the second coming of George Washington were entitled to a little whoopee of their own in the evening. Telegrams were read from everybody, including the president of the defunct American Federation of Labor. I missed one from Calvin Coolidge. Perhaps that "Leader ohne Worte" is a cleverer politician than we have sometimes thought. If he is going to make a fool of himself, at least he is not going to do it in public.

I don't know why I should have drifted into that place. Perhaps it was the desire to see a dear old classmate who certainly has gone far in the world. Well, he had not changed much. Perhaps it was the desire to come once more face to face with the same type of men and women who had talked so charmingly over the teacups of St. Petersburg and Moscow in the years 1906 and 1907, and who had been so hopelessly, so pathetically unaware of the changes that were taking place all around them that they had finally destroyed their country's civilization through the sheer heavy weight of their own crass ignorance.

Perhaps it was the unholy and un-Christian wish to see all those good and honest patriots being forced to stand up and sit down and sing and applaud at the instigation of a highly industrious citizen of foreign extraction who would desert their holy cause at a moment's notice.

Alas, all the meddling and all the side-taking in foreign affairs of which these honest and well-intentioned patriots and patriotesses have been guilty ever since the beginning of the Great War have bestowed a very doubtful blessing upon us, of which the Republic had before been entirely free. I refer to the agent-provocateur. Was that the snake of whom General Harbord spoke in his opening words—words that showed that the gallant General was a pretty poor naturalist, for otherwise he would have known what our farmers think of people who kill harmless and useful snakes "by instinct"? I have good reason to doubt it. Those Daughters and Sons and Granddaughters of the profiteers who let the dear boys at Valley Forge starve because they preferred reliable English sovereigns to the doubtful American paper currency are a heaven-sent prey for all former Muscovite doorkeepers and imperial flunkys.

As I sat there I wondered where that great Gaelic chieftain was, who has panhandled these parts so successfully ever since the exigencies of the Great War forced him to give up his estates among the highlands of Caledonia and move to the sympathetic shores of the New World.

Those good people, then and there, were just about as sad a sight as I have seen since the afternoon some four years ago when I was invited to attend a tea in a stuffy old house not far from the rue de Rennes, and was obliged to sit on a little golden chair with one leg very precarious and listen to an amiable abbé who was explaining to his delighted audience that France would have a king in another six months.

After all, "Ein jedes Tierchen hat sein eigenes Pläsierchen." If 3,000 people want to spend an evening that way, that is none of my business and I don't have to join them if I don't want to. If 3,000 other people want to listen to Ham Fish, who tells them that "we will emerge from this depression within the next year," and are eager to applaud him for his courageous utterance, well, why not? Right across the street 3,000 other people go wild with enthusiasm when they are told that in January, 1933, all the proletarians of the world will have strawberries with cream for breakfast every morning. And still others go and listen to Bishop Manning assuring them that faith will move deficits. It is all in the day's work and the more nonsense the merrier.

But being by nature and inclination a fervent anti-Communist, I wish to high heaven that Mr. Fish and his little playmates would go in for bridge or backgammon or sin; in short, would find some other way to burn up their surplus energy. What they are doing now is merely to play the game of Moscow a little more successfully than anybody else. They are straining every muscle of body and soul to make Stalin victorious. They are setting themselves up as the most ardent apostles of the nefarious Marxian creed. For they are giving their own show away. They are revealing to the rest of the world just exactly how childish and foolish that "world on top" is which has governed us for all these many years.

Dear Ham, this was a respectable little Dutch city once upon a time and I should hate like the devil to see it become a smelly proletarian paradise. Please stop making speeches. Another five years of that sort of thing and you and your friends will have converted everybody in the whole country to the doctrines of the late and sainted Lenin. Or if you have to listen to your own rhetoric, why not deliver your orations in Congress? There at least they won't do any harm. For nobody will listen.

"We Are All Bolsheviks"

By LOUIS FISCHER

Baku, December, 1931

BAKU means "city of winds." I arrived on a day when a gale from the Caspian was raising the roofs off the houses. The next day was like spring. "Baku," Chicherin once said, "is a finger pointing to Asia." The foreign commissar had his eye on the shape of the narrow Apsheron peninsula, and also on its political significance. The finger is slightly bent and seems to beckon, rather than merely point, to Asia. What happens in Baku arouses the interest of the entire Turanian East. The echo of social, political, and cultural events in Baku reaches Turkey, Persia, Turkestan, Afghanistan, parts of China, and even the Arabic world. The Bolsheviks know this well. The First Congress of Eastern Peoples, at which Zinoviev summoned Islam to a holy war against imperialism, was appropriately held in Baku, in 1920.

Baku is the capital of the autonomous Soviet republic of Azerbaijan. The inhabitants of this little state are a cross between Tartar and Turkoman. The Russians call them Tiurks. Their language is cognate to Turkish. Persian influence also appears. Baku is Shiite. Its village hinterland is Sunnite. Is? Perhaps "was" would be more correct. Most of the mosques in the city are closed. In 1924, when I first visited Azerbaijan, Shaki-wakhsi, that wild Mohammedan dance which consists of mutual ecstatic mutilation with swords and whips, had been proscribed. But the followers of the prophet worshiped undeterred. Though the Bolsheviks were smashing Greek orthodoxy, Islam still escaped. Political expediency determined policy. Three years later I watched communism's first wary steps against Allah. Today the floodgates of atheism are wide open.

In Azerbaijan a nationality has been born, and the little child may lead Asia. The East was its mother; Revolution its father. Bolshevism acted the midwife, and is now beginning to serve as kindergartner. The lad learns quickly. I have seen him at his studies.

The Baku Pedagogical Institute. A cold, dirty, noisy building in the heart of Baku. In the spacious library students worked quietly and diligently. I asked to see books in the new Latin alphabet. The old arabesque-like cursive script has practically disappeared. Printing-shops have discarded it though Bolshevik Tiurks confessed that they still used the Arabic A B C in personal correspondence. The new alphabet is easy to learn. After it was introduced, the literate population jumped from 11 per cent of the total in 1921 to 31.4 per cent in 1931. On the library shelves I saw physics, chemistry, and mathematics textbooks in Latin type and Tiurkish language. But Marx has not yet been transliterated and translated. There were four volumes of Lenin; Russian has twenty-seven. I found Stalin's "Questions of Leninism," Upton Sinclair's "One Hundred Per Cent," Turgenev's "Rudin," in fact, many Russian classics and a few volumes of new Soviet literature. Very few Western European books and comparatively little modern Russian belles-lettres, however, are available in Latin-Tiurkish.

I watch a class of future village teachers. Most of the students are fresh from a countryside only recently released from feudalism. They and the teacher are Tiurks. I obtain permission to interrogate the class. Very few can speak Russian, and those who do, butcher it. I ask: "Does not concentration on Tiurkish as a language of instruction cut you off from the rest of the Soviet Union? Will it not be difficult for a physician, say, who has mastered medicine in Tiurkish to practice it anywhere except in Azerbaijan? Does it not limit your horizon and stimulate a nationalism which is separatist?"

They are just learning to think. In Tiurkish, nevertheless, they are eloquent. "Stalin," they all tell me, "has declared that the form of culture may be national while the content is socialistic." Only when we get down to an interpretation of this formula, do their minds begin to work. "Every ethnic unit," they say, "must have its own language and culture. We are to teach illiterates and poor peasants. We must know their language. We also study Russian—one hour a day. We want to have contact with the rest of the Union. Of course we lack sufficient printed matter in Tiurkish."

"Will not ignorance of Russian," I ask, "establish a bond between you and other Turanian lands rather than one with Russia?"

They point a Marxian gun at me. "Turkey, Persia, and other Turanian countries are bourgeois. Class interests connect us with Russia. Marx said, 'Proletarians of all countries, unite.' What if we cannot speak German or French? Our common economic aims and our membership in the same class make us brothers."

I precipitate a discussion of pan-Turanianism, and mention Enver Pasha. "It is a bourgeois movement," I hear, "by means of which the ruling classes stimulate patriotism and mislead the oppressed masses." By this time the three girls in a class of twenty-five have warmed to the issue and are participating animatedly in the debate. "Very well," I say, "you maintain that class is all-important. The proletariat must bridge the chasm of race and unite with the workers of all other nationalities. That is your education; books tell you that. But what about biology, feelings? Can you overcome the traditional Tiurkish hate for the Armenian, for instance?" (Before the revolution the Tiurks periodically massacred the Armenians in Baku, and periodically the Armenians massacred the Tiurks.)

I get categorical replies. The students contend that there is now a great deal of intermarriage, first between Russians and Jews on the one hand and Tiurks on the other—the three sisters of Barinov, Russian president of the Baku Oil Trust, for instance, have Tiurk husbands—and of late between Armenians and Tiurks. One young man says he has an Armenian wife.

Propagandists' School. Accompanied by a member of the Collegium of the Azerbaijan Commissariat of Education, a Tiurk, and by the Tiurkish director of the Baku Training School for Party Agitators, I go from class to class. These men and women will soon be Communist Party secretaries in villages or factories, or party organizers and propagandists. They are all Young Communists (Komsomols) and all Tiurks. I cross-examine one group for an hour and a half. I provoke them consciously. I want to see how much bolshevism these new Soviet intellectuals of a backward race have assimilated. Twenty students, among them six women, are seated around the sides of a room at old-fashioned slant-top desks. Everybody wears an overcoat. The women wear shawls around their heads. "Are you all against capitalism?" I begin.

"All."

"Weren't you too young to understand anything when capitalism still existed here? How do you know it is bad?"

"Capitalism means exploitation, unemployment."

"Yet three years ago you had considerable unemployment in the U. S. S. R. and America relatively little."

"Capitalism," they insist, "exposes the workers to the permanent threat of crises."

"Is this the last crisis of capitalism?"

Some say no, some yes. The crisis will end in war or revolution.

"But how can there be a revolution in America, for instance, when the Communist Party has only 15,000 members? Incidentally, can you explain why the party is so small when America has 10,000,000 unemployed?"

"The crisis will last long," is the synthetic reply. "The standard of living will drop. The workers will lose hope. They will then flock to the party. The American capitalist class encourages hatred between whites and blacks and between the skilled and unskilled in order to prevent proletarian unity. It will come, however."

I see that I am not getting far with this question, so I proceed. "You contend that capitalism is collapsing. The system is weak. How is it, then, that when the Soviet Government needs good machines it buys them from the foreign bourgeoisie? When a woman yearns for something fine to wear, she thinks of imported silk stockings and jersey jumpers from Germany. My suit is probably better than yours because it comes from abroad. Is that proof that capitalism is on its last legs?"

The first answer is from a girl. "The Five-Year Plan will put this country ahead industrially," she declares. "Then we too will produce quality commodities."

I agree, but that does not answer my question.

A young man: "We are just beginning to come out into the world. Whatever we wear, it is better than we or the like of us owned before the revolution."

I demand a more direct reply.

"Yes," one student ventures, "capitalism manufactures these goods, but who benefits? They are not for the masses."

I explain again: "How can you believe in the imminent fall of capitalism when it is still in a position to turn out objects which the Soviets covet and imitate?"

Finally the chap delivers an oration. "Will you tell us," he perorates, "why, though America can produce so well, she nevertheless has misery, wholesale unemployment, and widespread suffering? It is these social by-products of capitalism, and not these material goods-products, which are a measure of its strength and weakness." The class applauds.

I ask another: "When the Soviet Government places orders abroad it helps to solve capitalist problems. It relieves some unemployment. How is it that the Bolsheviks engage in such counter-revolutionary activity? I was under the impression that Moscow aimed to undermine capitalism."

"The Soviet Government," an eager young Tiurk asserted, "is taking as much as it can get from the bourgeoisie. It is buying from it the means of building up heavy industry so that next year or in the next Piatiletka we shall not be so dependent on foreign countries."

"But if you understand this, doesn't capitalism? Why, then, does the bourgeoisie help you build socialism?"

"Because capitalism has no plan. Firms compete with one another. They want a profit and take it wherever they can get it."

"And I had always thought that capitalists were class-conscious."

"They are. Nevertheless, their interest in their purse is greater than in their class."

I shift to another subject, the last. "Abroad they say there is no liberty in the Soviet Union. Is that true?"

A girl declares: "We have freedom to study. We did not have it before. We enjoy national autonomy in Azerbaijan, as do all nationalities in the U. S. S. R."

"Yes, but is there freedom of expression?"

"We have Soviet elections. Our newspapers are full of self-criticism."

"Now listen. Is there a bourgeoisie in Russia?"

"A sorry remnant," and all laugh.

"Are there kulaks?"

"Indeed, there are."

"Then why doesn't the bourgeoisie have its societies and meetings? Why can't the kulaks have their newspapers?" I saw smiles on many faces. Really, such questions sound queer in this country. A young woman with fiery eyes who had remained silent all the time raises her hand and offers to reply.

"This is a dictatorship of the proletariat," she says. "The workers and the peasants have liberty. We do not grant freedom to our enemies."

"Nevertheless," I interrupt, "capitalist countries permit foreign Communist parties to exist and to publish their organs."

"Because they are afraid to suppress them," she retorts. "They know the proletariat will protest."

Women's Ali Bairamov Club. A former millionaire's mansion. This institution is known throughout the East. It takes women who are illiterate or semi-illiterate and gives them first a general education (I saw arithmetic, geography, and elementary-physics groups), and then teaches them political science and the elements of a trade—typing, clerking, and the like. All free of charge. There is a crèche where they may leave their children during the study hours. The girls and women are for the most part wives or grown-up daughters of workers, government officials, artisans, ex-merchants, all of them non-Communist, usually housewives. I go from class to class. These women would have been harem slaves but for the revolution. Not a few are ravishing beauties with long arched eyebrows, long curled lashes, olive complexions, and big piercing eyes. They all wear scarves of Oriental coloring around their heads and shoulders, but none are veiled. Yet this scarf could serve as well. I notice that some girls occasionally cover their mouths with this draping.

Many of them speak Russian. They are city people. The male teacher is explaining Stalin's recent speech on industrial and labor reforms. At an appropriate moment I am granted a question period. Here, if anywhere, it seems, the family must have received a jolt from the revolution. "Do not the new Soviet laws," I ask, "the dropping of the veil, the abolition of harems, weaken the family?"

No response. Apparently, nobody has ever heard of the argument so common abroad. Some women make groping attempts at a reply. "Girls don't marry as young as they used to," I am told. "Even in the villages girls below sixteen, and in the cities below eighteen, are not permitted to marry. Before we had child marriage."

"Are there many divorces?"

"Yes, many."

I return to my original query. I say: "Parents now have less influence. The mosque has lost its power. Girls aren't given away in marriage any more. Doesn't this undermine the family as an institution?" It does not go over. I decide to try again in another classroom.

"Tell me," I demand of the second group, "what the Soviet regime gave you. Would you be better or worse off had there been no revolution?" I hear one Tiurkish word, one of the three I understand: "Worse." "Why?"

"The revolution gave us freedom. We can study. We do not have to wear the chadra [veil]."

It would be a pity indeed if some of these pretty faces were hidden. I ask: "How many of your mothers are literate?" Not one hand goes up. I cannot believe it. "None of your mothers can read or write in any language?"

"No, no, no."

"How many of you never wore veils?" Five hands rise. I count the number of girls and women in the room. Thirty-one. "How many discarded the veil after you commenced your studies in this club?" About half a dozen. There seems to be something wrong. The students are arguing with one another in Tiurkish. Now an interesting secret emerges. Fathers and husbands often object to the exposed face. Many girls wear the veil at home or even in the street and only lift it when they enter the clubhouse. The club does not permit them to veil themselves. The girls all assert, however, that none of them are convinced wearers of the veil. They veil to avoid trouble in the family.

"How many go to mosque?" Laughter.

"Mosques?" one woman exclaims. "Are there any open?"

An Evening at the Opera. Opera in the Tiurkish language. There are very few. "Carmen" is being translated. Tonight they play "Shah Ismail," an old, pre-war production adapted from the Persian and somewhat changed to suit the present. An emir's daughter kills her father because he will not allow her to marry the shah's son whom she loves and who loves her. This is the only "revolutionary" thread. It certainly is not proletarian literature, and it would be impossible in Moscow. The plot revolves around the shah, who dreams one night that his son will dethrone him and accordingly sends him to the battlefield. The hero is the fat, pudgy prince who sings in the typical falsetto wail-tone of the Arabs. He is applauded whenever he appears. For him the orchestra of Western instruments does not play. One musician accompanies him on a tar, a pearl-inset fiddle shaped like a gourd out of which has grown half a grapefruit. This the audience understands and loves. I had heard such music before in Cairo, in Jerusalem, in Bokhara. This is, at bottom, an Eastern people with an Arab-Moslem culture.

The audience is terribly noisy. The conductor taps two minutes for silence, and begins before he gets it. A constant buzz fills the auditorium. Out of the old religious habit, many men wear their round, flat caps. There is about one woman to every ten men in the audience. A nationality learning to walk culturally. That is my impression of the evening.

An Interview with Bunjat-Zade. Premier Bunjat-Zade, chairman of the Azerbaijan Council of People's Commissars, a veteran Tiurk Bolshevik, with a mutilated face which makes him look cross-eyed when he shows you three-quarters of it and normal-eyed when he turns all of it, said: "Ignorance of Russian does tend to weaken the bond with the rest of the Union. It is unfortunate that we lack many books in the new Latin script. Without Russian, students are hampered in their development. We must correct this error. We have gone to the other extreme. The pan-Turanian movement is no longer a danger to us. Russification aided it. Czarist designs on the Dardanelles had the same effect. Our intelligentsia used to be under Turkish influence. Religion was the greatest factor in determining the relations of the Tiurks to Turkey. Now Russification is dead. We do not want the Straits. We have our own universities, sixteen of them in Baku where there was none before the revolution. Religion is fading. We bar literature from Turkey. Kemal Pasha has abolished the fez. Women are discarding the veil in Turkey. Religion in Turkey feels the impact of Soviet atheism. We have reversed a historic process. Formerly light came to us from Turkey. Now our cultural influence spreads to Turkey. Azerbaijan industry is expanding by leaps and bounds, and the number of workers mounts each month. They are the best bond with the Union. The monarchy retarded the economic development of the empire's periphery. It used us as colonies, taking our raw materials but stunting manufactures. The Leninist national policy, on the other hand, gives free rein to autonomous economic growth. No, we do not discriminate against other nationalities. Armenians, Russians, Jews, Persians—all have their separate schools in their national tongues. In the central government offices 50 per cent of the officials are Tiurk, 35 per cent Russian, and 15 per cent Turkish. Russians are coming from the north, and they are welcome because we need trained people of all kinds. We receive subsidies from Moscow and Tiflis. We are backward. We must make up for time lost before the revolution. We therefore need outside assistance. But what if we are dependent on Moscow? That means that we are dependent on ourselves. We have our own division officered by Tiurks, and our own police. Under czarism, all village administrators were Russians. Now all are Tiurks. We need materials from other parts of the Union. There are also Russian troops here, but it is not like a British army. It is not an occupational army. We are all one. We are all Bolsheviks. Autonomous nationalism is the shell. The kernel is socialism."

The Disarmament Conference Meets*

By DAVID W. WAINHOUSE

IT is a mistake to speak of the disarmament conference as a single conference. It will be more nearly seven conferences rolled up in one. There will be conferences on land armament, naval armament, air armament, and chemical armament; conferences on the methods of limitation, on the problem of supervision, and on the political foundations underlying an arms-limitation agreement.

The conference will be the most panoramic, ambitious, and sweeping international congress ever attempted in history. There is nothing remotely comparable to it, and this is said with due regard for the magnitude of the Versailles conference in 1919, which was, to be sure, a vast affair, but restricted in scope. It did not include neutrals, enemies, or Soviets, and dealt with matters confined to a relatively limited geographical area. The present conference will involve not merely three nations or five nations, as have previous international assemblies on this subject, but fifty-two nations; not only members of the League or of the general community of Western Powers, but non-League members as well and Soviet Russia, with interests, needs, traditions, prejudices, and problems as conflicting and as varied as the society of nations can offer.

The query then arises: If it took three nations—the United States, Great Britain, and Japan—a decade to reach a mere stabilization accord on naval armaments, where the main factors of comparison are relatively simple, and that at a very high figure, what is going to happen with fifty-two nations trying to reach an agreement on seven broad lines at the General Conference? Without venturing a definite answer, it is sufficient to say that the task before the conference is one which cannot be solved in a single session or by a single agreement. It will be a recurrent conference, for whatever it accomplishes in this first session, much will be left undone. In the present state of political tension in Europe, it will not attempt to bite off too much. The feeling on the part of many foreign offices is to proceed by stages, and these necessarily must be spread over a long period of time. In this sense the disarmament conference must be regarded as the first universal step in arms limitation and reduction.

The delegates who will gather at Geneva will deliberate on the terms of reference set out in a skeleton-draft convention for the limitation and reduction of armaments. The draft is of a most preliminary sort, yet it took nearly four years of the Preparatory Commission's time to evolve it. The debates which ensued during the growth of this draft foreshadow the lines of policy which the nations will take at the conference.

Military Personnel. The armies, or land effectives as they are technically known, of nations are either professional, conscript, or a combination of both. The United States, Great Britain, and Germany are examples of nations which possess the professional type; France, Italy, Japan, Poland, and the Little Entente have conscript armies. The professional type is costly, and since it carries a long period of enlistment—three years in the United States, twelve years in Germany, and twelve years in Great Britain—it is said to be more efficient in proportion to its size than the conscript type. The latter consists of men who are called to the colors for a limited period of time and then pass on to civilian life as "trained reserves," subject to call for further service to keep in training or for active service in time of war. While those nations which are on the "professional" system maintain armies more or less fixed in number, a conscript system enables a country to build up a large reserve force.

The important question arises whether "trained reserves" should be included in estimating the military strength of a nation. It is natural that the governments with the professional type should want to count "trained reserves" in calculating that strength, as well as to limit their number. France and her conscriptionist allies have refused to yield and in fact have won a preliminary skirmish by persuading Great Britain to abandon her opposition. The United States, in principle, has stood for reckoning "trained reserves," but she too abandoned opposition because she felt the matter was of no immediate concern to her interests as a military Power. The issue of whether "trained reserves" are to be counted and limited in a nation's armed strength will arise to plague the conference, for Germany has given notice that she will sign no arms agreement which leaves other nations free to build up a military reserve while she herself remains bound to observe the disabilities imposed upon her in this respect by the Treaty of Versailles.

Land Armaments. The difficulty here arises over the method of limitation. Should land armaments be limited directly, that is, by enumeration—so many rifles, so many tanks, so many horses, so many guns—or should they be limited indirectly, that is, by fixing the amounts each nation is to spend? The limitation of land armaments will be more affected by European political considerations than will any other technical subject at the conference. Direct limitation stops competition in quantity, but it places a premium on quality. One need only illustrate this by citing the example of the Ersatz-Preussen type of cruiser. In spite of the direct limitation of armaments imposed upon Germany by the Treaty of Versailles, she has, nevertheless, by the ingenuity of her marine engineers, succeeded in setting afloat a 10,000-ton cruiser stronger than any other on the seas. Indirect limitation shifts the emphasis from quality to quantity. The most effective method is a combination of the direct and indirect.

The voting in the Preparatory Commission revealed that the United States was the only great Power opposed to budgetary limitation in any form. Russia, Germany, and Italy, while opposed to budgetary limitation alone, favored it in combination with direct limitation.

As for material in reserve, notwithstanding the fact that Article VIII of the League of Nations Covenant obliges all League members "to interchange full and frank information as to the scale of their armaments, their military, naval, and air programs, and the condition of such of their industries as are adaptable to warlike purposes," France, Poland, Japan, the Little Entente, and several others have refused so far to honor this obligation. They say that to reveal their military stores would reveal their strength or weakness to the whole world, and this is militarily undesirable. Holland alone has revealed information concerning her military stores, and the United States is willing to exchange full and frank information even though she is not a member of the League. Those who are against publicity are so sensitive about the subject that they will attempt to keep it from reaching the conference. Yet it is a matter of vital concern, for if a nation's active material is limited and its reserve is not, limitation becomes nonsense.

* A second article by Mr. Wainhouse, America's Role at the Conference, will appear next week.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Naval Armaments. The United States will endeavor to keep the naval Powers—Great Britain, particularly—from reopening the naval problem anew. She feels that the Washington and London treaties have settled this until 1936, when another naval conference is due to be held. The task at Geneva in February, the United States contends, will be to fit, as far as possible, the non-signatories into the framework of the London treaty, that is, to solve primarily the problem of Franco-Italian naval parity. The British government, however, has made it known that it will press for a reduction in the size of capital ships. If our professional sailors resist, the United States government will place itself in the position of being the lone defender of these costly floating fortresses.

Air Armaments. The problem of aerial armament will be one of the most perplexing in the conference. It arises because of the relation between civil and military aviation. All are agreed that in any limitation of air armaments it is essential to avoid hampering the development of civil aviation. The difficulty in divorcing the military from the civil may be seen from the purposes expressed in "The Fundamental Naval Policy of the United States": "to give every encouragement to civil aviation with a view to advancing the art and to providing aviators and aircraft-production facilities available for war." The laws of gravitation make no distinction between a bomb dropped from a commercial plane and one dropped from a military plane. Civil aircraft obviously should not be limited, yet a commercial plane is as potential a bomber as a military plane. The futility of the merely technical approach to the limitation of armaments is nowhere so apparent as in the matter of aerial armaments. A mere agreement on the size, number, and horse-power of military airplanes would amount to just a nibbling at the problem.

Chemical Armaments. A chemist once said that disarmament means no more military parades. He meant by that that chemical warfare and its vast potential use in future wars will displace "visible" armaments. Here is a branch of warfare which cannot possibly be reached directly by international agreement, because it is so closely interlocked with scientific development and industries of peace. Chlorine is used for bleaching, yet it is a potential weapon in itself and the mother of many others. The idea that any agreement can be drafted during peace times which will hold when nations are in the clutches of war hysteria, and which will force them to obey gentlemanly rules of conduct in refraining from the use of these weapons, is a chimera. In the annual report of the Secretary of War for 1930, page 126, we find this statement which is typical of war departments all over the world: "It would, moreover, be an extremely hazardous policy to rely on an international agreement as a complete protection against chemical attack. In a death struggle for existence, there would always be the danger that a nation in dire straits would resort to chemical weapons if it saw in that agency the means of escaping defeat and achieving victory."

The problem of finding a solution for chemical armaments, like that of air and other armaments, will not be solved so long as nations insist that they are the sole judges of the raison d'être of armaments.

The Problem of Supervision. The idea of supervising the kind and amount of armaments which a nation possesses is so novel to states afflicted with the sovereignty complex that it is astonishing that the Preparatory Commission should have succeeded in laying the foundation for the creation of a Permanent Disarmament Commission the duty of which will be to watch over the execution of the disarmament convention when and if it comes into force. That such a commission will be very necessary all states now agree. This is a matter of the highest importance, for it contemplates continuous supervision of the state of world armaments. The duties of the Permanent Commission will be to collect, collate, and disseminate information on armament and to follow the execution of the arms agreement. The commission is to hear complaints by any signatory of a violation of the treaty, to investigate, and to report its findings, for any violation of the provisions of the agreement is declared to be a matter of concern to all the contracting parties.

This is the most constructive proposal which the Preparatory Commission has evolved in its four years of deliberation. Armament is the highest manifestation of a nation's conceit, and a definite preliminary agreement to subject it to some form of control is revolutionary. It is a beginning in the right direction.

Political Issues. Difficult as are the technical problems, those on the political side present even graver difficulties. Politics arose at the Washington conference in 1921-22, at the London naval conference in 1930, and nothing short of a miracle can prevent it from arising at the General Disarmament Conference in 1932. In fact, France has already announced to the world the principles which will guide her armament delegation. They are set forth in a most elaborate memorandum to the League of Nations, issued on July 21, 1931, in a manner so clear and logical that there can be no mistaking her attitude. It constitutes the classic expression of the "security-school" thesis. To her, the conference affords the greatest opportunity for organizing peace in terms of security. If the nations of the world stand ready to offer each other pledges of mutual assistance in case of aggression, progress in the reduction of armaments is assured. But if the nations insist on transforming the conference into a class in arithmetic—a mere mechanical gun-for-gun pruning—France and her allies will keep what they have and even ask for more.

The problem of armaments can scarcely be touched without raising the fundamental question of the policy of states, for weapons exist to enable a nation to support its policies. These policies very often conflict with those of other states. It explains why every disarmament conference degenerates into an armament conference. Progress in the solution of the problem of armaments, therefore, demands the reconditioning of these conflicting interests of the different states.

A nation's insistence on security may be satisfied by piling up armaments which give it a superiority over its neighbors; or the desire for security may be satisfied with a positive assurance of international support in case of aggression. The first alternative contributed to the disaster of 1914. While nations in general are agreed that the limitation and reduction of armaments is a program for international reform, they are not agreed as to what organization, if any, they will build, instead of huge armaments, to give them this security against aggression. It is here that we reach the cleavage between the Latin way of organizing peace and the Anglo-Saxon.

The primary issue which will transcend all others at the conference will be whether the "organization of peace" is to proceed along the lines set out by those who believe that wars cause arms or by those who believe that arms cause wars. Stating it roughly in another way, the "wars-cause-arms" school, sometimes labeled the "security" school, regards armaments as a symptom and not the disease of the international body politic. To reduce armaments, it argues, it is first of all necessary to eradicate the disease. The "arms-cause-wars" school, sometimes called the "disarmament" school, regards armaments as the disease and wars as a symptom. To lessen the occurrence of war, this school holds, it is first of all necessary to reduce armaments. What is disease to one school is a symptom to the other, and vice versa. The history of the disarmament movement in the past decade has been an interplay of these two schools of thought.

It is true that the adherents of one school or the other are primarily influenced by their respective national policies. Thus, the idea of the reduction of armaments is basically the problem of the organization of peace, and as such it involves not only the recasting of the military systems of the world, but the reconditioning of national policies as well.

Johnson for President?

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, January 23

HIRAM JOHNSON'S investigation of foreign loans and the resulting predicament of the State Department continue to occupy the center of the capital stage. Without a single assistant, and despite much furtive obstruction, the doughty Hiram has uncovered a series of financial and political scandals that are attracting almost as much public interest as those which attended the oil leases. The high point attained thus far was the disclosure that the State Department successfully exerted pressure on American bankers to complete a $20,000,000 loan to Colombia while successfully pressing the Colombian government to restore the vast Barco oil concession to a syndicate controlled by the Mellon-owned Gulf Oil Corporation. With his inimitable talent for doing the worst possible thing in the worst possible way at the worst possible time, Secretary Stimson withheld from the Senate investigating committee correspondence, touching these two subjects, which had passed between the State Department and the American legation in Colombia. However, apparently perceiving that this blunder fell somewhat short of perfection, he reconsidered and produced parts of the messages which related solely to the loan, but deleted those parts in which the loan was connected with the oil concession, explaining his decision on the following grounds: (1) that it would be "contrary to the public interest" to disclose those particular parts, and (2) that they already had been "accurately and fully" disclosed in the testimony of Assistant Secretary White! The methods employed to unload hundreds of millions of shaky foreign securities in this country—always with the assent of the State Department—cannot be fully appreciated without hearing some of the stories privately related to Johnson by officials of small-town banks. Not only were they informed bluntly by powerful New York bankers that certain numbers of bonds were being "reserved" for them, but some of them declare that national-bank examiners quietly suggested it would be wise to "diversify" their holdings by purchasing such bonds. There is no doubt that the failure of many small banks is largely attributable to the purchase of bonds which later became practically worthless.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■

IT must be obvious by now that Hiram's spectacular success with the investigation is not diminishing his availability as an opponent of Hoover for the Presidential nomination. Politicians know that letters from the people constitute a reliable barometer of public interest and sentiment, and just now the volume of congratulatory mail received by Johnson exceeds that of any ten men in the Senate. The truth is that within a month the Californian has succeeded in getting his hands on two of the liveliest political issues in the United States—debt cancellation and foreign loans. He has dramatized himself as the champion of American isolation, and anyone who minimizes the force of the isolationist and nationalistic spirit now sweeping this country is blind. Whether or not to enter the Republican primaries against Hoover is a question on which Johnson is postponing a decision. Competent observers agree that he would have no difficulty in carrying California over its itinerant other son, that he would sweep Illinois, Indiana, and probably Pennsylvania, to say nothing of Minnesota and North Dakota. It is true that victories in the States having Presidential primaries would still leave him far short of a majority in the convention, but the psychological effect on delegates from other States would be tremendous. The consideration really deterring him is the fear that he might succeed in eliminating Hoover, only to have the convention plump for someone like Dawes or Coolidge, who would have a chance to win the election. Doubtless it is the same consideration which impels dozens of standpat Republicans, including many of the leaders, to besiege him daily with entreaties to become a candidate. Borah could accomplish the same results, but if either runs, it will, in my judgment, be Johnson. Senator Norris is thoroughly convinced that Governor Roosevelt will be the Democratic nominee and that he will beat Hoover, and he is opposed to disturbing that picture. Uncle George is always interested in the ultimate objective.

* * * * *

THE La Follette-Costigan bill, providing for a federal appropriation of $375,000,000 to be distributed among the States for unemployment relief before July 1, 1933, has been favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Manufactures, thus setting the stage for what promises to be one of the bitterest battles of the session. It is an exceptionally thoughtful and well-drawn measure, under which 40 per cent of the money would be allotted to the several States in proportion to their respective populations, the remaining 60 per cent constituting a reserve fund to be apportioned among the States on the showing that local resources were not sufficient to meet the needs. It establishes careful standards of expenditure and administration for the States, and intrusts federal administration to a board that would be headed by that enlightened, sympathetic, and indefatigable public servant, Miss Grace Abbott, chief of the Children's Bureau. Nevertheless, if the Quaking Quaker adheres to the same blind attitude he has heretofore maintained toward all measures intended to relieve anyone except banks, railroads, insurance companies, and similar mendicants, the cry of "dole" will be raised promptly and the fight will be on. I am not so certain he will raise it. Having just sponsored and approved a $2,000,000,000 dole to the very people who created the present situation, he may hesitate to oppose a smaller dole to its victims.

* * * * *

BUT notwithstanding how often he trims his policies to the political winds, poor Mr. Hoover may always be trusted to get in trouble through his appointments. The latest demonstration is his nomination of Thad Brown for the federal Radio Commission, and of District Judge Wilkerson for the federal Circuit Court of Appeals. Brown is a political hack from Ohio, whose chief distinction is that he was a "Hoover man" in 1920, when the Great Shifter was a candidate for the Presidential nomination on both the Republican and Democratic tickets. During his tenure as chief counsel for the Radio Commission much of his time has been spent in composing and delivering political speeches. Members of the present commission are against him, openly or covertly. Senator Jim Couzens warned Hoover in characteristically vigorous language that Brown would not be confirmed by the Senate, but with his peculiar genius for rejecting advice from those best qualified to give it, the President sent in Brown's name. His confirmation is extremely doubtful and can be accomplished only after a struggle in which he and Hoover will sustain grievous wounds. The appointment cannot be explained on any rational ground except a desire to insure Republican control of the radio during the coming Presidential campaign. Judge Wilkerson has two claims to general fame—that he sentenced Al Capone to prison, and that he issued the notorious injunction against the striking railway shopmen. It was Harry Daugherty who got him on the bench and it was Daugherty who got him to issue the injunction in the shopmen's strike. As a matter of fact, he has issued injunctions more drastic in character. Before the Senate Judiciary Committee finishes, it may be possible to give a report of his conduct in the Capone case which will upset the popular impression. The promised inquiry into his practice of appointing receivers for large corporations should provide still more interesting revelations. Heroes are all right, but let us know the stuff they are made of.

Of Two Eternities

By ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

In the City

The fancy new apartments on our street were not thought finished till men set in trees and laid a two-foot lawn around the walls with tiles of turf; there fences iron pronged soon made it safe for grass and flowers to grow.
The builders did not put them there for love or any such good reason that I know but as an extra that the architect threw in for which they'd fetch a double in the rent.

The trees were little; you could count the leaves, could shut a girl's hand round their slender trunks;
yet somehow, in their sight, the stones looked frail.
The pillars tired, the arches faint, their strength but an arrested falling-down, a being caught upon a ray of gravitation.
Beside this stayed collapse, the springing trees with their up thrust ambitiously brushed sky.
So too the living grass so young, strong, green,
paled grayer with its green the slabs of mortar;
made them seem overleavened cakes of dust,
a tap would some day brittle and puff out.
The tree, the grass, these are the permanent.
Their seeds, like bombs, in time will toss the stones.

In the Country

We had a spring, a good walk from the house,
we used to draw from when the well went dry.
It had been cased in stone and boarded over.
The cracks were wide enough for doors for frogs;
and rotwood splinters, crumbs of rust dropped in,
and scrapings from our soles; all these impured
the water and came forth on us in boils.

We dipped it out and with a strong cement of granite gravel a thick cover made.
Its curb stood solid over dropping grass, dead limbs beside it from a dying tree,
and hollow nuts, and more aborted life
of seeds dried in the husk or eaten out.

This lid was not more than three feet across;
a few steps off, sight lost it under trees.
Yet in that molded stone I saw a town and saw a town's persistence and its strength:
the will of man who has domesticated stone till roads breed villages, villages towns.

Starvation and the "Reds" in Kentucky

By OAKLEY JOHNSON

PINEVILLE is the county seat of Bell County, adjoining Harlan County, where occurred the bitter United Mine Workers' strike last spring. The leadership of the United Mine Workers disavowed the strike, and the hundreds of blacklisted Harlan miners, thus deserted and without resources, were given relief for over half a year by the National Miners Union. The latter has proceeded to organize the miners not only of Harlan County but of all Kentucky and Tennessee, and as a result a second strike, much more extensive than the Harlan affair, was called January 1, involving not only Harlan but Bell, Knox, Whitley, and other counties, with at least 10,000 miners answering the call.

The Harlan County operators and officials met the original strike with gun thugs and terror. In Bell County, despite a more favorable sentiment among the people generally, and despite an organization of strike activities so thorough that attack on the strike itself is difficult, a second terror, less open but more insidious, is getting under way. The fact that the National Miners Union is Communist-led gives the local officials, controlled as they are by the operators, opportunity to bring in the bogies of "atheism" and "foreigners" and to use the statute on criminal syndicalism in an attempt to imprison for long terms not merely those alleged to have counseled specifically violent resistance to mine deputies, as in the Harlan court cases, but those who are organizing the strike, giving relief to the miners' families, reporting the progress of the strike to the Communist periodicals, or even defending in court the organizers and relief workers who have been arrested—on the ground that one and all are Communist and therefore violators of the statute.

The chief of police of Pineville, Pearl Osborne, with his deputies, raided the National Miners Union headquarters on January 4 and arrested nine persons—six women and three men—holding them on a search warrant only, individual warrants being made out afterward when the defendants had given their names. Two were news reporters—Ann Barton of the Federated Press and Vern Smith of the Daily Worker; two were managers of the Workers' International Relief—Clarina Michelson and Norma Martin. Allan Taub, an attorney from the International Defense who came specifically to defend the nine arrested persons, was also arrested within two hours after he arrived, bringing the total to ten. The others were John Harvey, V. Komenovich, Julia Parker, Dorothy Ross Weber, and Margaret Fontaine. All were charged with criminal syndicalism.

On Tuesday, January 5, a crowd of 5,000 striking miners came to town to attend the preliminary hearing, and Judge Van Beber for this reason adjourned the hearing until Thursday. On that day nearly 10,000 miners came. Again the hearing was adjourned to Saturday; in order to dodge the working-class audience, an attempt was made to "slip the hearing over" on Friday instead, but the defendants and their local attorneys refused to be tricked. Thousands again gathered Saturday, and the hearing was postponed until Tuesday, January 12. This time the hearing went through.

David J. Bentall, Chicago lawyer, had come to assist the defense. Allan Taub, himself a prisoner though released on the second day, took part in the defense, as did also W. F. Stone, Dell Bingham, and F. Taylor, local attorneys. The prosecuting attorney, Walter B. Smith, was assisted—as the prosecution admitted during the second session, when Allan Taub demanded an explanation—by N. Reed Patterson, legal representative of the operators. Judge Van Beber, as reported by a local paper, had already remarked that the prisoners would "have a hard time getting out of jail," and he was right. He himself overruled all objections by the defense, and the nine defendants were bound over to the grand jury.

FROM THE COURTHOUSE STEPS

Returning from a quick lunch during the noon intermission, I stood a moment on the square at the north entrance of the courthouse, looking around at the town. On the west, so close as almost to lean over us, was Pine Mountain; on the other side, not quite so near or so high, were the Cumberland foothills. At the very bottom of this gigantic gully were the held-in homes of the 3,500 inhabitants of Pineville, and in the midst of the houses was the courthouse.

I walked around toward the south entrance. A stocky, fattish, well-dressed man—it was J. Matt Pursiful, county clerk and member of the American Legion—was standing on the concrete wall which formed one side of the courthouse steps. He was reading from a pamphlet, Phil Bard's "No Jobs Today," and before him were four or five hundred miners, ragged, dirty, gaunt, listening to him.

"This was part of the literature found in the raid," he was explaining. "I just thought I'd read this to you so you'd see what it was, and know what it was. I'm not advocating or condemning," he added, in response to a murmur from the crowd, "I'm just reading it."

"The workers . . . class-conscientious," he read, stumblingly, obviously unfamiliar with the term class-conscientious. "'Class-conscientious'—we all know what conscientious means from the war," he interposed, "conscientious objectors." Then he continued: "This book . . . shows the price we pay. . . . 'The wealthy parasites . . . close down their factories and throw us out on the street to starve. . . .'" I thought the speaker's voice was a bit self-conscious as he read this. The men and women in the crowd, so obviously described by the pamphlet, were grimly silent. "'The Russian workers and farmers threw off the rule of . . . capitalism . . . by establishing their own workers' and farmers' Sovish'" —the reader stumbled again, and repeated—"Sovish Government.'" He showed pictures in the booklet. Then he read the final page: "'Don't starve—Fight!'"

"Amen to that!" came from several women in the crowd. A woman near me, young and blue-eyed but thin and ragged, said grimly to another woman, "I'm ready for it! Can't the women fight too?"

The crowd had been very quiet. Now and then a short laugh, as the sentences of the pamphlet, speaking of the lack of jobs, struck home. As the speaker finished, he repeated that he wasn't taking sides, he just wanted to show the people there what the literature of these reds was really like. He added persuasively: "I know I'm satisfied with this country, and I think all of you are. I think we all like America better than any foreign country, and we don't want any revolutionary [sic] here. We don't need any revolutionary here. And I just wanted you to see what the literature said. That's all I've got to say."

As he stepped down a young miner, Jim Garland, one of the strike leaders, stood up. He was a mere boy, in grimy working clothes. "Comrades and brothers," he began, but the previous speaker and a deputy stopped him. "We really hadn't ought to have radical speeches on the court lawn when there's a trial going on inside," the beefy clerk said, persuasively. Garland hesitantly desisted. The crowd, patient and resigned, but distrustful, moved into the courthouse, hoping to squeeze into the tiny room where hearings for their strike leaders were being held.

WHAT THE OPERATORS SAY

The psychological attitudes of the residents of Bell County, both owners and workers, must be understood before the situation can be viewed as a whole. Pineville must be allowed to speak for itself.

The first man I interviewed was Herndon Evans, editor of the Pineville Sun, county chairman of the Red Cross, and share-owner in a mine or two. Evans is a ruddy-faced, somewhat fleshy, rather phlegmatic man who has "public spirit" and "sympathy" for the poor. He swung around heavily in a swivel chair, in his office opposite the jail, and asked me to sit down.

"What do you think of actual conditions of the miners?" I asked.

"Well," he began, "we must get at the underlying facts. We must not simply exaggerate conditions, as Theodore Dreiser and Charles Rumford Walker did, taking pictures of miners' homes in places where the mines have changed hands ten times since the war. The coal business has been very severely hit. Oil, electricity, and other substitutes for coal have decreased the market. Machinery has reduced the amount of labor needed—the improved tippie, for example, which used to load only four or five cars a day but now loads forty or fifty. The biggest coal tippie in the world is in Lynch, Harlan County, owned by the United States Steel interests. We don't need as many miners now. During the war there were ninety-eight mines operating, last year there were only forty-two, and this year there are thirty-nine. The Liberty Coal and Coke Company of this county went bankrupt four days ago. If the strike continues a month longer, at least two more companies will go bankrupt. I favor a back-to-the-farm movement for the unemployed miners."

"I admit that the miners don't make enough to live," he said, "haven't been making enough. If anyone wants to buy a mine cheap, they can buy one here in Bell County. The farm proposition will solve it. These Bell and Harlan miners can live on less than any other people in the world."

"How about the gun-thug business?" I asked. "It is charged that the operators hire mine guards many of whom have prison records, that these guards are deputized, and that they beat up and threaten miners, raid homes, and otherwise terrorize the strikers."

This was not a welcome question, but Mr. Evans was ready with his answer. He pictured the operator facing losses, keeping his mines going to give the workers jobs—"he doesn't want to have a lot of starving miners on his hands"—and suddenly faced with a strike and with pickets who are determined to keep scabs from working. "He decides to fight it out. So he calls in his loyal workers and gets the county judge or county sheriff to appoint them special officers. But he also has to get some hard-boiled fellows who won't be scared out, especially if there's any shooting. The shooting in 98 per cent of the instances starts on the part of the men who won't work. The operator has to have men known as 'men who will stand hitched,' and who mean it when they shoot back. But there are only a few real thugs, maybe ten or twelve, in all Harlan County. They might have killed a man sometime in the past. Bill Randolph, maybe, is one—he's killed three or four men. But the reports are exaggerated. The miners call any mine guard a thug."

Although these statements, coming baldly from one of Pineville's most prominent citizens, were acutely interesting to me, I had nevertheless largely expected them. But I was curious to learn the local attitude toward the official and "legal" attacks on the miners and their union.

"Well," Mr. Evans responded, "we think we can handle the situation ourselves. There's been a world of Communist literature spread around here. Outsiders are coming in and trying to develop red sentiment."

"But about the legal side of it," I interrupted, "and the arrests of relief workers and attorneys?"

"They're all Communists," he said; "we found the literature on them. They're all reds. They all make speeches to the miners. The lawyer, Taub, belongs to the International Labor Defense, and that's a Communist organization. They mislead the ignorant miners. They are here for their own purposes. They don't have near enough resources to take care of all those men on strike."

"Is the Red Cross, as is charged, denying help to the families of miners on strike?" I asked.

"Why, we must have some policy. I'm chairman of the Red Cross in this county. We have to check up whether people deserve help or not, and of course we call the operators to know whether a miner who asks for help has been working or not. And we have women who know them report on them. We have to check in different ways. And of course we can't encourage the strike. We have a lot of poor to look after, regularly. We made it a policy—a local policy, whether it is in conformity with the national organization or not—when men on strike came to us for aid, to turn them down because of limited funds. Of course if a mine goes bankrupt, as one did the other day with 400 families, we take care of them. But we tell the men on strike that they'd better go back to work, even if there is water in the mines and conditions aren't what we'd like to have them."

"Maybe the criminal-syndicalism law," he concluded, "is a weak law, but our officials are going to use it to break up communism."

I thanked Mr. Evans and went to the offices of N. Reed Patterson, legal representative of the local coal operators and of some of the outside interests. Mr. Patterson is perhaps fifty years old, or nearly that, but he is agile and dapper, slightly under medium size—the city man in a provincial town, the liberal “front” to a highly conservative combination of governmental and mine-owning forces. He had already, as I learned from the prisoners and as he told me himself, offered personally to go bail for Allan Taub and to furnish him the hospitality of his home, and to undertake the defense of Julia Parker separately from the other defendants, because she was “so young and different.” He was pained when both refused. Yet on the following day—if I may anticipate—while the hearing was on, and Patterson was running from Judge Van Beber to Prosecutor Walter B. Smith and back, offering whispered suggestions and answering whispered questions scores and scores of times, Allan Taub demanded of the judge that the defense be informed of the status of Reed Patterson in the hearing, and Patterson, flushed and angered, himself replied that he was working with the prosecution and was a part of it, and the defendants “would certainly find it out.”

But in his office the preceding day Mr. Patterson was affable and kindly during the interview. He admitted that the condition of the miners was “more or less distressing.” The miners have been “working only two or three days a week.” He told of the $16,000 in Middlesboro and the $6,000 in Pineville which had been raised to “relieve actual suffering,” and denied that relief had been refused to the families of strikers “except where the relief would simply help the strike.” He countered my questions with the declaration that the Communists had “seized upon the bad situation of the mines to impress the ignorant miners with the idea that they are in a state of peonage.” He branded as false the declaration that gun thugs had been imported to act as guards and deputies.

About the right of miners to unionize he was eloquent. “Of course I believe in unions,” he said. “I believe every miner in this county should be a member of the United Mine Workers of America. The operators made a mistake when they fired all the miners who joined the United Mine Workers last spring, and I told them so. But they wouldn’t listen to me. What I think is this: Let the United States government gather up all the reds and put them in jail, and then gather up Morgan and Mellon and Rockefeller and Ford and the other big Eastern bankers and put them right in with the reds, and the country would get along a great deal better.”

I talked with Prosecutor Walter B. Smith and Judge George Van Beber together in the Prosecutor’s office. The Judge had little to say. He is a quiet, sleek, well-fed man of perhaps fifty, shrewd chiefly in his determination to rely wholly on Smith and Patterson for legal direction.

Mr. Smith is a young, almost ascetic-looking man, so thin as to seem tall although he is of medium height, an effect accentuated somewhat by his habit of carrying his head slightly stooped sidewise when walking about, as though he bent to hear the talk of short men. His main contribution to the technique of the prosecution was the injection of the religious issue. At the first appearance of the prisoners in court he had asked Taub, when the oath was to be given, “Do you believe in God?” and had insisted on an answer for an hour or more.

“If he doesn’t believe in God, how can he take the oath?” he asked me, when I commented on the unusualness of this question. “If a man doesn’t believe in a Supreme Being, he couldn’t make any statement on which you could rely.”

About the conditions of the miners Smith said there would have to be “an economic readjustment.” “It’s impossible,” he asserted, “for the companies to pay a living wage. It’s pathetic that the miners, many of them, are in this situation, but it can’t be helped.” “I’m in favor of organized labor,” he continued. “The miners elected me to office. But I’m opposed to any organization opposed to God, or that believes in strikes, riots, sabotage, bloodshed, and in bringing this about by establishing a form of government, with a world capital at Moscow, that would stamp out the democratic government we have.”

Mr. Smith assumed the responsibility for calling in the dozen or so armed deputies from Harlan County at the time set for the first hearing of the defendants in Pineville, which hearing had been postponed because of the crowd of 5,000 miners present, declaring that it was rumored the crowd intended to release the defendants. The presence of these gunmen, with a machine-gun as well as their revolvers, on the courthouse steps the preceding week had been a new event in Bell County history. But Mr. Smith obviously regarded any irregularity of this sort as excusable when Religion and Our Government were under attack.

In the Driftway

THE old West, which the Drifter consigned to a dead past a few weeks ago with appropriate sad words, will not down. And the Drifter admits that the following communication from Fresno, California, carries encouraging conviction.

DEAR DRIFTER: I see that your able correspondent, “A Dude Wrangler’s Wife,” leaves you still unconvinced that the real West anywhere survives. Let me add my bit of testimony. Twenty-four miles from this city of some 52,000 people is a cattle ranch of 15,000 acres run by a friend of mine. He and his family live in old adobe buildings that were erected in 1851 and served briefly as a United States army post. The ranch is all up-and-down country, lightly timbered with oak and scrub pine. The San Joaquin River runs through the middle of it a hundred yards in front of the ranch-house. Charlie, my friend, often runs 1,500 or more head of cattle on his broad acres, and generally seventy or so head of saddle stock. The range is ridden as it always was, and will always have to be, for the country is too rough to get over except on a horse or on foot—and try to imagine a cattleman walking more than forty yards! Roping, branding, breaking colts, in short, all the old activities of the range, go on just as they always did. The boots, the blue jeans, the silver-mounted bridles and spurs, the chaps (absolutely necessary in deer-brush country), the ten-gallon hats, all are unchanged. And the dude still is a “contemptible tenderfoot,” though Charlie doesn’t mind renting him a plug to ride of a Sunday afternoon.

When I first made Charlie’s acquaintance he viewed my English riding boots and “choke-bore pants” with unconcealed disgust. He found, however, that I could stay on a horse even in wild pursuit over broken ground. And when I rode forty miles with him one day in blazing heat to hunt for a lost cow, and he discovered in me a natural gift for profanity and an unregenerate liking for plug tobacco of one of the stronger varieties, the conquest was complete. Since then I have been one of the inner circle, though I'll admit that Grant, the Indian colt-breaker, greatly, and justly, outranks me.

Nor is this ranch exceptional. The foothills of the Sierras shelter hundreds of such establishments, and so does the wilder, drier, and rougher Coast Range. As you may be aware, there is a great difference between, say, the Texan tradition, equipment, and method and the Californian, as there is between the Californian and that of Wyoming. Here the flavor is almost wholly Mexican, and I am assured by much older men than myself that it remains practically uncontaminated by modernity.

* * * *

THE Drifter did not mean to imply that the ranch and the range no longer exist. He could lead the way himself to cattle ranges where the "rodeer" is as real today as it was fifty years ago. He could also lead the way, though no cattleman would follow him, to thousands of "up-and-down" acres of sheep country where men and methods are as leisurely as ever, where nothing has changed, not even the taste of fresh-killed mutton or the labels on the tinned milk. But most of the cattlemen he knows still have ranches only because the banks don't want them, and a leg of lamb sells at retail in New York City for twenty-one cents a pound. The ranch, like the farm, has lost its economic justification. Therefore, the world being organized as it is, the ranch and the farm are endangered as a way of life, no matter how desirable.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Cox's Army

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The quarters of the radical Unemployed Councils in Pittsburgh are raided by the police, but Father Cox is able to command the huge Pittsburgh stadium for an unemployment rally. Even more patent was the contrast between the official reception accorded the Communist-led National Hunger March and that extended to Father Cox's army when it arrived in Washington. The absurdly formidable armament which confronted the militant Communists—Washington was an armed camp, with more troops and police than marchers—was not in evidence when Father Cox appeared. He was graciously received and heard by President Hoover, was warmly greeted by the Pennsylvania Congressmen, and was photographed, appropriately enough, arm in arm with Senator James J. Davis, one of the most vociferous "labor" opponents of the "dole." His march was avowedly designed to offset the earlier radical demonstration, and it was financed by Pittsburgh business men.

The incident becomes readily understandable if one takes into consideration the fact that since the depression the industrial area of Pittsburgh has become the chief new center for Communist activity. The radicals have set themselves as a paramount task the winning of the miners and steel workers of the Pittsburgh district, and have established themselves among the large masses of unemployed in these industries. Father Cox's latest announcement is that he may be a candidate for President on a proposed "Jobless Party ticket."

New York, January 20

FELIX MORROW

"Guiding the Revolution"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation of January 13 Mr. Arthur Allen characterizes the recent student conference of the League for Industrial Democracy as an example of liberal futility. He bases his judgment upon the theme "Guiding the Revolution," as announced in a previous issue of The Nation. Had Mr. Allen attended the conference or secured a published report of the proceedings, available for the asking, he would have discovered (1) that the conference was not a talk-fest of liberals, and (2) that the student participants were not wholly innocent of experience in the class struggle.

There might be mentioned, for instance, the work of Donald M. Smith, of Bates College, in organizing a council of the unemployed in Lewiston, Maine—his first mass-meeting was attended by more than 1,500 persons; or the activities of Arnold Johnson, a student of Union Theological Seminary, in the Harlan strikes last summer, including five weeks' jail residence; or the support given the West Virginia Mine Workers' Union by students from Vassar and other colleges; or the participation of Columbia and Union Seminary students in the effort to organize Brooklyn Edison employees, in the course of which more than one has been beaten by thugs.

We have no illusion that revolutions can be made. But the revolutionary changes being forced upon us by the progressive breakdown of an individualist profit-seeking economy may not be wholly beyond human control. Hence the importance of considerations of strategy. Unless Mr. Allen expects a revolution to be suddenly produced as a magician might whisk a rabbit from a silk topper, he will recognize the necessity for these humble beginnings. They are tasks in which even college students and college graduates and readers of The Nation may share.

New York, January 12

PAUL PORTER

Friendly Words from Bertrand Russell

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I find in your issue of December 30 a note about myself which might give the impression that I have been finding fault with American hospitality. If in some moment of fatigue I have said anything capable of this interpretation, I apologize to my many American friends. A lecture tour in America is unavoidably rather strenuous, and advancing years have made me feel that it might be unwise to attempt another in the future. But I do not feel that Americans are responsible for this strenuousness, which is due to the desire of visitors like myself to get through a great deal in a short time.

I have much gratitude for the kindness which I have experienced in your country, and I should not wish to be added to the number of those Englishmen who have indulged in unjust and ill-natured criticism.

Petersfield, England, January 4

BERTRAND RUSSELL

A Letter to Mr. Willard

MR. O. WILLARD: I have already told you that your paper is a pro-Communist and pro-Fascist paper and not a true liberal one.

New York, January 9

DR. GIUSEPPE MORVILLO

Finance

Is Easy Money the Cure?

THE New York Federal Reserve Bank, which recently reduced by one-quarter of 1 per cent its buying rate for bills of exchange, is believed to have taken the first step in a new easy-money policy. As generally understood, this policy is designed to dovetail with the government's program of aiding banks, railroads, and other distressed institutions through loans to be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Eventual restoration of public confidence in business and the banks is the aim in view.

Back of an easy-money policy, at such a time as this, lies the idea that people can be persuaded to borrow, and to spend or invest the borrowed money, provided only the rate of interest is made low enough. The idea has been tried out on several occasions in recent years, with indifferent success. Several years ago the Reserve banks, actuated by a laudable purpose to redistribute some of our surplus gold among foreign countries, enforced a low rate of interest and succeeded in expelling some $500,000,000 gold from the country. But Wall Street thrust its way in to the feast of cheap credit, stocks boomed, and the final price was paid in 1929. Easy money "works," with a vengeance, in a boom, but its effect in curing depressions is likely to be negligible. In view of the grave results which may follow unsuccessful tampering with money rates, it is to be hoped that the present attempt will be held within rigid bounds. The export of gold to France, now under way, may reflect the withdrawal of French funds because of the low rate of interest available here; but it may also be connected with vague fears of currency inflation in America.

The reason for the ineffectualness of an easy-money policy is not far to seek. When a panic bursts over the financial markets, it is classic practice for the central banks to lend without stint—but at a stiff rate—to all who can present acceptable collateral. On such an occasion traders are obsessed with the fear that they will not be able to obtain funds to meet maturing obligations, and the removal of that fear through an open-handed credit policy is likely to go far toward allaying the panic. But when a depression has dragged its length along for two years or more, there are no aspects of a sudden emergency to deal with. The strongest debtors have long since paid off or provided for their maturing obligations, and the weakest ones are unable to muster the resources needed, in any event, to obtain credit; such debtors could not have obtained it even during the first crash. After a long business slump the effective demand for credit is at a minimum. Concerns enjoying the highest rating do not want to borrow, and the banks will not lend to the others.

If a low rate is powerless to start the wheels of industry, why not try a high one? The suggestion is not so heretical as it appears, for if borrowing is what is required to get things going, it seems logical to provide credit facilities for the only people who actually want to borrow—namely, the people to whom the conservative banks will not lend. If low rates will not tempt the strong borrowers, high rates might tempt the speculative lenders. Current yields of 6, 8, and 10 per cent on what were recently regarded as fairly high-grade preferred stocks and bonds are often cited to illustrate the low state of corporate credit, but they illustrate with equal force the fact that enough money is available, of a speculative cast, to maintain those rates. Here is an opportunity for "individualism" to show what it can do, before we conclude that nobody can be persuaded to lend to the poorer credit risks except the United States Treasury.

S. PALMER HARMAN

WORLD CHAOS

The Responsibility of Science

by William McDougall, F. R. S.

AUTHOR OF

An Introduction to Social Psychology

The distinguished English psychologist examines our civilization and finds it topheavy. He finds that, although we have made vast strides in machinery and mass production, we haven't stopped to consider the effect on human individuals and human society, and that this neglect of the social sciences is responsible for the present world chaos.

$1.25

COVICI • FRIEDE • Publishers • 386 Fourth Ave., New York

HUNGER AND LOVE

A Novel by Lionel Britton

Introduction by Bertrand Russell

Bertrand Russell, Bernard Shaw, Arnold Bennett, Laurence Stallings and Upton Sinclair are a few of those who praise this novel enthusiastically.

Laurence Stallings proclaimed: "I submit that there is more fecundity of modern thought in this work than in any other single volume."

This remarkable study of Arthur Phelps' struggle to attain a mind is one of the most comprehensive and soul-stirring that has ever been put on paper.

This novel, originally published at $4.00 by Harper and Brothers, is now reissued by the Vanguard Press at $3.00.

623 Pages

$3.00 at bookstores

THE VANGUARD PRESS, 100 Fifth Avenue, New York City

CROWELL'S HANDBOOK

For READERS and WRITERS

A dictionary of famous characters and plots in legend, fiction, drama, opera and poetry, together with dates and principal works of important authors, literary and journalistic terms and familiar allusions. $3.50

From CROWELL'S

THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO.
393 Fourth Avenue

New York

Books, Music, Films, Drama

Poem for My Daughter

By HORACE GREGORY

Tell her I know that living is too long for our love to endure;
the tenuous and strong web of time (outlasting girls and men—love's rapid signature of hand and lip and eye) is ■ steel cable strung across ■ sunset sky.

Tell her that girls and men are shadows on the grass where time's four seasons pass;
tell her that I have seen oh, many a nervous queen of girls (Madonna, glorious white tower goddess) fade while walking in noon's shade, separate limbs and foreheads bright now dim, anonymous.

Even this room where I make words to signify a quarrel 'gainst death and all things perishing shall live beyond me, and the clock upon the wall slowly unwinding time shall count the hours that stand ripe for my funeral.

On the Theme of Time

Descent to the Dead. By Robinson Jeffers. Random House.
$7.50.

ROBINSON JEFFERS is one of the poets today who is totally preoccupied with the theme of time. It is as if the human vision had been stretched suddenly, as if the eye of man were no longer on his own age save as that age is one hour in a continuous flow of time. T. S. Eliot, Archibald MacLeish, Hart Crane, Yvor Winters, and, in a more completely disillusioned way, William Butler Yeats are all obsessed, driven out of themselves, driven into a desire for oblivion by this intensified and modern awareness of infinity. And once this obsession overpowers the poet, he cannot write anything without feeling the necessity of divorcing himself from any strictly personal theme. Love, hate, passion, ennui—all become relative to the knowledge of these emotions manifest in the writings of poets of all periods. The eye focuses on a point, discovers that the point is the circumference of the world, in fact, the circumference of all worlds. Such an attack upon a poetic subject, such an angle of vision suddenly spreading out explain much of the imagery in modern poetry.

When Robinson Jeffers, therefore, turns to write elegies, he writes them not in terms of the duration of a personal grief, not in the intimate imagery of such a grief, but in terms of time. He writes them on the perishing of peoples, on the annihilation of races, on history ever continuous and seemingly discontinuous. In this new book, "Descent to the Dead," he has returned to the land of his own ancestors, to Ireland, to England. These are dead lands; they have known more of time, as he sees it, than has his own Pacific Coast. They prove to him conclusively the paradox with which Eliot likewise has been concerned, that the dead are more living than are the "living dead."

The dead live through their histories, through their remembered expression in any art form, through the epochs they have brought into being; the living are dead because one must see them through the wrong end of the telescope, one is among them, one analyzes each deadly daily task, each petty liberty. In this new collection of lyrics Jeffers attempts to answer the question, What is death? It is life in the minds of those who follow after you, life only in memory, but memory is, therefore, more living, more enduring than life itself. And for one such memory, wrapped round the name of a great person, generations of men die; such is the theory of selection, of the right of the fittest to survival. The superman, then, with whom Jeffers has long been concerned, is he who endures past time as it is normally measured. He endures past human emotion (the briefest of all brevities), he becomes inhuman while he lives, and after he dies he is remembered as having surpassed humanity's dictum. Such a man gives himself in life to fury, to intensity like that of nature in great storm; after he dies, he is remembered for his frenzy.

So this new collection of elegies, written in rhythms closely approximating the quantitative Greek, written in statements sometimes closely approximating the simplicity and directness of prose, but escaping the prosaic because so condensed, so vehement, is the logical conclusion of Jeffers's theme of desire for annihilation: he believes it necessary to escape the bonds of humanity (through violence), and then to be reunited with a larger measure of time, nature. Mountains endure beyond our sight; the body reabsorbed into dust has a boundlessness past that of life. This is a kind of pantheism, but Jeffers's own kind. Beauty in nature is achieved through spanning a greater compass of years than puny man may span. Jeffers's feeling for nature is like that of the ancient Britons. Although his ancestry is, in part, Celtic, Jeffers does not feel nature as gentle. He is much more like the early Scandinavians in his feeling for the waves and winds. He is terrified and entranced. If Jeffers had lived in a period when people believed in monsters he would have created appalling monsters to personify natural forces. Instead, since he has a scientific outlook, he presents the idea of natural law as terrific and ruthless. Human tenderness is, therefore, a mere protective fiction; nature alone illustrates what life really means.

Jefferies as a lyric poet is, let me repeat, never personal. In his lyrics, elegiac, philosophical, didactic, he is pronouncing a creed molded and confirmed by the thought of the twentieth century. He is a romantic turned nihilist. His lyrics are the direct vehicle of his vision; in them he allows himself none of the romantic grandeur of the narratives, got through presenting unintellectual characters and their actions. In his lyrics, he is an intellectual—romantic, bitter, frustrated, and confused—a mystic in his most intense moods, but intellectually opposed to mysticism, a man who seeks a philosophical system and can formulate none. There is, for him, no "tower beyond tragedy," no moment of peace. He has no clear idea of unity. Nature is greater than man, therefore more important. Death is an extended fretfulness and not really perfect annihilation. And there is no peace. Man's one hunger is for oblivion, and the only possible oblivion would be a total destruction of earth—something which the mind cannot quite grasp.

There is one other point concerning technique; Robinson Jeffers is, in his narratives, often very faulty, very unpoetic in the turn of a single line or group of lines. There are passages in the long poems which are in very bad taste. If they escape the censor it is because of the dramatic force of the narrative. Jeffers can tell a story (despite his symbolism, despite his obsessions); he understands his characters and presents a well-motivated tale. He has a perfect sense of human drama. This is a tremendous power in a narrative poet. But only in his lyrics does he show his command of the poetic line, his precise sense of language, and this in a rhythm which is almost alien to our tongue, which is so dangerously close to prose that only Jeffers with his knowledge of Greek poetry can keep it from becoming prose.

EDA LOU WALTON

Eloquent Biography

Wellington. By Philip Guedalla. Harper and Brothers. $4.

GUEDALLA takes considerable trouble in his preface to justify writing a quarter of a million words about Wellington. If novelists are allowed so much space for the nonentities now in fashion as heroes, he argues that he can be excused for giving as many words to so imposing an entity as the Iron Duke. The point is irrelevant. It is Guedalla, not the Duke, who must justify the long stretch; and his justification is magnificent. It is 250,000 words long and one of the most brilliant, sustained, and conscientious pieces of biographical writing in our literature.

It is an eloquent book, eloquent in its entirety, eloquent in its smallest part. Any sentence picked out of its context breathes by its own rhythm, and pleases us either by a graceful balance, an interesting contrast, or a flashing metaphor. Rhetoric is perfectly used; instances of excess are rare; and the reader is exhilarated by the majestic and controlled literary energy.

Guedalla's respect for his subject, explicitly announced in the preface, is tempered in the text to the rendering of justice. Of unpleasant data he furnishes enough to give any debunker a year's work; but it is all in its place. The reader may be grateful that in this book, at least, Guedalla is not given to pulling out great men's shirt-tails.

To the radical, Wellington must be an offensive figure, unless, like the generous crusaders who could admit that the Saracens were good knights, he has the chivalry to admit Wellington's qualities. Wellington was an aristocrat; he believed that the protection of property was the first duty of organized society. He resisted social justice in England with a stately persistence; but he was an able and principled man whose work in history was well done, though we might wish that it had not been done.

Aristocracy, to Wellington, was a natural state. He was born an aristocrat and into an aristocratic society. His family belonged to the Anglo-Irish nobility which, living among an enslaved people, was constantly being confirmed in its sense of selection and superiority. Military command hardened in him the conviction that masses of men are fit only for obedience. When he turned to civil life it was inevitable that he should become a Tory leader.

These limitations admitted, it is impossible not to admire Wellington's forcefulness, good judgment, and good sense. He obtained his army commission without training and was promoted several ranks before he had spent a day in the service. This was common in an era when gentlemen consciously ran the government for the good of gentlemen and vox populi was not yet a whisper; a gentleman's career was not hampered by the vulgarity of exertions. Unlike other gentlemen careerists, however, Wellington took the responsibilities of his career upon himself instead of leaving them to assiduous patrons in London. He studied military writers, and when he sailed to a post in India, there was a trunkful of books about India in his baggage. In India he founded the military reputation that was to be enlarged during the magnificent Spanish campaigns and crowned, while he dissolved an empire, at Waterloo.

There were two chief factors in Wellington's success. One was his ability to think of his job in all its interrelations and to understand each element down to its details. Other generals were content to trust supplies to the commissariat, communications to the transport officers, the contours of the campaign country to the intelligence staff. Wellington supervised all these himself. As a consequence, his soldiers were well fed and clothed; when they marched there were no swarming and congestion on the roads; when they maneuvered they were not dumped into gullies. Although they could not love him as an army sometimes loves its general, his soldiers had confidence in him and were glad to serve under him. Moreover, to Wellington a victory did not end his job. He took care that victories were not too expensive or would not leave him in a desert. He was above the temptation of loot and the intoxications of sadism. It was perhaps for these reasons that Wellington was never a sentimentalist about his soldiers and usually spoke of them with ironic contempt. He saw them too often, after victories, taking holidays and bonuses in loot and license.

The other factor in his success was that he had the wisdom and the courage to retreat when necessary. A battle was only an incident in a campaign. Edging away from an enemy too strong in numbers or position never humiliated him. He was not the man to lose an army on a desperate gamble, or to make a fine show of last-ditch fighting. This ability to retreat he brought to his later political career. He had the intelligence to see, when he was Prime Minister, that reform was inevitable, and he had the courage to draft and put through a Reform Bill although his petulant Tory Cabinet broke up in protest.

And he knew when his work was over. He had been a general for a definite reason, to bring peace based on a restored monarchical system in Europe. Waterloo having accomplished that, he turned to the problem of settlement in a sensible spirit. He did not understand that the day of monarchies was over; but he did understand that the monarchies must start on decent terms with each other. Therefore he, the only general who had beaten French armies, acted as the protector of France in the negotiations at Vienna.

Waterloo made Wellington the most famous and trusted man in the world. He returned to England a hero, and almost an independent power. He maintained his poise and good judgment, enduring with dignity the hysterics of adoration; and when the years of worship passed and a new generation knew him less as the victor of Waterloo than as the thwarter of reform, when Chartist mobs pursued him and broke his windows, he remained clear-headed, unmoved, and majestic. In giving his services or his prestige to the Tory cause he believed to the end that he was acting in the best interests of his country.

His private life illustrates the arrogance of the better-than-thou mind. The masses of England were to be kept from any domestic irregularities. He himself, however, seemed never so contented as when he was away from his agitated and ineffectual wife. No one could blame him for that, or for making his affair with Mrs. Arbuthnot a calmly public matter. His infidelity was a matter of personal sensitiveness. Infidelity among the poorer classes was brutishness. Caste consciousness made it impossible for Wellington to understand that the poor could be sensitive.

There are many other aspects of Wellington's life that call for comment, but it is time to return to Guedalla's performance. By any standard it must be judged a success. Guedalla has informed himself fully of the historical and social backgrounds, and he is able to place them adroitly behind and around Wellington, not, like a clumsier biographer, dismissing his hero while he smears on his masses of information. His style is continuously brilliant, and though after a few pages the reader may feel dazzled, after a few more he is inured to the glare and enjoys the illumination. The rhetoric is continuous, and it is astonishing that he sustains it at so high a level so long; but it has its lapses, and in a curious way they almost always occur when he tries to animate scenery—as when the rock of Teneriffe rises out of the sea, clairvoyantly, to salute Wellington sailing past in an East Indiaman. Guedalla's allusiveness is sometimes confusing; but usually it is a brilliant feat of literary economy. He calls on his reader's knowledge, memory, and powers of association, and so, with his reader's help, he is able—without the use of long interpolated paragraphs, footnotes, and other elaborations—to keep an astonishing number of men and events in movement on his pages.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

Why India Rebels

Rebel India. By H. N. Brailsford. New Republic, Inc. $1.

THE foundation of rebellion in India is in Mr. Brailsford's view economic discontent. In vigorous style he sketches the evidence of this discontent among peasants and industrial workers. The desperate living conditions of the lower nine-tenths of India's three hundred and fifty millions are indeed beyond description. Caught in an inescapable tangle of overbreeding and undernourishment, inextricably indebted to usurious money-lenders, exploited in favor of a privileged land-holding class, subjected to a land tax that takes an incredible proportion of their earnings, their handicrafts in decline from competition with Western machine industry, with the miseries of life rarely alleviated by medicine, hygiene, or education, the peasants are in a state that would rouse a more vigorous people to bloody revolt. At the same time the industrial workers must endure the evils of an infant industrialism—overcrowding in insanitary tenements, employment of women and children, long hours, scanty wages. These conditions Mr. Brailsford roundly excoriates with a Socialist's ardor.

The blame for the present state Mr. Brailsford assigns partly to British imperialism, which he does not in any circumstances defend, hardly even allowing it credit for the peace it has brought, the railways, the irrigation enterprises. But more important in his opinion is the attitude toward life of Indians themselves, especially of Hindus, who tolerate caste, child-marriage, the sanctity of cows, and peculiar religious prepossessions concerning rebirth and karma (retribution in a future life for one's acts now). He indicates the lines along which he thinks economic improvement may take place, but he expects no regeneration until India is self-governing. He is therefore against British imperialism both because it selfishly exploits India and because it hinders Indians in the process of building up the country.

From the purely economic point of view his picture, with toning down of the over-strong colors, is effective. But the confining of his treatment to the economic would indicate that therein lies an adequate accounting for "rebel" India. On the contrary, as a total picture of India's unrest his book is inadequate. Long before the present economic crisis there was political unrest among the middle classes of India, which slowly filtered down among the working classes. The unrest was not merely economic in its origin, but was also based on other issues. It was a response from the ancient, highly developed, proud, and sensitive culture of India to domination by a Western civilization that had come to India when she was torn by bitter inner conflict and had made good its dominance with the weapons furnished by the industrial revolution. The Western civilization had claimed for itself superiority in all aspects, such as religion, morals, art, education, even language—English was made the medium of instruction in all colleges and high schools. Complicating the cultural conflict is the Hindu-Moslem antipathy, which Mr. Brailsford hardly seems to see as more than a dispute between two rival parties, but which is again a battle between the powerful native civilization of India and the intruding Islamic culture. The basic conflicts in India today are of the Hindu culture against the Western European and the Mohammedan; and nationalism in India today is a Hindu movement that draws rarely and never whole-heartedly from the Mohammedan and the Christian communities. India, therefore, is like the rest of the Orient in being faced with the problem of adjusting her agrarian economic order to the order of an industrialized world; but in addition she is engaged in a mighty effort to preserve the cultural continuity of her life. Modify it she must, as Europe has had to do hers, but she will not have her art, her literature, her religion, her philosophy, her society displaced by those of the West.

W. NORMAN BROWN

American Secrecy About Red Russia

America's Siberian Adventure. By Major General William S. Graves. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.50.

WHY did we intervene in Siberia in 1918? There have been plenty of guesses advanced by historians, political students, and journalists. But no one can be absolutely certain of the real reasons. Not even the author of this book, who was at the head of the Siberian Expeditionary Force, can tell us what prompted the Wilson Administration to send 10,000 soldiers upon this most ridiculous adventure in American military history. "I was in command of the United States troops sent to Siberia," the author writes, "and I must admit I do not know what the United States was trying to accomplish by military intervention." It was explained at the time that Japan and the United States were sending troops to Siberia to rescue an army of Czech soldiers supposed to be stranded somewhere in eastern Russia. But when General Graves arrived on the scene he found this "stranded army" well able to look out for itself. Indeed he writes, "The Czechs had taken control of the Trans-Siberian Railway and most of the towns on this line, and had definitely decided not to leave two months before Japan and the United States decided to go to their relief, and help them to get out of Siberia." (The italics are the author's.)

When I say that the true motive behind the Siberian intervention has only been guessed at, I mean that there is as yet no authentic information available on this point. Nor are there any official documents ready at hand to show why State Department officials deliberately sought to sabotage the clear and indisputable instructions given General Graves, or why these same officials tried so energetically to force the American troops into the Russian civil war on the side of Kolchak and other reactionary leaders. No doubt, as Newton D. Baker suggests in the foreword to Graves's book, "some day all this will be carefully studied, and research scholarship will find documents and papers, reports of conversations, and invitations to new policies" which will reveal the story behind the Siberian misadventure.

In my opinion this research would very likely throw new light on the whole absurd Russian policy of the United States, and perhaps explain why Secretary Stimson has found it necessary to resort to secret diplomacy in connection with the present Manchurian controversy. There has been altogether too much secrecy since 1917 in Washington's handling of questions touching Russia. Either Washington lacks the courage of its convictions, which seems stupid, or else there is something in its Russian policy that it wishes to hide from the American people.

The story unfolded by General Graves, while not entirely new, gives us a fresh and illuminating picture of the Siberian situation during the American intervention. It has the added merit of coming from a man who can speak with authority. The story is one that ought to put a conscientious State Department to shame. Again and again the author reveals the manner in which consular officials, in their reports to Washington, twisted and distorted information relative to Siberian developments. As a result of these apparently deliberate misrepresentations General Graves and other observers were informed by Washington that the reports on the situation that they were making did not contain "the kind of information . . . we want." The contents of most of the consular reports, misleading though they were, found currency throughout the United States and Europe. The outer world was being fed with propaganda to show that the Bolsheviks were committing the most frightful atrocities, while in truth, according to General Graves, these atrocities were the work of Semenoff, Kalmikoff, and other followers of Admiral Kolchak, for whom State Department officials were attempting to build up favorable sentiment in the United States with a view to having the Kolchak group recognized as the government of Siberia. "All Allied representatives and United States State Department representatives," the author says, "were solidly behind Admiral Kolchak, and the more hopeless the cause of Kolchak became, the more bitter his supporters became toward everyone who did not assist him." On the other hand, General Graves found that "at no time while I was in Siberia was there enough popular support behind Kolchak in eastern Siberia for him, or the people supporting him, to have lasted one month if all Allied support had been removed."

General Graves also brings exceedingly serious charges against Japan. He accuses the Japanese of having supported such reactionaries as Semenoff and Kalmikoff, whom he describes as criminals of the worst sort. Of the latter he writes:

I also met for the first time the notorious murderer, robber, and cutthroat Kalmikoff. He was the worst scoundrel I ever saw or ever heard of, and I seriously doubt, if one should go entirely through the Standard Dictionary looking for words descriptive of crime, if a crime could be found that Kalmikoff had not committed. He was armed and financed by Japan in their efforts "to help the Russian people."

Among other accusations he brings against the Japanese, Graves charges them with having violated the agreement with Washington under which each country was to send only 10,000 of its troops into Siberia. Japan asked that it be permitted to increase its quota to 12,000. Suspicious of this request, General Graves made a thorough survey of the disposition of Japanese troops in Siberia and found that they numbered not 10,000 or 12,000, but 72,000.

Whatever may have been the motive of the people who persuaded Woodrow Wilson to take part in the "rescue" of the stranded Czechs, they apparently did not succeed in achieving their objective. "I think it cannot be refuted," the author writes in conclusion, "that there were no beneficial results flowing from intervention in Russia so far as all foreigners are concerned, and it undoubtedly resulted in placing the mass of Russians even more solidly behind the Soviets."

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Books in Brief

Representative Opinions of Mr. Justice Holmes. Arranged by Alfred Lief. Foreword by Harold J. Laski. The Vanguard Press. $4.50.

This is a companion volume to "The Dissenting Opinions of Mr. Justice Holmes." The reader who wishes to understand fully the working of Justice Holmes's mind will find it indispensable. For, composed as it is almost entirely of prevailing opinions, it better reflects the fundamental conservatism of his mind. But this, as Professor Laski points out in his excellent introduction, only makes him all the greater as a judge. The objectivity which can rise above class and personal prejudices is possible in the exercise of the judicial function only at its highest levels.

A Translation of the Orpheus of Angelo Politian and the Aminta of Torquato Tasso. With an Introductory Essay on the Pastoral. By Louis E. Lord. Oxford University Press. $3.

Mr. Lord has rendered these famous pastoral dramas—or, as he tends to call them in his charming introduction, operas—in limpid, sweet, yet formal prose. Such a translation serves better than anything else to prove that Politian and Tasso were once incredibly charming. For, as Mr. Lord translates them, they still are charming; and still incredible.

Decent Fellows. By John Heygate. Introduction by Henry Williamson. Cape and Smith. $2.50.

John Heygate's study of life at Eton suffers greatly from a lack of some center around which the story might revolve; the troubles of a boy whose friends' parents are wealthier than his own make but a slight complication for a novel of four hundred pages. With one noteworthy exception, moreover, the author resolutely avoids the dramatic possibilities of his theme. The exception is the episode of a visit to a cabaret, with the subsequent beatings, and as it reveals the author's undoubted talent for observation applied to a situation essentially more exciting than afternoon tea, the remainder of the novel—half of it—becomes a long anticlimax, a series of disconnected episodes with cricket and adolescent morality contributing to the general tedium.

Music

Among the Best Performers

IN the bi-weekly musical comments appearing in this column it is obviously impossible to give an account of all the musical events of two weeks. It is often nearly as difficult to choose, out of from six to ten events of importance, any one or two that stand out from the rest in a way that invites comment. The intrinsic value of a performance or of a work often bears little relation to its usability as copy, and many of the really outstanding events of the season are not mentioned here at all for the simple reason that it is difficult to find anything to say about them.

Where an artist does not achieve a balance among the elements of his art, or lays exceptional stress in one direction, it is sometimes possible to point out to the listener why it is that he may have found another element slighted. He may be less dissatisfied with the tonal austerity of men like Artur Schnabel and Adolf Busch, for example, if he has been warned that it is in other directions—subtle and sensitive phrasing, coupled with exceptional architectural sense—that their technical virtues are to be found.

But of all artists the most difficult to write about are those few supreme interpreters whose identity with the composers they interpret is so completely attained that their function as interpreter is almost forgotten. What is there to say, for example, of Myra Hess, who has achieved, I think, more nearly perfect balance in her art than has any other performing musician I know? There were shortcomings and weaknesses in her recent recital, perhaps more than in others she has given. But even admitting these, I think her realization of the potential beauty of the works she played is greater, her destruction of everything that stands between the composer and the listener more complete, than that attained by anyone else. In the face of that fact I cannot see that anything would be gained by pointing out weaknesses, the reasons and remedies for which Myra Hess doubtless knows infinitely better than anyone else; still less by attempting to pick out individual virtues in an art so incomparably well rounded, and so much better able to speak for itself than anyone to speak for it. But if I cannot describe the unique and almost incredible beauty of Myra Hess's playing, I can at least urge everyone who has not experienced it to delay no longer. For me no other artistic experience is like it; I do not find anywhere else its equal for vigor, warmth, and poise.

I can speak of Yehudi Menuhin (on the basis of concerts of previous years) only in terms almost as unreserved. His playing is a similar revelation of beauties only vaguely dreamed of until he uncovers them. What weaknesses he has seem to me to be due almost as little to his age as those of Myra Hess to her sex. He stands out, I think, as far above most great violinists as do Fritz Kreisler and Adolf Busch.

While the city's musical life cannot in the nature of things afford an uninterrupted succession of Hess and Menuhin recitals, the past few weeks have brought many artists of less solitary distinction, of whom nevertheless there seems no reason to say any but favorable things. A concert by any of them can hardly fail to yield unusual pleasure and profit, and it is with the idea of recommending them, to those who may welcome some hint as to what they may expect, that they are briefly mentioned here. Among pianists, the recent debut recital of Eunice Norton, pupil of Schnabel and, like Myra Hess, of Matthay, was outstanding even in a city where talented young pianists exhibit their abilities constantly. The severity, the intelligence, and the virtuosity of her playing distinguish her among the best pianists of the season, and at the same time give the best possible assurance of the soundness of her future development. Among singers—whose art is farther from its heyday than that of pianists—Sigrid Onegin remains the most completely satisfying of those that visit New York, with the possible exception of Friedrich Schorr, whom the collapse of the Friends of Music has confined to the stage of the Metropolitan. The success of Richard Tauber seems to me based rather on his vocal virtuosity than on any really musical sincerity or depth. But while his singing on the whole does not at all move me, it contains details of technique and especially of phrasing that are altogether unique. At the other end of the scale is Elisabeth Schumann, whose interpretation of German songs gives significance to singing which from the purely vocal standpoint is not remarkable. Lotte Lehmann combines a voice of unusual beauty with extraordinary interpretative powers whose effect is somewhat hampered by defects of vocal technique. Like both these two, the English Singers—who make no claim to exceptional vocal distinction—rely above all upon the value of the music they sing; sung with the taste and feeling they have for it, it more than makes up by its own beauty for whatever may be lacking in purely sensuous appeal.

ARTHUR MENDEL

Films Indigenous

IT has often been pointed out, usually with great scorn, that the men who run the movies were originally nickelodeon proprietors. It is time we realized not only that this state of affairs is a fact, but that it is not necessarily deplorable. The purpose of the American film, or any film for that matter, is mass entertainment at a profit sufficient to enable it to go on. It could not, by reason of its mechanics and its whole set-up, be otherwise. This condition, moreover, seems likely to continue indefinitely. Yet most people, in judging the movies, tend to ignore this simple fact, with the result that more intellectual irrelevance has been wasted on the movies than they have ever deserved.

It does not follow because its prime purpose is mass entertainment at a profit that the moving picture is not or cannot be an art. It will be different from and outside the traditional stream of art, which, until these proletarian times, happens always to have flowed in aristocratic, individualistic channels. It will have to develop as an art within certain limitations, a fate it shares with art in general. The smart comedy is limited by the fact that it must appeal to a sophisticated audience. The movie springs from and depends upon a world dominated by machines, mass production, and mass consumption. The critic is irrelevant who demands a kind of art, a kind of form or effect, not inherent in the material with which the movie must be concerned, namely, the world in which it exists.

Intellectual superiority and mental confusion have had their worst effect upon the movies themselves. Consequently, anything as indigenous as "Taxi" (Strand Theater) and, less recently, "The Champ" arouses an enthusiasm quite out of proportion to its intrinsic merit. In "Taxi" the hard-boiled young man with the heart of gold (James Cagney) is as American as Mr. Ford's Model T, and the part is played with much art and no condescension. The rest of the cast is equally authentic with the important exception of the heroine, Loretta Young, who remains a soft-faced conventional movie star rather than a pretty but not unsophisticated waitress in a third-rate restaurant. The dialogue, which was provided by Kubec Glasmon and John Bright, has a raciness and snap that come straight out of urban America. The speech the hero makes to a meeting of taxicab drivers, for instance, is exactly right. (I think it is significant that Glasmon and Bright were not formerly New York playwrights but engaged in some quite different pursuit in the Middle West.) The director, scene by scene, takes full advantage of the material he is working with, and the picture moves with speed and gusto.

The story of "Taxi" is undistinguished. Its tempo and dialogue, and the characterization, show considerably more artistry. It begins on one theme—a campaign against taxicab racketeers; halfway through it switches to another, purely personal theme. Moreover, it is episode rather than story, and therefore has no shape. But if it is granted that form is the most difficult problem in art, involving as it does complete understanding of the material, it is not surprising that the American movie should be deficient in this element. It may well be also that the American film will not realize its best artistic possibilities until the average mental age of its audience is twenty-one instead of twelve years. But "Taxi" and "The Champ" are at least beginnings. In the meantime criticism of a democratic collective art should not be based upon aristocratic individualistic preferences, however understandable those preferences may be.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Drama

Nice People

PHILIP BARRY'S new comedy, now current at the Broadhurst Theater, has been hailed with delight. Critics and public seem to agree that it is irresistibly charming, and my voice is evidently destined to cry alone in the wilderness; but I must confess that I find "The Animal Kingdom" subtly offensive from its coyly cynical title on, and that I suspect myself of disliking it for the very reasons which are responsible for its success. Since the plot is of no moment, it must be the tone which counts, but that tone—despite all the author's obvious efforts to be "authentic" or nothing—is distressingly hollow.

If I understand Mr. Barry aright, what he hates above all else is vulgarity. He despises the easy flippancy of Broadway no less than he despises the cheap sentiment of the uneducated, and the blatant ostentation of the rich shocks him neither more nor less than does the middle-classness of the middle class or the proletarianism of the proletariat. He is always dreaming of some ideal milieu—of some purified Riviera or some intelligent Park Avenue—peopled with creatures really worthy of their gracious setting. In pursuit of this dream he is always filling his plays with characters who are fabulously "fine" as well as incredibly elegant, who combine the knowingness of the cosmopolitan fast set with the sensitivity of the artist ■ the artist is conceived in romantic fiction. But the result is merely that these characters are almost invariably ■ little bit "too" everything. They are too rich and too elegant to begin with, too preciously gay and gallant and sensitive as they develop. He is, besides, always telling us what they seem to be always telling themselves, namely, that never before were there any people so irreproachable from any reasonable standpoint. Park Avenue could not criticize their manners, Paris could not criticize their taste, and the Algonquin would hang its head in shame if it could realize how far it had been beaten at its own game. Even their morals are fundamentally as sound as their sophistication and their manners, for their essential "decency" is always flashing out from behind the flip-pant phrase; despite all the necessary complexity of their lives and sentiments they remain Boy Scouts at heart. Nor is there ever any danger that we shall fail to realize just how first-class everything is. With an accomplished casualness, characters and motives alike are always being unostentatiously turned up so that we shall not fail to see the mark. It is "Sterling," of course, but it is "Black, Starr, and Frost" besides.

Now if all this were purely extravagant and confessedly artificial, if Mr. Barry had his tongue firmly in his cheek and realized fully the ridiculousness of it all, then it might be amusing enough. But there is an undercurrent of seriousness which makes it evident that the author is determined "while laughing to teach." He is, I believe, an essentially serious, somewhat sentimental man, and it is a pity that he should be seduced, as he obviously is, by the glamor of a kind of smartness really foreign to his nature. Because of it his people are unconventionally conventional and only escape one cliché to fall into another. They believe themselves free, spontaneous, and genuine; in reality they have only cultivated a more elaborate artificiality and stifled themselves with ultra-smartness while despising the smart. They like the right books and say the right things even though they have gone just one step ahead of the people who admit that they strive to do just that. They do not—to take a specific example—think the New Yorker really clever, but one is just as sure that they would think it $1.

BONIBOOKS

AMERICAN OXFORD
DICTIONARY

Compiled by F. G. and
H. W. Fowler

EDUCATION AND THE
GOOD LIFE

Bertrand Russell

GREAT SHORT STORIES OF
THE WORLD

Edited by Barrett H. Clark and Maxim Lieber

OXFORD BOOK OF
AMERICAN VERSE

Edited by Bliss Carman

ISRAEL

Ludwig Lewisohn

AGAINST THE GRAIN

J. K. Huysmans

OUR BUSINESS CIVILIZATION

James Truslow Adams

THE HIGH PLACE

James Branch Cabell

THIS EARTH OF OURS

Jean-Henri Fabre

WHAT IS WRONG WITH MARRIAGE

Hamilton & MacGowan

SOUTH WIND

Norman Douglas

MICHELANGELO

Romain Rolland

THE HISTORY OF MR. POLLY

H. G. Wells

TAR

Sherwood Anderson

ALBERT & CHARLES BONI

NEW YORK

THE NEW SCHOOL

announces the opening of the

SPRING TERM

the week of Monday, February 15

Marking time is the usual policy for a period of depression such as the present one; but it is a policy the New School refuses to follow. It has arranged its spring curriculum with a view to extending and intensifying its work. It offers many more courses than in any spring term in its history, courses nearer the heart of the current situation. Alongside of most of the ablest lecturers of the last term it introduces its students, among others, to:

DEAN ROSCOE POUND of the Harvard Law School
SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE, formerly editor of The New Freeman

JAMES HARVEY ROGERS of Yale, author of "America Weighs Her Gold"

GARDNER MURPHY of Columbia University

ANITA BLOCK of the Theatre Guild

PAUL T. FRANKL, authority on interior decoration and design

LEE SIMONSON, scene designer

JULIUS KLINGER of Vienna, master of poster art

45 courses meeting once a week in the evening or late afternoons. No entrance requirements. Write or telephone for catalogue.

Telephone Algonquin 4-2567

THE NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH
66 West 12th Street New York

cheap an one is sure that the group they despise would think it amusing, and they would be as ashamed to laugh at a drawing by Arno as their vulgar acquaintances would be ashamed not to. It is all too distressingly merely a matter of what "our set" is doing this year, and, to put it briefly, Mr. Barry falls into vulgarity as the direct result of his terrible fear that he might conceivably be vulgar. Surely he should discover before long that one cannot escape the curse of the fashionable by being more fashionable than anyone else. The effort to do so is called chasing one's own tail, and if he is really in search of the genuine it is a pity he has never thought of trying to be simple.

I have a rather short list of performers whom I gladly watch in almost any play purely for the pleasure to be had in their voice, gesture, and physical presence. The list does not contain the names of some of our most distinguished actors, and the failure of certain famous ladies of the theater to appear upon it is explained by the fact that I have never been able to discover what claims they had to fame unless the possession of an individual though annoying mannerism be considered such a claim. However, Mary Ellis does appear rather early in the list, and for that reason I found more enjoyment in "The Jewel Robbery" (Booth Theater) than the merits of that pleasant little comedy could account for. Those who share my enthusiasm for Miss Ellis's warm, rather luscious charm will find that the play gives her a good opportunity to display it.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"Whistling in the Dark" (Ethel Barrymore Theater) is a play in which a successful author of murder mysteries quite by accident finds himself in a den of murderous racketeers, and after a few drinks boasts that he could, if necessary, execute the most deadly crime without discovery. Since this gang is desperately in need of doing away with a prominent crime-investigator, they hold him to his boast and force him to work out a plan—threatening death to him and his fiancée if his scheme is not successful. The play is not very skilfully written and much of it would appear rather trite if Ernest Truex did not so delightfully portray the plight of a mild, kindly author who is compelled for once to act as a cruel master-mind.

M. G.

Webster's Collegiate

saves me many precious minutes every day . . .

When time is short and accurate information must be instantly available, Webster's Collegiate proves itself supreme among quick-reference works. It is the one handbook that everyone who values correctness in speaking, writing, and thinking must have for its instant answers to all puzzling questions about words.

The Best Abridged Dictionary

NEW FOURTH EDITION—Based upon Webster's New International—the "Supreme Authority." 106,000 entries, including hundreds of new words; dictionary of Biography; Gazetteer; 1930 Population Figures; etc., etc. 1268 pages. 1700 illustrations.

Get the Best Thin-Paper Edition: Cloth, $5.00; Fabrikoid, $6.00; Leather, $7.50. Purchase of your bookseller; or write for free specimen pages. G. & C. MERRIAM CO. 151 Broadway, Springfield, Mass.

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

Brief Moment—Cort—W. 48 St.
Civic Light Opera Co.—Erlanger's—W. 44 St.
Counsellor-at-Law—Plymouth—W. 45 St.
Cynara—Morosco—45 St. W. of B'way.
Distant Drums—Belasco—W. 44 St.
Electro—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
Mourning Becomes Electra—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.
Of Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.
Reunion in Vienna—Martin Beck—45 St. & 8 Ave.
Springtime for Henry—Bijou—45 St. W. of B'way.
The Animal Kingdom—Broadhurst—44 St. W. of B'way.
The Bride The Sun Shines On—Geo. M. Cohen—B'way. & 43 St.
The Devil Passes—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
The Good Fairy—Henry Miller's—124 W. 43 St.
The Left Bank—Little—44 St.
Whistling in the Dark—Ethel Barrymore—47 St. W. of B'way.
See page iv for plays, films, lectures, etc.

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, is the author of "Why Recognize Russia?"

DAVID W. WAINHOUSE was formerly assistant director of research of the Council on Foreign Relations.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

OAKLEY JOHNSON has just returned from Kentucky, where he has been investigating conditions among the striking miners.

HORACE GREGORY, author of a book of verse, "Chelsea Rooming House," has recently published a translation of Catullus.

EDA LOU WALTON is associate professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University, and author of "Jane Matthew and Other Poems."

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

W. NORMAN BROWN is professor of Sanskrit at the University of Pennsylvania.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1932

No. 3475

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	153
EDITORIALS:
Dynamite at Shanghai	156
Unless We Cancel the Debts	157
A Lesson for Candidates	158
Minneapolis Morals	158
HOW MANY HUNGRY? By Mauritz A. Hallgren	159
AMERICA'S ROLE AT THE CONFERENCE. By David W. Wainhouse	162
BAKER'S BREAD: COSTLY AND TASTELESS. By Winifred Raushenbush	164
MAHATMA GANDHI MEETS ROMAIN ROLLAND	167
CONTROLLING FOREIGN LOANS. By Morris L. Ernst	168
THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	169
CORRESPONDENCE	170
FINANCE: THE REAL CREDIT PROBLEM. By S. Palmer Harman	171
BOOKS, ART, DRAMA:
Winter: 1932. By James Rorty	172
Jean-Jacques. By Joseph Wood Krutch	172
"Individualism" and Housing. By C. K. Bauer	173
Italian Literature. By Isidor Schneider	173
Death of an Empire. By Karl F. Geiser	174
International Drama. By Montrose J. Moses	174
Book of the Cloud. By Stanley J. Kunitz	175
Books in Brief	175
Art: William Gropper. By Louis Lozowick	176
Drama: "Worse than Death." By Joseph Wood Krutch	177
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	178
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
French Logic Versus Customs Unions. By Lindsay Rogers	179

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

LEYWOOD BROWN FRED A. KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE FULL WICKEDNESS of the Japanese attack upon Shanghai appears from the fact that, as in the case of our war upon Spain in 1898, hostilities began after the Chinese had surrendered at every point—and accepted every one of the Japanese demands. It proves that, as McKinley wanted war at any cost for political reasons, so the Japanese militarists are determined to go ahead for ulterior reasons. It is not yet plain how far the Japanese plan goes, but it is quite likely that its forces are provoking war with China to enable the Mikado to seize all of Manchuria as "reparation" after the Chinese defeat. Meanwhile the Island Kingdom is taking the chance of embroiling the whole world. Its forces, too, are proceeding in the regular military manner of these times. After attacking without provocation, they bombed from airplanes homes, hospitals, and public buildings, killing men, women, and children. They destroyed the Commercial Press, China's foremost publishing house. These facts are vouched for by the Shanghai Y. M. C. A., the World's Chinese Students' Federation, the China Institute of Pacific Relations, the Union of Chinese Universities, and others. It was a cold-blooded massacre and one which merits reprobation by the civilized world. And latest bulletins contain the almost incredible news that Japanese warships are shelling Nanking and under cover of the shell-fire Japanese marines are being landed with a view, evidently, to occupation of the city.

BUT WHEN WE SAY THIS we wish no one to believe that we are inciting people to take up arms in order to "revenge" those acts and kill a lot of Japanese who committed these bloody wrongs under the orders of a medieval government. That will get the world nowhere. If there ever was a time to apply the lessons of the World War this is it. From that criminal folly the world has not yet recovered, if it is going to recover; indeed, this tragedy of Shanghai is doubtless a direct outcome of that struggle and of the teachings of Wilson and the Allied leaders that wrongs are to be redressed and the world purified by torturing and disemboweling men, women, and children. What the situation does call for is the bringing of world opinion to bear upon Japan in an unprecedented degree. We hope that every American organization that can possibly act will let the Japanese Ambassador know by telegraph at once that America is united in horror over this deed and demands the immediate cessation of hostilities and the withdrawal of Japanese troops. We hope that there will be mass-meetings everywhere to let their messages be known. It is the hour for the moral forces of America to be heard, and we believe they will respond. That Japan will be heavily punished we have no doubt. Its Shanghai warring may well spell economic disaster and the end of the kingdom. But, as we have said elsewhere, the only policy for us is to get our nationals out of Shanghai and then withdraw ships and soldiers as rapidly as possible.

UNDER DARK SKIES, indeed, the Disarmament Conference meets in Geneva. To the militarists reluctantly assembled there as advisers, and to the statesmen who have come only half-heartedly or with the determination to block the relief of suffering humanity, the Shanghai massacre comes, of course, as a welcome aid. But nothing that is happening in China should keep the governments of America and Europe from steadfastly pressing for disarmament. Upon the backs of the workers chiefly rests the burden of paying the $5,500,000,000 which Mr. Hoover has stated officially to be the annual burden Europe and America carry for armaments which never protect but inevitably lead to war. What ought to be pointed out in Geneva is that a disarmed Japan would never have made the onslaught upon Manchuria and Shanghai; it would have sought redress for wrongs in a humane and decent way through the League of Nations, the World Court, or a friendly and sympathetic diplomacy. But far beyond this lies the fact that at Geneva the nations of the world have the choice between bankruptcy and sanity. There is hardly a country in Europe which is not on the verge of financial collapse. Geneva offers the most direct and immediate way out; at least it could release enormous sums with which to start up trade or to take care of the destitute millions who are on the verge of desperation. Capitalism everywhere invites its own end if it does not take the Geneva opportunity to free the world in considerable degree from the domination of militarism.

WE HOPE that the horror in Shanghai will not prevent Congress from going ahead and reducing the army in line with the recommendations of the subcommittee of the House Military Affairs Committee headed by Congressman Collins of Mississippi. Congress ought to realize that the American army is the most topheavy in officers of perhaps any army in the world, now that the Spanish army has been modernized. For example, we have ninety colonels of cavalry to command six regiments of horse! It is idle to say that we need these officers for service in time of war; there will be no more cavalry regiments and the War Department has admitted this, for it is steadily motorizing the cavalry arm. We have so many generals that the War Department hardly knows where to station them. We are informed that there are three or four generals stationed in the Panama Canal Zone, and similar duplications run all through the service. More than that there is a serious block in army promotions due to the large number of men taken in at one time at the close of the war. It will be to the interest of the whole army to have this block broken. Certainly, the Citizens Military Training Camps and the Reserve Officers Training Corps ought to go; the latter is worthless from a military point of view, save for the inculcation of militarism. This is the time to cut the army down, and it must be done.

WHO ARE THE MEN selected to manage the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? Dawes, Meyer, Bestor, Mellon (or Mills), Couch, Jones, and McCarthy. Eugene Meyer, Jr., chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, is the chief financial adviser to the Hoover Administration. Paul Bestor is the Federal Farm Loan Commissioner and has been an instructor in Latin American history at Yale and the head of a firm engaged in draining and developing farm lands. Secretary Mellon and his assistant, Ogden L. Mills, have been in charge of the Treasury Department, with its immense responsibilities, both before the depression began and since. Harvey C. Couch is president of the Arkansas Power and Light Company, has several other power-trust connections, is an opponent of government development and management of Muscle Shoals, and is the man who persuaded Senator Robinson of Arkansas, Democratic floor leader, to support President Hoover a year ago in the fight against direct government relief for hungry farmers and workers. Jesse H. Jones has for many years been a lavish contributor to Democratic campaign funds, and was until recently treasurer of the Democratic National Committee. Wilson McCarthy, a former district attorney and judge in Utah, is a director in numerous corporations in the Mountain States. All of these men, with one exception, are now holding or have held political offices, and the exception is Mr. Jones, who for years was one of the owners of the Democratic Party. On the whole, the list is fairly representative of the type of business men and politicians who have been thoroughly discredited by their lack of effective leadership in the present depression. To them the Hoover Administration has intrusted the task of distributing a $2,000,000,000 dole to industry on the ground that this dole will help bring about an economic recovery.

NEWTON D. BAKER has convinced many politicians that he would make an ideal Presidential candidate. The owners and managers of the Democratic Party, who for months had been looking about them for a conservative candidate to oppose Franklin D. Roosevelt, had previously turned thumbs down on the former Secretary of War. He was making too many speeches in support of the League of Nations, and in these speeches he was saying all too plainly that the United States ought to join the League. Whether or not they objected to his idealism, the politicians did not like his positive views on this subject. They do not like to take chances with a candidate who is likely to offend any small part of the electorate. But Mr. Baker has seen the light. He has accommodated the Democratic conservatives—and presumably himself, though he still denies that he is a candidate—by publicly tempering his idealism. He has declared that while he still has faith in the League, he believes that the American public is not yet ready for membership, and therefore the League should not be made an issue in the approaching campaign. Of such stuff are Presidential candidates made.

ACCORDING TO THE KELLOGG PACT, the United States Government has renounced, that is to say, outlawed, war as an instrument of national policy and as a means of settling international disputes. But according to the Supreme Court, if an alien holds war to be unlawful, he may not become a citizen of the United States. To adjust this paradox Representative Griffin of New York in 1929 introduced a bill in Congress amending the naturalization laws to provide "that no person mentally, morally, and otherwise qualified shall be debarred from citizenship by reason of his or her religious views or philosophical opinions with respect to the lawfulness of war as a means of settling international disputes." The merit of this bill is self-evident. Nevertheless, it has for more than two years been blocked by the jingoists and other extreme patriots—among them Major General Amos A. Fries, Fred R. Marvin, and Miss Mary Kilbreth. They have been ably supported by Chairman Johnson of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. These superpatriots have been permitted to use the committee as a means of spreading their propaganda against pacifism. For example, the record of the committee's hearings on the bill contains twenty pages of articles and excerpts from Miss Kilbreth's magazine, the Woman Patriot. These efforts to block this very necessary legislation should be met by the united support of all proponents of peace.

THE VOLUNTARY ACCEPTANCE by the railway labor unions of a 10 per cent reduction in pay for a period of one year is one of the most cheering developments since the depression began, and ought, logically, to have a greater influence in restoring confidence than the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. For the action of the railway unions is important both directly and symbolically. Directly, it is estimated that it will save the railroads $210,000,000. This, added to the $100,000,000 or more expected from the recent freight-rate increase, will make a difference in revenues of at least $300,000,000 a year—more than half of the entire net operating income earned by the railroads in 1931. The first effect of this will be to give added security to the insurance companies and savings banks that hold so large an amount of railroad securities, and to remove the specter of bankruptcy from some of the railroads—more than seventy of them—that failed to earn their fixed charges in 1931. The next effect should be to increase the purchasing by the roads of manufactured goods and fuel; the roads make normally about $1,700,000,000 of such purchases; in 1931 these amounted to only $863,000,000. Another result, let us hope, will be an early increase in railway employment. Both the spokesmen for the unions and the spokesmen for the railways—particularly Daniel Willard—deserve congratulations for the decision. It would be extremely unfortunate, however, if employers were now to regard the admirably conciliatory action of the railway unions as the signal for a further general “deflation of labor.” Labor cannot be asked to take any greater reduction in wages than the decline in the cost of living; its proportional share in the national purchasing power must in no event be diminished.

ECONOMIC NATIONALISM continues to reach ever dizzier and more perilous heights. In the British Isles it has become an unpatriotic act not to “buy British.” It does not matter whether the goods to be bought are inferior, or are higher priced, and it does not seem to have occurred to anyone that this campaign is proving a serious blow to international trade, which is the very basis of economic prosperity in England. The important thing is that the goods must have originated in the British Isles or one of the dominions. France is moving toward the same goal by simply shutting off foreign products which the French manufacturers do not want the people to buy. Far from acting as a deterrent, this mad course has only inspired us to go and do likewise. Already there is talk of a “buy-American” campaign. President Hoover has suggested that Congress enact the necessary legislation to give American producers the preference in the purchase of supplies and materials by government departments. From governmental purchases the thing can readily spread to public buying, and to widespread demands that the tariff be raised so high as effectively to bar all foreign goods that compete with our own in the American market. We could hardly choose a more certain way of committing economic suicide.

FOR ALL PRACTICAL PURPOSES the navy seems to be pretty well in control of Hawaii. The grand jury which was to consider bringing in indictments against Mrs. Fortescue, Lieutenant Massie, and two enlisted men finally was able to find an indictment of second-degree murder. The four defendants are at liberty and “enjoying themselves,” according to reports, at Pearl Harbor Naval Station, having been released on bail, Mrs. Fortescue to the amount of $5,000, and the others at $2,500 each. Governor Judd has sent to the House a bill amending the rules of evidence which require corroboration of the victim’s identification in cases of rape. It is even being urged that Lieutenant Massie and his associates be tried by the navy, which, all things considered, might be the simplest and neatest way out of the difficulties. A Hawaiian jury would not then be obliged to feel the pressure which its protecting Power, the United States, might feel obliged to exert for an acquittal in the murder trial. And by the time the new trial of Mrs. Massie’s alleged attackers comes around, the Hawaiian law will doubtless be satisfactorily amended so that she may name the four in question, the Governor of the Territory, or Admiral Pratt himself—the fact of the rape having been completely established by hospital records—as her assailants, without fear of contradiction or another hung jury. We have not the slightest desire to see a criminal go free. But neither do we wish to see condonation of lynch law or military control of a peaceful and on the whole entirely inoffensive people.

URBANA, Illinois, took matters into its own hands the other day and saved the town. The First National and the Commercial Bank of Champaign, Urbana’s nearest neighbor, failed; rumors of a run on Urbana banks were spreading panic through the town. The Mayor took charge, called the merchants and bankers of the town into conference at 7 a. m. on Tuesday, January 12, and asked that all business except food and drug stores be closed for five days beginning at once. There was evidently not a dissenting voice at the proposal for an interregnum. The five days were used by the daily newspapers in spreading confidence among the citizens, and by the banks in urging depositors to show their faith in the town not only by refusing to make withdrawals but by increasing their deposits. When the banks reopened, deposits outnumbered withdrawals twenty-five and thirty to one, and a grand feast of mutual congratulation was indulged in by bankers, business men, and town officials. It is not known what Mr. John Smith of Urbana thought about all this business; probably, since his money appears to be for the moment safe, he is congratulating, too. Nor is there complete cause for assurance that for Urbana the economic depression is over and the good old days are here again. Nevertheless, this display of public trust and of plain common sense is somehow an encouraging spot in a generally dark scene. In so far as psychology has anything to do with economic difficulties—and it may have a good deal—some such tactics as those of Urbana might be profitable for far larger communities.

FIFTY-THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS was the price paid in the sale of the Marquess of Lothian’s library for the “Olive Branch Petition,” a document presented to His Majesty King George III in 1775, and signed by forty-six members of the Colonial Congress, among them John Hancock, Franklin, John and Samuel Adams, John Jay, and Thomas Jefferson. It was addressed: “Most Gracious Sovereign”; it began: “We, Your Majesty’s faithful subjects of the colonies”; it pleaded for peace, for cessation of the “effusion of blood” already shed at Lexington and Concord; it declared that the signers ardently desired restoration of harmony and good-will between England and her American children. In short, it asked for dominion government and declared, almost in the words of General Washington a year earlier, that “no thinking man in all North America desired independence.” The document reached England in August, but since the Colonial Secretary, Lord Dartmouth, was in the country at the time, it was not presented to him in person until September 1. Lord Dartmouth consented to receive the petition but announced that “as His Majesty did not receive it upon the throne, no answer would be given.” No answer was given—by King George. But in less than a year an answer was made: it was the Declaration of American Independence, and twenty-five of the signers of the “Olive Branch” put their names to it. It is hardly necessary to point a moral. But in India, in the Philippines, in many other quarters of the world, the alternative answer is reluctantly although irresistibly being prepared.

Dynamite at Shanghai

JAPANESE arrogance, encouraged by the treachery of Washington and Geneva to the Kellogg Pact and the Nine-Power Treaty, has resulted in an explosion at Shanghai. It is now probably too late for diplomatic action. We shall, whether we wish it or not, have to let events take their course—wherever that course may lead us. An attempt at this hour to invoke the Kellogg Pact or any other peace agreement, or to enforce an economic blockade, or to withdraw diplomatic recognition from Japan could hardly have any effect but to inflame still further the Japanese military and their government at Tokio, who already have shown that they mean to do as they please in China, though in doing so they violate every treaty in existence and set the entire world at defiance. In any case, the authorities in Washington have now taken the position that there is nothing left in the Far Eastern situation that is worth saving—except American rights. They have sent a note to Tokio, not to remind the Japanese of their obligations under the various peace agreements, nor yet to confront them with the enormity of their crime at Shanghai, but merely to insist that whatever happens in China the rights of the United States Government and of American citizens must be observed. And to support the note they have rushed additional warships to Shanghai! Defense of our national rights, though it means war, rather than defense of the peace of the world, has become our greatest concern.

Japan might have gone ahead with its program of conquest no matter what the Western world thought of its action. All the peaceful pressure Geneva and Washington could have brought to bear on the Japanese might not have served to restrain them. But the undeniable fact remains that neither the League of Nations nor the United States has to date taken a single sincere step toward saving the Kellogg Pact and the Nine-Power Treaty from destruction at the hands of the Japanese. They have lodged with Tokio not one clear, direct, and forceful protest. To this extent the Western Powers must be held morally responsible for the Japanese invasion of the Yangtze valley. It cannot honestly be argued that Mr. Stimson's note of January 7 constituted an invocation of the Kellogg Pact or any other international agreement. It was simply a warning to China and Japan to observe American rights. Nor do we find in the incomplete correspondence recently made public by the Senate any suggestion that the State Department intended to take any vigorous or straightforward action to support the peace agreements. There was in these notes an occasional expression of concern, but nothing else. The League of Nations at the start was somewhat more explicit and determined. It charged Japan with being the aggressor in Manchuria, and it set a time limit for the withdrawal of Japanese troops. But it lacked the courage to carry its decisions through to successful conclusion.

A united front by the Western Powers at the beginning of the Manchurian trouble, that is, immediately after the capture of Mukden on September 18, would very likely have told another story. Then was the time to exert economic pressure, or to withdraw diplomatic recognition from Tokio.

Then was the time, while the Japanese were still uncertain as to what effect the Mukden incident would have upon world opinion, for Geneva and Washington to have made it unmistakably clear that the world would not put up with Japanese aggression and arrogance. And the Western Powers were in an excellent position to do this. Baron Shidehara, at that time Foreign Minister of Japan, was fighting to keep the militarists in check. He had for several years been able to prevent military aggression in China. When the British and Americans shelled Nanking in March, 1927, it was largely through the influence of Shidehara and his group that the Japanese warships lying in Nanking harbor were restrained from taking part in the bombardment. There can be little doubt that if the Western Powers had openly thrown their support to Shidehara in the Mukden crisis, he would, with the help of Japanese public opinion, which is always sensitive to world opinion, have mastered the militarists. But this support was not forthcoming. Shidehara fought virtually alone. Japanese public opinion, poisoned by a carefully prepared campaign of militaristic propaganda, turned against him. Thanks to the bungling stupidity of Geneva and Washington, to put the matter in its mildest form, Shidehara was overwhelmed, and the militarists gained control. They now dominate the Japanese scene and Japanese foreign policy. Having called more than one bluff of the League of Nations since September 18, and having been given sufficient cause to believe that Washington will not act, it is inconceivable that the militarists will take seriously any further peace overtures or any sort of diplomatic pressure from the Western Powers. Washington and Geneva muffed their chance. By their action, or rather inaction, the peace machinery so painstakingly erected in the last thirteen years has been discredited, and the League of Nations in particular has been dealt a serious, if not fatal, blow. But the most immediately painful consequence of this policy is the invasion at Shanghai. Whither that tragic event will lead the world, no man can tell.

We can now only hope and pray that Washington will move with great tact in handling the Shanghai situation. Its action in sending more warships to China is a dark and dangerous omen. So delicate is the problem that the slightest misstep might readily plunge us into war. We should withdraw completely from the troubled area, taking out all our citizens, troops, and warships. The property that the government and our citizens have there, though it were worth a million-times its present value, it not worth the shedding of a single drop of blood. Our commercial treaty rights can be left to another day for consideration. We have already made it plain that we intend to safeguard those rights. It is too late to save the peace treaties, too late to prevent further Japanese aggression by peaceful persuasion, but not yet too late to save ourselves from being drawn into a Far Eastern war. In their present mood the Japanese militarists cannot be trusted. We must not by our presence in China tempt them to turn upon us. We have only one course—to withdraw now, and leave "American rights" to some future conference.

Unless We Cancel the Debts

IT has now become apparent that the probabilities are immensely against any enlightened action on war debts or reparations either from France or from America. The crushing burden on Germany, of course, cannot and will not be paid. Every unbiased observer and every recent expert committee reports this either guardedly or bluntly, and the present German crisis makes it entirely obvious. French statesmen continue to act as if they had never read the reports or heard of the crisis. As for Congress, it has gone out of its way to say quite plainly that it is opposed not only to any cancelation of the war debts, but to any reduction of them, or even any further moratorium. It has flatly refused to revive the War Debt Commission, for fear such a commission would discover that the debts had to be scaled down. In brief, it has refused to do what any intelligent banker, no matter how lacking in altruism, does—it has refused to investigate its debtors' capacity to pay. It has preferred a wilful blindness. Mr. Hoover, in his turn, has rid himself of the problem by retreating behind the absurd fiction that reparations are purely the concern of Europe.

Under such circumstances, it seems futile to continue to point out how insane our policy is. It is more profitable, perhaps, to ask ourselves what is now most likely to happen. The present moratorium on German reparations expires on July 15. The next debt payments from the Allies to ourselves are not due until December 15. It is possible, therefore, that under the pressure of events France will consent to extend the German moratorium for five months. Germany will continue to insist on a final settlement by July, but no matter what further collapse occurs in Germany, this request will probably be ignored. Farther than this slight extension of the moratorium France is extremely unlikely to go. How can the French Government be expected to consent to any reduction of the reparations worth talking about when it has had the most emphatic notice from Congress that under no circumstances will we in turn consent to deduct a penny from the war debt? What, then, will France do before the extended moratorium period expires? Doubtless it will join with England and the other Allies in requesting a further extension of the moratorium from us. If this request is made before election day, Mr. Hoover will of course refuse even to submit it to Congress. If it is made after election day, Mr. Hoover will probably submit it, but Congress will in any case reject it. The Allies will then notify us that they are taking advantage of the clause in their war-debt contracts permitting them to suspend payments for two years.

The next move will probably be Germany's. Whatever German Government is in power will demand complete cancelation of all reparations. It is possible that France will then extend the moratorium on the unconditional payments, but it is much more likely that it will refuse even that. Germany will then repudiate the reparations. This will leave several courses open to France. It may proceed to apply "sanctions" and move troops into Germany; but it may hesitate to do this through inability to see just what the troops would do when they got there. If the French seized mines, they would have to operate the mines; if they seized railroads and factories, they would have to operate them also. And this could not be done in a partial way; it would have to be done completely. The French could not operate an automobile factory, for example, unless they operated the railroad bringing raw materials to the factory and shipping out the finished product, as well as the contributing steel works, glass works, leather companies, tire companies, and so on—at least to the extent that such semi-finished materials could not be profitably imported from France or elsewhere. But obviously not a fraction of the excess skilled French labor could be found to carry on such work. It has been suggested that French industrialists might take control of German industry. But even if we assume that they could secure ownership, either of bonds or stocks, the problem of reparations would hardly be changed. True, it would cease to be a problem of taxation, but it would continue to be a problem of transfer; and if the payments existed on any scale comparable with those under the present reparations, the system would be just as certain to break down.

It is possible that much of this may become apparent to French statesmanship before any action against Germany is taken; but whether it does or not, it will become apparent very shortly after action is taken. France's next step, therefore, will be to combine with the other Allies to request an international conference for the drastic scaling down both of debts and reparations. This Congress will reject. France, England, Italy, and the rest will then notify us that they are unable to make further debt payments. Senators Borah and Johnson will make scorching statements condemning Europe for its repudiation of a sacred contract, and the American press will swell the denunciatory chorus. European statesmen and press will reply to Uncle Shylock in kind. Stocks and bonds will probably undergo another collapse; the economic crisis will become worse everywhere. Mutual bitterness and recrimination will continue for years; America and the Allies will throw up still further discriminatory tariffs against one another, and help still further to ruin one another's foreign trade. Statesmen on both sides of the water will continue to feel righteous indignation and thorough self-satisfaction.

Such is the future we have to look forward to if we base our view on a cold weighing of the probabilities. Events may not occur in the order named; but the final result can hardly fail to be the same. There is, of course, one chance in ten that a miracle will happen, and that Congress and the Administration will forgive the debts purely out of intelligent selfishness. In that case, of course, we shall not get our money either, but we shall at least have the world's goodwill, and in such an atmosphere confidence and trade would rise like a submerged raft from which a great rock has been rolled off. There is a huge psychological difference, which we have not yet remotely begun to appreciate, between what follows when a creditor forgives a debt and what follows when a debtor repudiates it. It remains to be seen whether that difference can be understood before it is altogether too late.

A Lesson for Candidates

A CONVENTION of Ohio ministers met in Cleveland late in January and delivered themselves of some conclusions that were admirably plain-spoken. At a time when pussy-footing is practiced by nine public men out of ten, when ninety-nine out of a hundred words uttered for public consumption are mealy-mouthed, cautious, weasel, and with an eye to the main chance, plain speaking is as refreshing as spring showers on packed winter earth. The 400 ministers who met in Cleveland discussed war. They said:

We are convinced that war is un-Christian, futile, and suicidal, and we renounce completely the whole war system. We will never again sanction or participate in any war. We will not use our pulpits or classrooms as recruiting stations. We set ourselves to educate and lead youth in the principles and practice of good-will, justice, understanding, brotherhood, and peace. We will not give our financial or moral support to any war.

The ministers did not stop here. They added:

Governments which ignore the Christian conscience of men in time of peace cannot justly claim the lives of men in time of war. We deplore making military service against conscience a test of citizenship, as in the Macintosh case, and military training a requirement in education, as in our land-grant colleges. . . . Therefore be it resolved that we . . . solemnly refuse to acknowledge the obligation which the Supreme Court declares to be binding upon its citizens. . . . We will use whatever influence is within our power, in our personal relations or in public address, to inform others and to awaken them to the peril in which this decision involves their traditional and most fundamental liberty.

The ministers also had a few words to say about unemployment. Asking themselves whether "men have a right to expect a job and whether society has an obligation to provide it," they answered:

The present industrial and economic order which assumes the right to accumulate profits large or small in unequal and inordinate distribution must take also the responsibility for work and working conditions for those who are the producers of such favorable balances.

Going on to a further consideration of our economic structure, the resolutions indorsed the principle of unemployment insurance and of "greater federal supervision of the industrial program of competition," declared protective tariffs a "constant source of friction," and recommended that the United States "take the initiative in repudiating the traditional method of intervention by armed force to protect the lives and business interests of its citizens in other lands."

It is true that only 400 men indorsed these sentiments; it is true also that many of the resolutions were bitterly fought and were only carried by the force and persuasiveness of the younger group in the convention. But they were all carried. One wonders what would happen if any one of the estimable gentlemen who are at present angling for the Presidential nomination with a leg on either side of every political fence should be as forthright. Obviously these aspirants to high office believe that to do so would lose them votes. There is a possibility that just the opposite is the case.

Minneapolis Morals

WE have had occasion before to comment upon choice bits culled from the showman's Bible Variety. Into the somewhat sheltered life of a Nation editor this admirable weekly brings news of a world which Mr. Mencken would appropriately describe as "gaudy," and we recommend it heartily to those who are interested in manners and morals but who find themselves cursed with any sort of tender-mindedness. Little incidents in which others would find, at the very least, an editorial "cause for alarm" are merely facts to Variety, and there was probably never before any journal which so completely accepted—without ever having heard of it—the doctrine that morals are merely mores. In the show business it is frankly only a question of what one can get away with in New York, or Chicago, or Duluth.

Consider, for example, the front page of a recent issue. Who would not be intrigued by the dispatch from Los Angeles describing the success of various "Park 'n' Drink Night Spots" which employ houris to supply highball "set-ups" to "the tired business man too tired to climb out of his car"? And who could fail to be further impressed by the managerial astuteness which provides that the hostesses (limited one to a car) are supposed to go no farther than the running-board, or by the further comment that the "amount of whoopee permitted is also strictly controlled, as the outdoor spots are too close to busy corners to tip the lid all the way." Then there is a dispatch headed "Baptists and Wrestlers Conflict in Atlanta," which promises to be interesting and is, but we are most impressed with the news from Minneapolis. It is headed "Minne. Burlesque Chorus Boys Flop; Cops Pass Strip Dancing in the Dark," and we shall quote it in full with the remark that those to whom the language is strange will find the effort to master it worth while:

The Gaiety (burlesque) has dismissed its male choristers and substituted dancing in the dark à la strip by the girls. The cops have okayed the scanty shaking as long as the bulbs don't glow while the gals quiver. The first and only male chorus line ever known in burlesque didn't last long.

As runway attractions the masculine group failed to lure sufficient feminine trade to warrant retention despite the free exposure of manly figures up and down the orchestra gangplank.

A nudist's conception of the art of Terpsichore, as specially interpreted by Hinda Wausau, has the approval of the police, providing the management pulls down the dimmers and thereby aggravates the customers. The head electrician stands a chance of becoming one of the most popular guys in town with a swell opportunity for side coin to miss a cue or two.

We have nothing but pity for that part of mankind which will pay money for the privilege of imagining what it could see if it could see anything at all, but we wonder if the cops are wise. From what we have heard tell, burlesque queens become less seductive in exact proportion to the clarity with which they stand revealed, and if we were managing the morality of Minneapolis we should provide that such performers could appear undraped only under a double spotlight.

How Many Hungry?*

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

HOW many people are hungry in the United States today? How many are in desperate need and are getting no relief, or at best only the barest minimum of help, all too inadequate, from public and private charities? How much money is needed to give these people, not the comforts to which they may have been accustomed under their former standard of living, but just enough bread, clothing, shelter, and medical attention to keep them from suffering and from possible death by starvation, to prevent disease and permanent physical disablement for their children, and to stop from spreading through the country that demoralizing feeling of insecurity which has already reduced hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of Americans to dangerous despair?

Lastly, where is this money to come from? Nobody seems to know. No one seems to have the slightest idea as to the number of persons actually in need, the amount of money necessary to help them, or the sources from which these funds can best be obtained.

A subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Manufactures has been seeking the answers to these pressing questions. It has heard the testimony of dozens of persons, most of them experienced social workers who have been in close and constant touch with the vast financial and human problems directly involved. It has listened to public officials and trade-union leaders, industrialists and journalists qualified to interpret public opinion, and it even went to the unprecedented length of hearing a representative of the unemployed, though this man came uninvited and was shown scant courtesy when he demanded to be heard. But these experts were unable to give an all-inclusive picture of the problem facing the country. Estimates of the number of unemployed were given guardedly and ranged from six million to twelve million for the nation as a whole. In Chicago, said Samuel A. Goldsmith, director of the Jewish charities of that city, "40 per cent of all people who may work, are able to work, and are willing to work have no work!" In New York City the number of unemployed was placed at more than a million; in Pennsylvania at approximately 900,000. But the national figures were only guessed at, and nowhere was there any agreement as to how many needy persons these statistics represented. Some of the social workers said that on the average there were three persons in need for every one unemployed, but the public officials and industrialists challenged this proportion as "too extravagant."

Again, though the witnesses could give in detail the extent and character of their own local problems, they had little or no knowledge of conditions beyond their communities. A few experts, such as Ralph G. Hurlin, statistician of the Russell Sage Foundation, were able to present surveys of the amount of relief extended in various of the larger cities, but their testimony failed to cover many other cities, and omitted whole sections of the country. Nor were these experts able to state with any precision what the needs of the immediate future might be. Some hope, based on many uncertain and variable factors, was held out that the larger municipalities would be able to care for their own unfortunates, but this hope did not extend to the smaller communities and the farming areas. Mr. Hurlin declared that "organized relief is limited pretty much to the cities." He was "decidedly" of the opinion that a vast majority of the smaller communities and the rural districts were doing "relatively little in efficient administration of relief." Benson Y. Landis, executive secretary of the American Country Life Association, emphasized the growing need for relief in the farming areas. Within the last few years, he said, "many of the farms have become a refuge for persons unemployed." The depression is forcing people to desert the cities and return to their relatives and former homes, not to take up farming anew, but in the hope of obtaining shelter and something to eat. The counties cannot carry all these people. They derive revenue primarily from real-estate taxes, and, according to Mr. Landis, "we have certainly about reached the limit in taxing farm property."

Private contributions to unemployment-relief work have fallen far behind the rapidly growing demand for relief. Herbert Benjamin, representative of the Unemployed Councils of the United States, stated his belief that the unemployed will never get the help they need until every man in Congress "is shivering in his very pants because he thinks the unemployed are going to engage in struggle if they do not get something." That fear of disturbances has proved a stimulus to private contributions was shown by Mr. Goldsmith. He declared that "one little rent riot on the South Side in the Negro district" turned out to be of great help in the Chicago drive for funds. But apparently there have not been enough rent riots. Jacob Billikopf, director of the Federation of Jewish Charities in Philadelphia, submitted a letter stating that data from 130 cities revealed an increase in private contributions of only 14.3 per cent in 1931 as compared with 1930. "Yet relief demands in every American city," the letter continued, "show an increase quite out of proportion to this gain. Philadelphia's relief expenditures during September of this year were 404 per cent above September, 1930; Chicago's 267 per cent; New York's 125 per cent; Cleveland's 134 per cent; St. Louis's 214 per cent." Allen T. Burns, executive director of the Association of Community Chests and Councils, said that there had been an increase of 59 per cent in relief allotments by private charities affiliated with his organization, but declared that this "should be compared with the fact that relief expenditures in these communities are now averaging more than 200 per cent of those of a year ago." And, he warned, "there is no sign of abatement in these increased demands, and so no prospect of sufficient private funds to meet them."

Still another problem that has received almost no consideration is that of the migrant families and individuals, who, because they have no definite residence, receive no relief from local governments or charity organizations. Every community has made it a strict rule to provide for its own people first, and there is hardly a community to be found anywhere that can, with the funds available, meet this primary requirement in anything like adequate fashion. The importance of this much-neglected problem was stressed by J. Prentice Murphy, director of the Children's Bureau of Philadelphia, who asserted that "the actual number of unsettled migrants in terms of families and individuals may run up as high as 2,000,000."

* The first of a series of articles by Mr. Hallgren on unemployment in the United States. Others will appear in subsequent issues.—EDITOR THE NATION.

What of the communities where relief is organized and presumably efficient? "The total amount of money which is in sight at the present time," said William Hodson, executive director of the Welfare Council of New York City, "is not sufficient to care for the families and individuals who are going to be in need of help and assistance this winter." More than 250,000 families in New York City are in need, he declared, but of this number only 100,000 families are receiving assistance. In Chicago, where 40 per cent of the eligible workers are unemployed, only $100,000 a day is available to take care of families who are losing $2,000,000 daily in wages. Even these people must reduce themselves to the status of paupers before they can get help. "We insist that the people who come to our private and our public agencies," said Mr. Goldsmith, "shall use up, absolutely use up and come to us empty-handed, all their available resources. We ask them to borrow on their insurance policies and to reduce their equities in their policies. I think if this committee can get the information from the various large insurance companies as to the amounts of money that have been loaned on policies in the last two years, policies of $5,000 or under particularly, I think you will be amazed at the huge sums that people have actually borrowed on their estates. We would ask people—and it is not possible any longer to do so in Chicago and Cook County—if it were possible we would ask people to take out second and third mortgages on their homes. Indeed, one of our most serious problems in Cook County is to help the home owner, because Cook County's Department of Public Welfare does not, under the law, help home owners—and these people cannot eat their homes; they must have food, which the department is not furnishing."

Miss Dorothy Kahn, of Philadelphia, told of the struggle to provide relief in that city. Lack of funds to pay rent owed by the families of the unemployed is one of the main difficulties, she said, and as a result there have been many evictions and considerable overcrowding. "The evictions in Philadelphia," according to Miss Kahn, "are frequently accompanied not only by the ghastly placing of a family's furniture on the street, but the actual sale of the family's household goods by the constable." "We have no measure in Philadelphia today," she said, "of the overcrowding that is a direct or indirect result of our inability to pay rent for families. Only the other day a case came to my attention in which a family of ten had just moved in with a family of five in a three-room apartment. However shocking that may be to members of this committee, it is almost an everyday occurrence in our midst. Neighbors do take people in. They sleep on chairs, they sleep on the floor. There are conditions in Philadelphia that beggar description. There is scarcely a day that calls do not come to all of our offices to find somehow a bed or a chair. The demand for boxes on which people can sit or stretch themselves is hardly to be believed."

Mr. Billikopf showed what is happening to these unemployed persons from another angle. Twenty-four hundred families applied for small loans from a fund that had been made available by a few wealthy Philadelphia residents, which was intended to take care of "such of the unemployed as were too proud to apply to the charities for help." The families, said Mr. Billikopf, "filled out simple questionnaires, giving place of residence, type of employment in which they were engaged, and indebtedness. And here is a very significant fact. The schedules of the 2,400 families showed that they had exhausted all of their savings either with banks or with building-and-loan associations. These amounted to $700,000. But this is only part of the picture. These 2,400 families were in debt to their landlords, butchers, grocers, milkmen, and so on to the extent of $1,300,000. . . . Only 513 secured loans. In the case of the others it was felt that it would be an unfortunate imposition to burden them with loans when they were already so heavily in debt, without the least possibility of ever meeting their obligations."

Similarly discouraging reports were made by witnesses from other large communities. But it is in these communities that relief is best organized. One wonders what is happening in the smaller cities and towns, such as Moline, Illinois, where, according to a report from the Illinois Department of Labor which was read into the record, employment decreased 74.4 per cent in the period from September 15, 1929, to November 15, 1931, and pay rolls in the same period dropped 84.5 per cent! One might also be curious to know what is taking place in some of the smaller towns in Pennsylvania. Governor Gifford Pinchot has received many letters from constituents begging for help. A number of these he introduced into the Senate committee's record; two of them follow:

DEAR GOVERNOR PINCHOT: I am in trouble and I cannot think any more. I am writing you that you may advise me what to do. I have ten children and lived in . . . three years ago. My husband got out of work and could not get any. He tried everywhere. My husband and I have our children and don't want to part with them. Some people tell us to drown some of them in the lake. Is there any way the government could get a small farm and pay as rent as I would like to have some place to live in peace?

DEAR GOVERNOR PINCHOT: I am sending this letter to you and your wife to ask you won't you please and help me. I have six little children to take care of. I have been out of work for over a year and a half. Am back almost thirteen months and the landlord says if I don't pay up before the 1 of 1932 out I must go, and where am I to go in the cold winter with my children? If you can help me please for God's sake and the children's sakes and lives please do what you can and send me some help, will you? I cannot find any work. I am willing to take any kind of work if I could get it now. Thanksgiving dinner was black coffee and bread and was very glad to get it. My wife is in the hospital now. We have no shoes to wear; no clothes, hardly. Of what will I do I sure will thank you.

A pitifully small measure of rural relief is being extended by the American Friends Service Committee, according to Clarence E. Pickett, its secretary. "Last spring," Mr. Pickett said, "the chief of the Children's Bureau, Miss Abbott, and the assistant director of the President's Committee on Unemployment Relief, Mr. Croxton, came to us with disturbing stories about the situation in some of the mining communities, particularly in West Virginia and Kentucky, where the miners were suffering from lack of food and clothing. They asked us if we would consider going in to see that the worst spots were taken care of, particularly the children in those spots. They would like to have had us cover the whole need, but we are a small organization with limited resources." The Friends agreed to go in, however, and have been doing what they can to the utmost of their resources and ability. Mr. Pickett said one of the committee's chief difficulties was to get at some of the "small mines, often located in very out-of-the-way places. . . little, isolated communities where the mine has closed and where the miners have not got out. Even where some have left, there is still a residue left in the company houses, and they are often in very serious distress."

Frank Bane, director of the American Association of Public Welfare Officials, presented a report covering a country-wide survey of relief conditions made by his organization. Again and again in the report there were references to situations in desperate need of attention. Both Williamson and Franklin counties in Illinois, for example, "have deplorable conditions, with the counties literally bankrupt, county relief cut off, banks closed, and few mines running even on part time. People literally have no money, and there is actual destitution and suffering in abandoned mining villages."

That the need is great, that the "calamity we are facing now," to quote one of the witnesses, "will turn out to be much worse than any catastrophe of war" can hardly be doubted. The social workers who testified have their special jobs to attend to; they cannot be expected to have information covering the whole country; they cannot be expected to work out a nation-wide program of relief. For this task one naturally looks to the President's Organization on Unemployment Relief, the only national body solely and directly concerned with the problem. One looks more particularly to the director of that organization, Walter S. Gifford. He was the industrial genius, the master-mind, whose great organizing skill was to go far toward solving the problem. What does he or his organization know of the scope and details of the relief question? Can they tell us how many hungry people there are in America, or how much money is needed to feed and clothe these people? Mr. Gifford's own testimony on this point is most eloquent. Let the record speak for itself:

SENATOR COSTIGAN: How many people are out of work and on the verge of want in the United States?

MR. GIFFORD: I do not think anybody knows, but I will give you a guess.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: You are in an exceptionally good position to make an estimate, are you not?

MR. GIFFORD: Well, I could make a total estimate, but when you come to every little village, town, and hamlet, it is difficult.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: Before you make your estimate, will you tell us what you actually do know as head of the President's Unemployment Relief Committee as to present actual needs in the United States? Is your definite information as to unemployment needs confined to certain cities in the United States?

MR. GIFFORD: Well, I have no definite information, nor has any city definite information.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: You do not know definitely how many unemployed persons in need of assistance are to be found within the borders of the Union at this time?

MR. GIFFORD: No; and you could not know, because

I have people that I individually am helping and undoubtedly you are and they are in need of assistance, but there is no record of that and never will be.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: We have had, however, some very definite estimates as to unemployment in certain parts of the country. They have been obviously conservative estimates, but a committee reported that last summer in Pennsylvania there were between 900,000 and 1,000,000 unemployed. The present estimate puts the figure in Pennsylvania somewhat in excess of 1,000,000 people. Do you regard that as a conservative estimate?

MR. GIFFORD: I do not know. I think that might be all right. I do not know what the working population of Pennsylvania is.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: We have had estimates of New York City of approximately 750,000 people out of work and more or less in need at this time. Do you agree with that as a conservative estimate?

MR. GIFFORD: I think I do. I think that is perhaps all right.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: We have had a corresponding estimate for the State of New York, where, it is stated, there are in excess of 1,500,000 people out of work and more or less in need. Is that in accordance with your understanding?

MR. GIFFORD: There may be that number out of work, but I do not know as I would classify the whole million and a half as in need.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: Could you give us your estimate of how many in New York State are in need?

MR. GIFFORD: No; I could not.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: Can you make an estimate for Illinois, where we were advised the other day there are approximately 1,100,000 unemployed?

MR. GIFFORD: I could not do that.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: Is your information similarly indefinite with respect to the rest of the country?

MR. GIFFORD: Yes, sir.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: The best information I believe we have is in the cities where relief work is more or less organized and community chests have been operating. Am I correct about that?

MR. GIFFORD: I think the best statistics would be available there; yes.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: Do you know or does anyone else whom you can turn to know what the relief needs are in the smaller cities which have no community-chest organizations?

MR. GIFFORD: No; I do not know.

SENATOR COSTIGAN: Do you know what the relief needs are in the rural districts of the United States?

MR. GIFFORD: No.

But enough. There are pages upon pages of this sort of testimony from Mr. Gifford. However, toward the end he struck a note of hope, and this was remarked by Senator Costigan. "I find it pleasant to be hopeful," Mr. Gifford replied. Mr. Hodson, of New York City, was likewise hopeful. "I believe," he said, "that nobody will starve to death in New York City this winter on the basis of the funds which are now available." An hour later Mr. Murphy, of Philadelphia, was reminding the Senate committee that hungry people "do not die quickly. You can starve for a long while without dying." With his lack of information Mr. Gifford may be hopeful, but in the meantime many of our millions of unemployed will be facing the prospect of starving "for a long while without dying."

America's Role at the Conference*

By DAVID W. WAINHOUSE

THE United States will hold the balance of power at the General Disarmament Conference. No other nation stands in such a position to swing the conference into high success as does the United States. But the forces which have contributed to her greatness as the leading world Power are the very forces which now hold her from sharing the responsibilities and obligations of world leadership. Geography has decreed for her security, and the political philosophy of a nineteenth-century agricultural society the tradition of isolation. The twentieth century finds the United States preeminent in the Western Hemisphere, still secured by the Atlantic on the east and the Pacific on the west, with an agricultural society transformed into an industrial one. This transformation in the structure of American society, as in the societies of many other nations, has led to a material interdependence of states which cannot be squared with the tradition of isolation. No longer does the United States live within the confines of a defined geographic area, but in the world. Thus, while the new economic life has outstripped national boundaries, it seems hardly to have been taken account of by the politicians, who still continue to worship isolation with an eighteenth-century mentality. The world will be thrust back to a parochial economy if it does not reconcile the material interdependence of states with their political autonomy.

Isolation, or, stated in another way, Senatorial aversion to political commitments in Europe, has driven the State Department to espouse the "disarmament-school" philosophy, a philosophy which conceives armaments as dependent on technical quantity rather than on political quality. Yet the little progress which has been made in agreement on naval armaments between the United States, Great Britain, and Japan denies the utility of the "disarmament-school" thesis. Naval agreements between these Powers were made possible only because naval armaments were approached in political and not in technical or mathematical terms.

When, in 1921, Mr. Hughes proposed the 5:5:3 capital-ship symbol for the United States, Great Britain, and Japan, political questions forced themselves in by more than one door, and the Washington conference on the reduction and limitation of armaments resolved itself into a conference on the politics of the Pacific and the Atlantic.

The problem of security—that old League problem—then raised its head in a different guise before tons and guns could be measured. It was met for the United States when the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which constituted a threat against her, was canceled; it was met for Japan when the three greatest naval Powers agreed to maintain the status quo of fortifications and naval bases within a specified area of the Pacific Ocean; it was met for Japan again in the Four-Power Consultation Pact, which, in effect, assured her against an Anglo-American naval combination in the Pacific; it was met for Great Britain and the United States in the Atlantic when Great Britain acceded to the demands of the United States for equality with respect to naval strength.

Thus, not until political foundations were laid was an agreement on naval armaments between these three nations possible. The experience and lessons of the Washington conference of 1921-22, of the abortive Geneva naval conference of 1927, and of the London naval conference of 1930 are sufficiently dear and clear for the United States to judge the future by the past.

Before discussing how much the United States has contributed to laying a political groundwork for the limitation and reduction of armaments in the preparatory stages of the conference, let us consider the three major technical problems which the American delegation will have to face at Geneva—trained reserves, battleships, and budgetary limitation.

Trained Reserves. The issue here is whether trained reserves should be included in estimating the military strength of a nation. The United States has held that trained reserves should be counted in measuring a nation's military strength. Ambassador Hugh Gibson, in setting forth the American view before the Preparatory Commission, contended that "a nation which possesses an adequately equipped trained reserve is in a position promptly to undertake offensive battle." France, however, speaking for herself as well as for the other nations with a compulsory military system, has refused to yield and has declared that "the safeguarding of the vital principles underlying her national defense does not allow her to make any concessions in regard to trained reserves." In the sixth session of the Preparatory Commission (April, 1929) the United States abandoned her opposition and deferred to the views of the conscriptionist nations for the sake of reaching an agreement. With Great Britain and this country committed to let France have her own way in the matter of trained reserves, French armed dominance on the continent of Europe becomes assured. It is idle for the United States to argue that the problem of limiting land armies is purely a European problem and no concern to her as a military nation. While it is true that the American army is on a skeleton basis and constitutes no threat to any Power, the question whether or not France is to remain in complete military domination over Europe is of the greatest importance to the United States as well as to the rest of the world. The disparity existing between Germany and her former allies, who are in a condition of practical disarmament, as against France and her military allies, who have increased their armaments, "has produced an instability of attitude in the center of Europe, which attitude has produced repercussions of a political and financial nature which extend far beyond Europe." The quoted words are those which Secretary of State Stimson used before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. To allow France and her allies to continue in the possession of these huge armies is simply to perpetuate the condition of European instability with its resulting world chaos.

Battleships. At the present time the United States is the only nation which insists upon the retention of battleships of 35,000 tons. To cut down the size of these battleships, argue the professional sailors, would place the United States in a position of relative naval inferiority with respect to Great Britain and Japan. The American battleship fleet is in a "period of transition," and the destiny of battleships must wait until the naval conference which is scheduled to meet in 1935.

* An introductory article by Mr. Wainhouse, The Disarmament Conference Meets, appeared in last week's issue.—EDITOR THE NATION.

There can be little doubt that ever since the Washington conference battleships have started their march to the grave. No nation has laid down any new battleships since 1921, and not even France or Italy has exercised the right accorded by the Washington conference to replace the 70,000 tons of obsolete battleships.

Great Britain favors not only the reduction of the size of battleships but their eventual abolition. She has already indicated that at the conference she will press for a reduction in the size of battleships. In this she will have the support of France and Italy, and the cooperation of Japan. If the United States resists she will be placed in a position of being the lone defender of these costly floating mastodons.

Budgetary Limitation. The United States has consistently objected to limiting armaments by limiting the amount to be spent on them. She and Germany are the two Powers that have interposed a veto whenever the issue arose in the Preparatory Commission. The German objection has been based on the convincing argument that it is not fair to add budgetary limitation on top of the direct limitation already imposed on her by the Treaty of Versailles. Germany, by unlimited expenditure, has in the past decade made up in quality what she lacks in quantity. The American objection has never been made clear. In 1927 Mr. Gibson contended that it would be unjust to the United States to compare her armament expenditures with those of other countries in view of the higher cost basis. That is a sound argument. But no one has ever suggested that the comparison should be made between the military budgets of one country and those of another, but rather between the succeeding annual budgets of the same country. When the high-cost argument was shown to be based on a misunderstanding of the workings of the principle, it was suggested that budgetary limitation would be unconstitutional inasmuch as the Senate, by a treaty, could not contract away the appropriation power of the House. This argument, too, seems unreal. If the number of battleships the navy is to possess can be limited by the treaty-making power, why cannot a treaty limit the amount to be spent on them? Another argument which has been advanced is that the budgetary system of limitation is an impossible one from the point of accountancy. If the War Department spends money on harbor and river improvements and conducts in part some of the insular affairs, how, it is asked, can the war items be kept separate from the non-war items? But no accountant worthy of the name, not even a government accountant, would take this argument seriously.

Budgetary limitation is something which is readily understood by the man in the street. It is effective, clear, controllable, and workable. It is the only way the world can know what its war bill is. The Budgetary Experts' Committee has reported that it is a practicable method and has drawn up a definite plan for the conference to consider. The United States virtually holds the sole veto of this system of limitation. It seems incredible that Mr. Stimson and Mr. Hoover, who are anxious to cooperate whole-heartedly in making the conference a success, will hold out against budgetary limitation. They should subscribe to this method notwithstanding the desire of the big-navy interests to build up to the levels of the London naval treaty.

Mathematical formulae, symbolic ratios, and technical criteria alone will not solve the problem of aggressive armaments which exist to carry out national policies. The problem of disarmament is fundamentally political, and the solution of it lies outside the mere consideration of the technical problems in the limitation and reduction of armaments. To what use will these armaments be put? This is the question which France has put to the world, and the United States, as a leading member in the world community, will have to give an answer. Self-defense? The term is a blind. At the London naval conference the respective chiefs of the five Powers all pleaded that their armaments were purely defensive; yet it was the fear that these might be used offensively which brought them together. And it is the same fear which is bringing them together again at Geneva.

America's foreign policy is at stake in the disarmament conference. Aloofness from European politics has been one of the permanent bases of America's foreign policy. It has been a policy which has prevented Great Britain from taking her obligations under the League Covenant seriously. If France should again request from Great Britain military guaranties as a quid pro quo for armament reduction, the answer will depend largely on what the United States will do in case Great Britain is called upon to honor her military commitments on the continent of Europe. Will the United States insist on her neutral rights and attempt to give aid and comfort to a nation which has broken the pledge to settle all disputes by peaceful means when the British navy is engaged in running down the aggressor? Great Britain's attitude toward the League is dependent upon the answer to this question.

The disarmament policy of the United States has been shaped and in large measure dictated by the Senate under its constitutional authority of giving advice and consent to agreements entered into by the Executive. The Senatorial habit of modifying and amending treaties, even of rejecting them entirely, has made the State Department a creature of the Senate. While the State Department has become international-minded, the Senate remains incased in the eighteenth-century political thought still current in the regions of Idaho. The Senator who votes to outlaw war one day demands the codification of the laws of war the next.

Under these circumstances the State Department has shown daring and courage in the preparatory stages of the conference, not only in having adhered to a consultation clause, but in having initiated and proposed it. This is a matter of far-reaching importance and has not received the attention which it deserves. The consultation clause is Article 50 of the Draft Convention and is worth quoting in full:

If, during the term of the present convention, a change of circumstances constitutes, in the opinion of any High Contracting Party, a menace to its national security, such High Contracting Party may suspend temporarily, in so far as concerns itself, any provision or provisions of the present convention, other than those expressly designed to apply in the event of war, provided:

(a) That such Contracting Party shall immediately notify the other Contracting Parties and at the same time the Permanent Disarmament Commission, through the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, of such temporary suspension, and of the extent thereof.

(b) That simultaneously with the said notification, the Contracting Party shall communicate to the other Contracting Parties, and at the same time to the Permanent Disarmament Commission through the Secretary-General, a full explanation of the change of circumstances referred to above.

Thereupon the other High Contracting Parties shall promptly advise as to the situation thus presented.

When the reasons for such temporary suspension have ceased to exist, the said High Contracting Party shall reduce its armaments to the level agreed upon in the convention, and shall make immediate notification to the other Contracting Parties.

The principle of international consultation will form the center toward which the problem of the limitation and reduction of armaments will gravitate at Geneva. It will be the heart of the arms agreement.

The consultation clause bears interestingly on the Briand-Kellogg pact. For the past two years Mr. Stimson has had it in mind to propose the adding of a "third article" to the pact, an article which would oblige the signatories to consult in case of a violation or a threatened violation. Consultation envisaged in Article 50 provides this "third article." In fact, Article 50 brings within the orbit what the pact by implication excepted, namely, a war of self-defense when that war is coupled with a suspension or violation of the arms agreement. In this respect it encompasses a wider range of action, for it involves questions of war whether defensive or offensive. The United States is thus doing through an arms agreement what President Wilson attempted in part to do through the Covenant of the League of Nations more than a decade ago.

Consultation under Article 50 is the first stage preceding its very object—combined international action against the disturber of the peace. It is a form of sanction, and since it operates automatically, it may in time change the character of private war.

The primary task of the General Disarmament Conference is to build the political foundations for an arms agreement. The conference can begin by setting up a Permanent Disarmament Commission (discussed in the first article), by concluding an agreement to consult, and by limiting armaments by the budgetary method. This must be the groundwork in the immensely complicated business of disarmament. If the American delegation returns with an arms agreement incorporating these three principles, it will have reached the first stage in the difficult journey. And the Senate, however isolationist, will not dare to reject it if American public opinion is bent on sharing the responsibilities for building a well-ordered world.

Bakers' Bread: Costly and Tasteless

By WINIFRED RAUSHENBUSH

AS everybody knows, we have a wheat surplus. And as everybody knows, the unemployed and 2,000,000 wheat farmers are tightening their belts. Bankruptcies in the wheat regions are increasing at a shocking rate, and the United States Department of Agriculture predicts that the American wheat farmer will not sell much wheat to Europe before 1935 or 1936, and that he had better face the fact that he may, in the future, have to produce wheat for the domestic market only. What is the wheat farmer to do?

Between 1904 and 1914 Americans consumed 80 per cent of the American wheat crop. At no time has our population consumed less than 60 per cent of the wheat raised in this country. The American wheat farmer's biggest customer is, obviously, the American people. And how is the wheat farmer getting on with his biggest customer? Very poorly. The per capita consumption of wheat has been declining steadily since 1913. According to the Food Research Institute of Stanford University, the per capita consumption of wheat specifically for food, rather than for other purposes, is lower in the United States than in any other country for which there are trustworthy statistics. Under the Czar, Ivan Smith of Russia ate 2.9 bushels of wheat. He now eats 4.1 bushels. At the time Ivan Smith was eating 2.9 bushels—in 1909-10—John Smith of America was eating 5.3 bushels. Today he is eating only 4.6 bushels. What is the trouble? What is wrong with the American wheat farmer's biggest and most important customer?

The trouble is that Americans don't eat wheat; they eat bread. Midway between the American people and the American farmer with his unsold wheat, which in July, 1930, amounted to 265,000,000 bushels, stands a middleman—the baking industry. What is wrong with the bread produced by the American baking industry? Isn't it wrapped in glazed paper? Isn't it strictly fresh? Isn't it delivered twice a day to suburban back doors by ardent bread salesmen, at the cost of an extra cent a pound? Isn't it "the Kind Mother Used to Make"? It is not. Half of the bread eaten by contemporary Americans and most of the bread eaten by Americans living in cities is bakers' bread. The trouble with bakers' bread is that the Joneses don't like it and the Sweeneys can't afford it.

In 1919 there were about 300,000 baking establishments in the country, 279,000 of which, or 93 per cent, were run by hole-in-the-cellar bakers, who produced about one-half of the bread and collected about one-half of the profits of the industry. None of these 279,000 small bakers produced more than $20,000 worth of bakery products annually. The other half of the profits went to 21,000 big bakers, including such companies as Ward, Continental, General, and Purities, none of which produced less than $100,000 worth of bakery products annually. These 21,000 bakers, representing only 7 per cent of the industry, were able to produce about half of America's bread and collect about half of the profits. That their production volume is as high as stated is shown not only by the Kyrk and Davis monograph, "The Baking Industry," which appeared in 1922, but by a report of the Federal Trade Commission published in 1928, which says:

Probably one-half or more of the total commercial bread is produced and sold by a comparatively small number of companies. In 1925, 57 companies, including three chain-store systems operating 278 plants, produced and sold more than 30 per cent of the total commercial production of that year.

It is highly probable that if the big bakers chose, they could do better than this. They do not choose. The relation between the big bakers and the little bakers is extremely cooperative. The big bakers do not push the little baker out of existence; they help him. The help is extended through the officials of bakers' associations. The secretary of one of these associations said of his work: "It's a great deal of satisfaction attending some of these smaller meetings where the bakers need some practical help in ironing out their difficulties. Some of the work may touch on the illegal, but without it many would drag along broke or near-broke." The little baker helps the big baker by charging a high price for bread, because he is poor and inefficient and his production costs are high, and the big baker helps the little baker by not undercutting the little bakers' price. This arrangement enables the little baker to remain in existence, and the big baker to collect the huge profits which are the difference between a low cost of production and a high price.

The price of bread increased by 35 per cent between 1913 and 1927. During the seven prosperous years between 1922 and 1929 it averaged 9.1 cents, as contrasted with a pre-war price of 5.9 cents and a 1931 depression price which occasionally reached a low of 5 cents per pound. It is difficult to find any sound economic reason for the high price of bread during the nineteen twenties. The wheat farmer was already in distress in 1923, when his export markets collapsed, and the present wheat surplus has been piling up since 1925. Dr. Kyrk, of the department of economics of the University of Chicago, states in her monograph referred to above that statistics showed that prior to 1922 rents, taxes, wages, salaries, and total specified costs were lower in the baking industry than the average for manufacturing industries generally. According to the cost-of-living index of the National Conference Board, the index of bread has been from 2 to 24 points higher than the average for food prices generally during the ten years between 1920 and 1930. The Federal Trade Commission, which made an investigation of the baking industry between 1924 and 1928, cites the case of Mr. Win Campbell, president of the Campbell Baking Company, who lowered the price of his bread to 5.7 cents a pound in 1922, when bread was 8.7 cents a pound. On being asked to resign from a bakers' association of which he happened to be president, Mr. Campbell assured the other bakers that he could sell bread at this price and still make a profit. The commission's report notes that a few years later Mr. Campbell's company was again charging the customary prices of the industry. There is, finally, the testimony of the trade press. The Northwestern Miller of January 28, 1925, says:

For three full years the baking industry has enjoyed an enormous unearned increment. In all this time the retail price of bread fluctuated hardly at all, while the cost of raw materials went steadily down until last summer. No wonder it seemed that commercial baking was an inexhaustible gold mine.

In 1924 the Senate asked the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the baking industry. The Senate suspected that bread prices were being maintained at an extraordinarily high and uniform level by price fixing and some form of monopoly. Its research agent, the Federal Trade Commission, was not able to prove this. But its report did indicate quite clearly the methods by which bread prices remained uniform and high.

In making their golden profits the big bakers of the industry follow five simple principles: first, never lower the price of bread unless you have to; second, raise the price of bread when wheat goes up; third, if investigated, push the hole-in-the-cellar baker and his high-production costs to the fore; fourth, maintain high prices by being kind to the little baker; fifth, work out an essential monopoly among the big baking companies by means of joint stock ownership and interlocking directorates, but do not let this monopoly become overt.

One of the methods which the baking industry used to raise the price of bread at a time when the price of wheat had gone up will illustrate its general procedure. In 1925 the price of flour was raised from $1.27 to $1.45. On January 30, 1925, Dr. Harry Everett Barnard, secretary-treasurer of the American Bakers Association, was interviewed by the Chicago Tribune. On January 31 the Tribune published the interview under the following headlines: "Expert Predicts Boost in Bread Here Soon—Thinks 1 to 2 Cents More Is Justified." On February 5 two Minneapolis papers announced that bread was to be raised 1 cent per pound. On February 6 the Purities Baking Corporation, one of the four largest companies, announced an increase of 1 cent per pound on bread. And a few days later Expert Barnard received a letter from Baker Bolder, saying, "That was a dandy article in the Tribune."

The baking industry's customers fall into two classes: the Joneses and the Sweeneys. It is obvious that the Sweeneys are the more important market because there are more of them. In 1918 there were less than 6,000,000 Joneses and more than 34,000,000 Sweeneys. The distinction between the Joneses and the Sweeneys is that the gainfully employed Joneses make more than $2,000 a year and the gainfully employed Sweeneys make less.

The United States Department of Agriculture recommends that a typical census family of five persons eat ten pounds of bread a week. The annual cost of this bread quota at Mr. Campbell's price of 5.7 cents a pound would have been $29.64. The annual cost at the price charged by the baking industry during the same year—8.7 cents a pound—would have been $47.32. The difference to the consumer would have been $17.86, or 37 per cent of his annual bread bill.

Could the Sweeneys afford to buy the recommended quota of bread at the prices the baking industry was charging during the nineteen twenties? Could they afford these prices during the boom years between 1922 and 1929? Some of the Sweeneys could not. Between 1922 and 1929 there were never less than 1,400,000 unemployed Sweeneys. During this same period from 5 to 10 per cent of the school children of the United States were undernourished. According to Professor Nystrom of the department of economics of Columbia University, there were during these years probably 9,000,000 persons—men, women, and children —who were living below the subsistence level. Approximately one person out of every twelve, during the Seven Fat Years of our prosperity, was hungry.

In addition to the 9,000,000 sub-subsistence-level Sweeneys there were millions of other Sweeneys living just at or just above the subsistence level, to whom the price of bread also mattered. "Economic Behavior," a textbook published in 1931 by New York University, says in describing American consumers:

Comparison of income figures with estimates of necessary expenditure suggests that in 1918 nearly 27,000,000 American workers were unable to maintain a family in health and decency. Only about 10,500,000 could attain that standard and only about 5,250,000 could maintain families in comfort. More recent studies of income indicate that in 1926 the average income received by a gainfully employed person was $1,799, and that if the income of the highest 10 per cent is disregarded, the rest averaged $1,341. Comparison of the estimates of incomes needed with the incomes actually received will show that the margin separating the American population from distress is not large.

If, as the conclusions of economists seem to show, there were approximately 9,000,000 sub-subsistence-level Sweeneys and an additional 10,000,000 to 18,000,000 sub-efficiency-level Sweeneys during the Seven Fat Years from 1922 to 1929, it is clear that millions of Americans could not afford the high prices charged by the baking industry for a loaf of bread.

The Sweeneys of America were during the nineteen twenties and are now paying more than they can afford for bread, or they are buying less bread. The Joneses are buying less bread than they used to, and not eating all of that. The super-Joneses prefer cake, broccoli, alligator pears, and even carrots and spinach, and the plain Joneses follow their example.

What influences have steered the super-Joneses in the direction of lowered wheat consumption? The first influence was science, which the Joneses venerate highly. Doctors and nutrition experts questioned the value of white bread. The Joneses promptly became suspicious of white bread and began to demand whole wheat. The second influence was patriotism. The United States started an eat-less-wheat campaign during the war, and the Joneses responded loyally. They even began to do without bread in the restaurants which were charging extra for a bread order. The third influence was fashion. The flapper fashions did not encourage avoirdupois, and dieting came into vogue. Starches and breads were not allowed on these reducing diets. The Joneses who still craved bread ate imported breads, guaranteed not to increase weight. The imported breads were expensive. This fact made the dieting Joneses feel better about them. Besides, they tasted much better than American bread.

It is obvious that fashion has had a great deal to do with the decreasing bread consumption of the Joneses. Giving up white bread and adopting whole wheat was a fashion trend. Eating less bread during the war was a fashion, sanctioned by the government itself. And dieting was a fashion made necessary by the Paris dressmakers. Veblen has enunciated one of the important principles relating to fashion changes. The principle is this: If there is to be ready acceptance of a new fashion, there must first be considerable dissatisfaction with the old fashion. This principle helps to explain why per capita flour consumption has been declining since 1904 and per capita wheat consumption since 1913. It indicates that dissatisfaction with American bread must have begun at about this time. The factor that caused this dissatisfaction was commercial bread. Prior to 1900 the baking industry was of negligible importance. In 1900 the annual per capita consumption of bakery products in the United States was only $2.33. During the nineteen hundreds and nineteen tens the baking industry expanded with great rapidity, and by 1923 the annual per capita consumption of bakery products had increased to $10.15.

If the Joneses were not dissatisfied with home-made bread and if they were dissatisfied with commercial bread, then there must be a considerable difference between the two products. It is impossible to say precisely what this difference is, since American bakers have never been willing to make explicit statements about their bread formulae. The National Wheat Conference, however, which met to save the farmer in 1923, knew enough about wheat and commercial-baking practices to supply an important clue to the difference between home-made bread and bakers' bread. The conference, like the United States Department of Agriculture, was interested at this time in stimulating consumption of wheat in the home market to make up for the loss of our European markets. It therefore adopted the following resolution relating to the baking industry: "We urge the production by the baking industry universally of the highest possible quality of bread as an effective means to stimulating its increased consumption. Such bread requires the use of the highest grade of patent flour, similar to that used almost exclusively in home baking."

Nutrition experts agree that although bread depends for its vitamin content on yeast, and for part of its nutritive value on milk, it depends for its taste on the kind and quality of flour used. The reason the Joneses were so ready to give up eating bread was because the taste of American bakers' bread is so negative.

The baking industry is as stupid as it is greedy. Its first mistake lay in assuming that because bread was the staff of life people would always buy it. Its second mistake lay in assuming that it could manufacture a tasteless, high-priced food and compete in the open market with cheap, well-flavored foods. Its third mistake lay in not manufacturing an attractive whole-wheat loaf, when the value of white bread was called into question.

If the wheat farmer knows his markets he will keep an eye on the baking industry. He will watch the weight, the price, and the quality of commercial bread. Further, he will resell the public on the food value and the appetizing taste of commercial bread, even if it means going into the baking business. If the wheat farmer is too hard pressed and unorganized to safeguard his markets, there is nothing for him to do but to sit back and watch the American demand for wheat suffer a slow but steady decline. And there is nothing for the hungry Sweeneys to do either, except, perhaps, to emigrate. To the Argentine perhaps, where the government has taken over the baking industry and cut the price of bread from 3.5 to 2 cents a pound. Or to Russia, where almost no one wears Paris clothes, but where there are plenty of jobs and where the per capita consumption of wheat and rye, combined, is the highest in the world.

Mahatma Gandhi Meets Romain Rolland

[To an American friend Romain Rolland has written as follows about the visit of Mahatma Gandhi to his home.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Villeneuve, Switzerland, December, 1931

HOW I should have liked to have you here during the visit of the Indians! They stayed five days—from Sunday night until Friday afternoon, the eleventh—at the Villa Lionette. The little man, bespectacled and toothless, was wrapped in his white burnoose, but his legs, thin as a heron's stilts, were bare. His shaven head with its few coarse hairs was uncovered and wet with rain. He came to me with a dry laugh, his mouth open, like a good dog panting, and flinging an arm around me leaned his cheek against my shoulder. I felt his grizzled head against my cheek. It was, I amuse myself thinking, the kiss of St. Dominic and St. Francis.

Then came Mira [Miss Slade], proud of figure and with the stately bearing of a Demeter, and finally three Indians, one a young son of Gandhi, Devidas, with a round and happy face. He is gentle, and but little aware of the grandeur of his name. The others were secretaries—disciples—two young men of rare qualities of heart and mind: Mahadev Desai and Pyarelal.

As I had contrived shortly beforehand to get a severe cold on my chest, it was to my house and to the chamber on the second floor where I sleep at Villa Olga—you will remember it—that Gandhi came each morning for long conversations. My sister interpreted, with the assistance of Mira, and I had also a Russian friend and secretary, Miss Kondacheff, who took notes on our discussions. Some good photographs by Schlemmer, our neighbor from Montreux, recorded the aspect of our interviews.

Evenings, at seven o'clock, prayers were held in the first-floor salon. With lights lowered, the Indians seated on the carpet, and a little assembly of the faithful grouped about, there was a suite of three beautiful chants—the first an extract from the Gita, the second an ancient hymn on the Sanskrit texts which Gandhi has translated, and the third a canticle of Rama and Siva, intoned by the warm, grave voice of Mira.

Gandhi held other prayers at three o'clock in the morning, for which, in London, he used to wake his harassed staff, although he had not retired until one. This little man, so frail in appearance, is tireless, and fatigue is a word which does not exist in his vocabulary. He could calmly answer for hours the heckling of a crowd, as he did at Lausanne and Geneva, without a muscle of his face twitching. Seated on a table, motionless, his voice always clear and calm, he replied to his adversaries open or masked—and they were not lacking at Geneva—giving them rude truths which left them silenced and suffocated.

The Roman bourgeoisie, militarist and nationalist, who had at first received him with crafty looks, quivered with rage when he left. I believe that if his stay had lasted any longer the public meetings would have been forbidden. He pronounced himself as unequivocally as possible on the double question of national armaments and the conflict between capital and labor. I was largely responsible for steering him on this latter course.

His mind proceeds through successive experiments into action and he follows a straight line, but he never stops, and one would risk error in attempting to judge him by what he said ten years ago, because his thought is in constant evolution. I will give you a little example of it that is characteristic.

He was asked at Lausanne to define what he understood by God. He explained how, among the noblest attributes which the Hindu scriptures ascribed to God, he had in his youth chosen the word "truth" as most truly defining the essential element. He had then said, "God is Truth." "But," he added, "two years ago I advanced another step. I now say, 'Truth is God.' For even the atheists do not doubt the necessity for the power of truth. In their passion for discovering the truth, the atheists have not hesitated to deny the existence of God, and, from their point of view, they are right." You will understand from this single trait the boldness and independence of this religious spirit from the Orient. I noted in him traits similar to Vivikananda.

And yet not a single political ruse catches him unprepared. And his own politics are to say everything that he thinks to everybody, not concealing a thing.

On the last evening, after the prayers, Gandhi asked me to play him a little of Beethoven. (He does not know Beethoven, but he knows that Beethoven has been the intermediary between Mira and me,* and consequently between Mira and himself, and that, in the final count, it is to Beethoven that the gratitude of us all must go.) I played him the Andante of the Fifth Symphony. To that I added "Les Champs Elysées" of Gluck—the page for the orchestra and the air for the flute.

He is very sensitive to the religious chants of his country, which somewhat resemble the most beautiful of our Gregorian melodies, and he has worked to assemble them. We also exchanged our ideas on art, from which he does not separate his conception of truth, nor from his conception of truth that of joy, which he thinks truth should bring. But it follows of itself that for this heroic nature joy does not come without effort, nor even life itself without hardship. "The seeker after truth hath a heart tender as the lotus, and hard as granite."

Here, my dear friend, are a few hints of those days of ours together on which I have taken much more detailed notes. What I do not dwell on to you is the hurricane of intruders, loiterers, and half-wits which this visit loosed on our two villas. No, the telephone never ceased ringing; photographers in ambuscades let fly their fusillades from behind every bush. The milkmen's syndicate at Leman informed me that during all the time of this sojourn with me of the "King of India" they intended to assume complete responsibility for his "victualling." We received letters from "Sons of God." Some Italians wrote to the Mahatma be-seeding him to indicate for them the ten lucky numbers for the next drawing of the weekly national lottery!

* Miss Slade joined Mahatma Gandhi at the suggestion of M. Rolland.—EDITOR THE NATION.

My sister, having survived, has gone to take ten days' rest at a cure in Zurich. She returns tomorrow. For my part, I have entirely lost the gift of sleep. If you find it, send it to me by registered mail!

Controlling Foreign Loans

By MORRIS L. ERNST

THE investors in South and Central American bonds have lost most of their money. That is too bad but relatively unimportant. The Senatorial inquiry inspired and conducted by Senator Hiram Johnson has, however, pointed to many more lamentable results of our foreign banking policy. Although I am in no way in agreement with Senator Johnson's attitude toward the moratorium and reparations, nevertheless I admire his single-handed efforts to drag out of reluctant witnesses their tawdry tales of bribery and waste. He has elicited testimony which indicates something less than impartial integrity on the part of public officials in the State and Commerce departments.

This hearing is not a criminal trial. The proof needed to inspire legislative remedies may properly fall short of a test of "beyond a reasonable doubt." To any objective person the evidence calls for immediate Congressional action, at least to restate and clarify our national position in the field of foreign financing. Assuming that the bankers were not parties to the illegitimate disbursements accompanying loans, assuming that the State Department was not over-energetic in behalf of Mr. Mellon's oil stake in the Barco concession, assuming that the Commerce Department was not adequately equipped honestly to render opinions as to the commercial aspects of Peruvian financing, nevertheless, all three of these groups must feel quite uncomfortable about their public positions. Certain obvious reforms should be inaugurated without question. The following measures would make financing more respectable and would remove some of the present suspicion from the State and Commerce departments:

1. No government employee, upon leaving the State or Commerce Department, should be permitted for a reasonable time to engage in any field of work connected with the field or staff of his previous employment. Thus we should prevent the stealing of ministers, the buying of assistant secretaries, and the purchasing of attachés by the banking interests. At present public employees necessarily have one eye on the public interest and the other on their future employment. The governmental turnover is excessive; public servants have constantly before their gaze the bribe of bank interests; and their subsequent employment is not entirely divorced from the area of wire-pulling. A similar restriction has been created in many other departments—for example, in the case of income-tax employees and Federal Reserve Board officials. The duration of the limitation can easily be agreed upon. Two years should be adequate as a trial.

2. No government employee, particularly in the State Department, should be permitted to act for compensation or otherwise in behalf of any private interests. The present legislation on this subject is not broad enough to cover officials or high plenipotentiaries. Such practice should be stopped; we should also condemn by legislation the drafting of private bankers' agreements by ministers.

3. It should be made unlawful to name any government officials, such as the President of the United States, justices of the Supreme Court, or even lesser lights, as arbiters under loan agreements. Such provisions in the agreements are obviously unenforceable and should not be permitted to exist for the mere purpose of duress.

After thus aiding the integrity of the public servants, Congress should enunciate what control, if any, our government should have over foreign financing. Should we return to the old days when there was a free market in money and the government as such was not even consulted? If we are past that era of nationalism, then we must decide what power should be placed in the government departments. Should the State Department have a veto power or be merely advisory? If the latter, shall we need legislation to guard against preferential treatment or duress by the State Department?

For nearly a decade the State Department has exercised an effective veto power. On four grounds the Secretary of State could quash a loan:

1. No money should travel to countries which we did not recognize. This is obviously unenforceable because loans to Germany in fact must have released credits to Russia.

2. No money should flow for the purpose of munitions. This can be circumvented so easily that any decision made by the Department of State would be the laughing-stock of borrowers as well as lenders. The Vickers munition payment resulting from the Dillon, Reed loan in Bolivia is a case in point. Any formula we adopt in this connection should not overlook the coincidental sales by American airplane or munition manufacturers to borrowing nations.

3. No loan should be made unless the budget of the borrowing government balanced. A strict interpretation of this rule would have barred many of our foreign issues. But if such a veto power were sound policy, obviously Congress would have to set up a proper public machinery for the determination of these budgetary facts.

4. No loan should be made in connection with a monopoly. Here again we have a field of difficult determination, and in any event the Commerce Department would be better equipped for reaching a determination than any other branch of the government. If Congress should believe that this fourth classification was a proper basis for absolute veto, where should the power rest—in the State Department or in the Department of Commerce?

A further field of legislative inquiry concerns itself with the banking industry of the United States. The bankers at this moment are genuinely embarrassed when faced with any of their customers to whom they have sold these foreign securities. The churches, colleges, and foundations that purchased such bond issues no doubt feel some slight sense of shame in having been parties to the acquisition of an obligation born, to say the least, in a corrupting environment.

Foreign loans in ordinary times originated in the needs and minds of the borrowers. The bond issues now under consideration in Washington arose, however, in a reverse fashion. Most banking houses sent high-pressure salesmen out into the markets of the world to see where their money could be placed. High and corrupting inducements were made to invite foreign governments to borrow money, to be spent on idle or doubtful pursuits. Grosvenor Jones of the Department of Commerce, testifying in the recent hearings on foreign loans to the competition for South American bonds among investment houses, made two exceptions, these being J. P. Morgan and Company and Kuhn, Loeb and Company, who "had followed the English tradition of the borrower seeking the lender rather than the lender seeking the borrower." Such practices of the banking world call on Congress, even in its limited field of control, to consider the following:

1. Should not commercial banks be prevented from engaging in the business of dealing in securities?

2. Should not all banks be compelled to give up their security companies, incorporated, as set forth in the certificates of incorporation, to carry on a business illegal under the banking laws?

3. Would not such complete divorce and abnegation from the bond and stock business reduce the degree of undue pressure which can be practiced by banks upon outlying banking institutions to purchase the securities of the underwriting parent bank? A major commercial bank in New York is virtually able to compel all affiliated banks in small towns to purchase securities, and the portfolios of our bankrupt banks might well indicate that the smaller the institution and the less important it was to the parent bank, the more likely it was to have foisted on it the least desirable of securities.

4. We might well consider limiting the amount of long-term securities which any bank may hold. Such limitation could be based on a percentage of the capital and surplus, or of the deposits. A quaint but enticing theory exists to the effect that the moneys of a community deposited with these quasi-public institutions known as banks should be kept primarily for the benefit of the community itself. Limitations of investments in long-term securities, particularly in foreign securities, would be in line with such a theory of banking.

5. It has been suggested with such force that it is worth considering that we set up a procedure whereby all foreign governments desiring money in our market should file their applications with the Federal Reserve Board. There, without power of discrimination, the board could act as public auction block for such securities. The issues then would be sold to the highest bidder much in the same fashion as the various governmental entities in this country sell their city or State bonds. The Federal Reserve Board would have the facilities for handling such impartial sales and would be a proper reservoir for preserving valuable information.

After limiting the scope of banks, Congress should consider the further protection of our American investors, our bankers, and our friendly relations with foreign governments by the following legislative enactments:

1. The public recording of all loan and concession agreements. This would include the contracts and all facts in relation thereto, names of commercial agents, amounts paid, expenses, and so on.

2. In respect to loans the bond agreements should be filed thirty days before the date of closing, so as to allow public comment on the proposed agreements.

3. And, finally, there should be recorded after the sale of the issues a complete statement of the entire transaction, including profits, losses, and all attending circumstances.

Imperialism is a vague term. The present disclosure will do little more than accumulate the evidence of the past. The real story lies hidden in the State Department files—hidden from the people by their alleged servants. For my part, more than all the above devices combined I should prefer a simple enactment of "open covenants openly arrived at." I appreciate that we might be impeded in certain ways, but I doubt whether the embarrassment which the State Department always conjures up when asked for information is any greater than that created by the devious negotiations carried on behind closed doors. Has the secrecy of the past brought us any real protection or friendship with other nations? Why not try for two or three years open, fully disclosed dealings with other friendly governments?

The case for secrecy breaks down when Secretary Stimson offers to disclose his files only to the members of the Senate Finance Committee. Why are those men alone to be trusted with these state secrets? What if the facts disclosed are important? They might suggest some legislative cures to be introduced in the Senate. Then Mr. Stimson will have to urge that the arguments for such federal action should not be advanced by the knowledge gained in the secret committee meetings. And what is this secrecy? Secrecy known to the bankers, read by State Department employees, discussed by Senators—but kept from the electorate.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter knows nothing of economics and less of finance. Now and again, however, he hears a story which seems to bear some relation to what is popularly known as the "depression." For him, its interest is human. He does not know what to do about it; he does not know why it is so. But he rather thinks that somewhere, possibly in Denmark, possibly in many parts of the world, there exists matter in a state of decay! He reads of Mr. Abe Wineberg—which is not his name—who two years ago with his wife and eight children decided to leave New York City for Los Angeles. Mr. Wineberg used to be a cap maker; cap making in New York failed to provide sufficient provender for Isidor, then seventeen, Hyman, fifteen, Fanny, thirteen, Sam, ten, Hilda, six, William, four, Pearl, two, and Solomon, just born. Not to mention Papa and Mama. But in Los Angeles things were not so good either. And the other day the Winebergs came home—if home it can be called. They came at the request of the Los Angeles civic authorities, who obligingly provided their railroad fare to get rid of them, and threw in $15 for food. Naturally they sat up all the way, sleeping as they could in the seats of the railroad coach; and Mama held Pearl, now four, and Solomon, a big boy of two, on her lap.

* * * * *

IF the Drifter seems to be telling this story light-heartedly, he hastens to assure his readers that it appears to him distressing to a degree. As far as he is able to ascertain, Los Angeles is still a part of the United States. And why the Winebergs should have been considered more the problem of New York than of the City of the Angels he fails to understand. After all, two years of residence might have given them some claim to attention other than a request to depart. The spectacle of them, disheveled and weary, marching out of the train at Pennsylvania Station, to become more than ever public charges, makes the heart weep. New York, obviously will not welcome them. There is, indeed, in the whole United States today no place where ten Winebergs in addition to all the other unfortunates would find a real welcome. There is no relief agency that would not sigh at the sight of the ten lining up for shelter and warmth and clothing and food. They may, of course, be so dramatically pitiful as to excite more than ordinary sympathy and help. If they do, they will only take from another ten the sustenance they in turn need. There is no escaping the fact—the Winebergs are a problem, in a comfortable and well-ordered democracy.

* * * * *

NOR are they the only problem. The Drifter heard another story the other day. Out in the sheep country of Oregon farmers are killing their ewes. This is not the result of an access of bloodthirstiness among the American sheep raisers. But it costs $1.04 to ship a sheep to market; and the sheep when it is sold for mutton brings the shipper just four cents less. There is, moreover, a law in Oregon forbidding sheep raisers deliberately to let their animals starve to death. The result is that the ewes die, but by their owner's hand. The Winebergs and the slain ewes! Between them there is a gulf that democracy has not yet found a bridge to cross. But even to a Drifter who knows nothing of economics it would seem that the bridge was desperately needed.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

What's Ahead?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Driven from our farm in 1924 by our inability to meet interest and tax payments, we have finally arrived at a point where there is nothing that even looks like a job ahead. Our home is now a tar-paper shack—one room fourteen by twenty-four, one layer of boards for sides and roof, covered with tar paper. This is our shelter from the elements.

We have been following the logging camps around, but this winter all camps are closed, and the word goes out that not a wheel will turn again unless the price of lumber goes up.

We thought we could not renew our subscription to The Nation, but have decided that the sooner we all go flat-broke and ask for help, the sooner this damnable system will crash. When we read of children starving, and of Mrs. So-and-So's jewels, valued at thousands of dollars, being stolen, we naturally wonder "how we got that way." If The Nation can tell us how to change such conditions, as individuals or as a group, we will gladly go without what the five dollars would buy.

Sandpoint, Idaho, January 14

NELLIE M. HUNTER

Mr. Anderson Makes a Correction

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In a letter to The Nation of January 20 Mrs. Cornelia Pinchot, Governor Pinchot's wife, complains that I misquoted her, misinterpreted her position, and put words in her mouth. She denies that her formal statement announcing her candidacy against Representative Louis McFadden stated that she based her decision to run on the ground that "he insulted our President." The slightest examination of my story will show that I did not quote her at all, and that I did not mention her formal statement. I quoted a common patrioteer's catch phrase to convey my opinion of her demagogic declaration that "anyone must resent an unsubstantiated attack of treason against the President." Apparently she feels that more weight should be ascribed to her written than to her oral utterances. I had assumed she would be equally responsible in both instances; and if she has any knowledge of popular psychology she must have known her oral statement would attract more public attention. If the purpose of it was not to capitalize pro-Hoover sentiment against McFadden, what was the purpose? Careless observation, reckless statement, and twisted argument are not qualified to recommend anyone for high office.

Washington, January 25

PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Russian Jobs Wanted

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Because of our great interest in the development of civilization, we, who are graduating from Oberlin College in June, petition Nation readers who have had contacts with Russia for any information concerning the possibility of getting jobs, positions, or anything there which would provide a sustenance and the chance to find out what is going on in the country. We would be willing to try anything where it would be possible to observe the communistic system in operation.

Oberlin, Ohio, January 20

VINCENT BUCHER
ROSCOB BLOSS

For San Francisco Readers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation Club of San Francisco and the Bay region will hold its annual dinner meeting on February 12, at the Liberal Arts Auditorium, 960 Bush Street, San Francisco. Harry Laidler, of the League for Industrial Democracy, Professor Robert O. Brady, of the University of California, and Lillian Symes will speak. Herbert L. Coggins will be chairman. The price of the dinner is $1. It is open to the public. Reservations may be made by getting in touch with me at 775 Guerrero Street; telephone, Valencia 1984.

San Francisco, January 28

SOPHIE GREENBERG

Finance

The Real Credit Problem

MR. OGDEN MILLS, Undersecretary of the Treasury, in a recent address in New York, urged bankers to be more liberal and courageous in making loans, less insistent upon keeping their assets "liquid." Why are bankers reluctant to extend credit? Because they fear they will not be repaid. And what reason have they for that fear? They dread a further fall in the prices of commodities and securities which would undermine collateral values and impair customers' ability to pay. Hence the emphasis placed by Mr. Mills and other Administration spokesmen upon the assertion that deflation has gone too far and that it must be arrested. The government is about to throw hundreds of millions into the effort to arrest it, by providing loans to banks and railroads. With this support behind them, the banks in turn are asked to relax their clutch on cash and allow borrowers to have some of it.

This is an appeal to reason for which a case can be made out, however much one may dislike seeing government credit put to such uses. But so much cannot be said of that other part of the program which has to do with liberalizing the rediscount provisions of the Federal Reserve law to permit loans against securities. The danger of such changes does not lie in any immediate prospect of inflation, for it seems a safe enough prediction that no deliberate efforts to inflate at this time would be likely to succeed. It is not inflation we have to fear now, but the throwing open of the central banks to stock gamblers and real-estate speculators a decade hence, when our next boom gets under way.

Underlying most of the proposals for dipping into the Reserve banks is the hoary fallacy that "more dollars in circulation" is what is needed, and that these dollars are withheld because credit is scarce. There is no scarcity of credit in the United States today, any more than there is a scarcity of wheat or copper. The Governor of the New York Federal Reserve Bank recently pointed out that the Reserve system could lend its members three and a half billion dollars, on which, as reserve, those members could in turn create credit to the amount of thirty-five billions. The real scarcity is one of acceptable collateral, or credit risks which the banks recognize as good.

What these proposals for vast credit expansion actually contemplate is a change in the standard of credit, to the end that would-be borrowers who are now unable to obtain accommodation, because lenders fear repayment will not be made, may obtain the funds they want and need. Funds are needed, moreover, not for the immediate launching of new enterprises or expansion of old ones, but to pay off pressing obligations already incurred. Given time and a revival of business, these obligations may be paid, but in the meanwhile one can understand the reluctance of banks, which must pay their depositors on demand, to make loans against them.

Suggestions for ending the depression through large credit or currency expansion rest for the most part on the tacit assumption that depression has a primary cause, which can and must be removed. In a century of hard thinking, competent students have failed to isolate this cause. The late Senator Burton, in his book on business crises, quotes a list of alleged explanations ranging from gold scarcity to the tobacco habit and the issuance of free railroad passes. Alfred Marshall regarded the elements of an economic problem not as a chain of causation, "but as all mutually determining one another." Inflationists might well ponder that statement.

S. PALMER HARMAN

BONIBOOKS

$1.

AMERICAN OXFORD
DICTIONARY

Compiled by F. G. and
H. W. Fowler

EDUCATION AND THE
GOOD LIFE

Bertrand Russell

GREAT SHORT STORIES OF
THE WORLD

Edited by Barrett H. Clark
and Maxim Lieber

OXFORD BOOK OF
AMERICAN VERSE

Edited by Bliss Carman

ISRAEL

Ludwig Lewisohn

AGAINST THE GRAIN

J. K. Huysmans

OUR BUSINESS CIVILIZATION

James Truslow Adams

THE HIGH PLACE

James Branch Cabell

THIS EARTH OF OURS

Jean-Henri Fabre

WHAT IS WRONG WITH MARRIAGE

Hamilton & MacGowan

SOUTH WIND

Norman Douglas

MICHELANGELO

Romain Rolland

THE HISTORY OF MR. POLLY

H. G. Wells

TAR

Sherwood Anderson

ALBERT ■ CHARLES BONI

NEW YORK

Books, Art, Drama

Winter: 1932

By JAMES RORTY

Over the dead the ancient battle rages:
Frost and warm earth; where the grave-digger has been,
December strikes
A myriad ice swords, perfect-frail, but piercing
Not far: already the brittle points
Softened and break; the grave-chant warming upward
Yields but a little; worm-hum and beetle,
Music invincible, six feet under.
Perfect their sleep, implacable; winter but feeds
The hot core, the drumming armies; in spring the dead
Storm in their graves, they will not forgive.

Two winters, and now a third; soon you must choose,
America, foolish virgin, incapable of love.
Fear death? Through this gate you must pass.
Fear death? In Massachusetts
Two died, in Russia two million; now the sickle wind
Swings from the north, yells death, more death.
Two winters, and now a third, there is much to slay.
Ah, pale cheat, soft liar, will nothing woo you?
Not words, nor wisdom, nor all time's contempt? Must you wait
For the mob's leer, the mob's hot rape? . . . Soon you must choose.

A soft land, hardening; a cold land, burning
Deep at the core. Already the gods have spoken:
"Not for us this child's farce, this idiot huddle of goldeaters, paper-eaters, god-eaters.
"What, you will share? You, who have naught to give—"Courage, nor passion, nor the mind's hot seed? Yes, you will share
"Terror, and cold, a mouthful of wind at your world's end."

Two winters, and now a third; the grave-chant rises, in spring the dead
Storm in their graves; bar the door, America, snivel and lie:
Soon you must choose; you shall have lovers, time's womb shall yet be served.

Jean-Jacques

Jean Jacques Rousseau. By Matthew Josephson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

WHEN the eighteenth century talked about Rousseau it was very likely to refer to him as Jean-Jacques, but it is, on the contrary, Rousseauism alone which figures very largely in contemporary discussions. The fact is not without its special significance, for it means that a personality has become an abstraction, and the chief merit of Mr. Josephson's painstaking study is, perhaps, that it reminds one again how foolish we are when we talk about him as though he were a disembodied spirit who had come from nowhere for the express purpose of making Mr. Irving Babbitt possible.

Relatively few of the present volume's 550 closely printed pages are devoted to abstract discussion, for most of them are concerned with the sayings and doings, or the comings and goings, of a rather fantastic but irresistibly arresting man, who—both literally and metaphorically—came and went in all directions as unceasingly as any human being ever possessed restlessness enough to do. Being a chronicle rather crowded, despite its considerable length, Mr. Josephson's book is not particularly easy to read, but it is crammed with information, and it has the effect of reorienting one's interest as it should be reoriented—of reminding one again that Rousseau was a historical phenomenon that is most profitably to be regarded as such. Doubtless his influence still exists, and in so far as it does it is discussible as such, but the origins and the references of his specific doctrines are so much a part of a remote age that it is ridiculous to discuss his errors gravely, as though, for example, the fantastic anthropology embodied in his conception of the state of primitive man had anything to do with deciding whether we today ought or ought not to seek to eradicate all our native impulses as completely as possible. Even a humanist should be able to realize that Rousseau's mythology has as little to do with the question as the mythology of the Old Testament has to do with that Protestant Christian attitude which the said humanist is so busy defending.

Of course Jean-Jacques was inconsistent and absurd as well as totally wrong in those a priori conclusions concerning the nature of primitive society which he shared with most learned men of his time. Of course it was inconsistent for a prophet of education to abandon his children to the particularly untender mercies of an eighteenth-century foundling asylum, and of course many of his abstract ideas were, logically, as inconsistent as his actions. Memories of Plutarch's conception of "Roman virtue" had as much to do with his deification of "simplicity" as did any of his communions with nature, and the fact probably accounts for that failure to distinguish between personal and political freedom which made it possible for him to idealize the rigid institutions of Geneva while remaining in all his tastes essentially an anarchist. For him "nature" somehow included Italian opera as well as the fields and mountains, and it was not by logic but by temperament that all he stood for was made a whole. He was a product of, as much as he was an influence on, his times, and he may actually have invented very little of that prodigious complex of rebellious doctrines and attitudes for which he stood. But he had the picturesqueness and the eloquence necessary to give them adequate expression. He was the object around which they crystallized.

To that extent, of course, it is legitimate to use him as a symbol, but it is a little late to attack him as an individual, and it is absurd to suppose that to annihilate him would be to diminish what is called his influence. Rousseauism—if one insists upon retaining the name—is by now detached from Rousseau, and whatever his personal importance may once have been, it is not because of anything which can now be discovered in his books that the world persists in believing all sorts of things highly offensive to those who distrust human nature. To wipe out Rousseauism the whole of the eighteenth century at least would have to be wiped out, since the eighteenth century was, despite the fact that this seems sometimes forgotten, the age of enthusiasm as well as the age of reason, and Rousseau and Richardson were quite as characteristic of it as Fielding and Voltaire. All its speculations and all its emotions are something which the Western world went through, and the experience produced effects upon its spirit which no series of polemics could eradicate, even if it were desirable that it should do so.

It happens that we are just now in one of those recurrent periods when those who are concerned with ideas feel above all else the need to set in order those which we already have. Overwhelmed with facts as well as theories, we long for order, and as a result it is not unnatural that dilettantes, especially, should profess a sort of precious admiration for whatever writers of the past are simple and consistent and clear. They admire certain very limited men for the reason that they are asking, not how rich their stock of ideas was, but how well it was ordered, and hence they are in no frame of mind to admire a man like Rousseau whose works are a chaos. Yet it should require only a very little historical-mindedness to realize that there are times when the stock of ideas does need to be renewed, and that it is at such times that the Rousseaus, scattering all sorts of seeds in all sorts of places, perform their indispensable function. And what is true of Rousseau is true of the enthusiastic, extravagant, and sentimental side of the eighteenth century. Comparatively little of all the literature which it produced is readable today. Everything it had to say was so new, so undisciplined, and so extravagant that it seems absurd. But every generation since has been concerned with the effort to explore and discipline the ideas and the sentiments which it introduced. Every such period enlarges somewhere the limits within which the spirit moves, and adds something to that repertory of possible ideas, emotions, and sensitivities which makes the experience of being human what it is. Even ■ unromantic age can no more escape the influence of the fact that it has inherited something from romanticism than a skeptical age can escape the fact that it has inherited something from Christianity. No matter how hard we try not to be, every one of us is, to some extent, both a Rousseauist and a Christian.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"Individualism" and Housing

Recent Trends in American Housing. By Edith Elmer Wood. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THE simple fact about American housing is stated on page 46 of Mrs. Wood's excellent book. "Two-thirds of the population cannot pay a rental or purchase price high enough to produce a commercial profit on a new dwelling." A new dwelling, that is, which complies with minimum standards of light, air, space, and sanitation.

One-third of American families have incomes under $1,200 a year, one-third have incomes between $1,200 and $2,000, and one-third have incomes over $2,000. Yet, as Mr. Robert Whitten showed in his recent study, there are practically no houses of any sort being built in this country to sell under $4,500—and the $4,500 house is likely to be a makeshift extravagance at any price. This means that the people who live in wedged-in wood-and-paper packing boxes in Queens, in the newer of the dismal brick rows in Philadelphia, and in the more-gadged dark flats in the Bronx must belong to the fortunate richest third of our population—or skimp on food and clothing to pay for their superior homes. And the others—where do they live? In New York City about two million of them are still crowded in old-law tenements, which it has been illegal to build for thirty years.

Mrs. Wood shows that higher wages alone—the only thing for which workers themselves have actively campaigned—will never radically change the prohibitive ratio between income and the cost of a house. She shows that building-and-loan associations, while they give mild aid in the construction of something under 150,000 homes a year, never reach below the middle of the top income group. She shows that limited-dividend enterprise alone, while it may materially reduce costs, can never reach the lowest third, and, owing to its undependable private philanthropic nature, will never be more than a dubious drop in the bucket anyway. She shows that tax exemption, subsidy though it is, can never produce effective results without a corollary system of State or municipal credits, the only realistic solution.

Had her book not been published just a little too soon for such comment, she would undoubtedly have shown with equally acid clarity that the President's little mortgage-discount idea, while it might help the banks to cash in on some of their already existing paper, has less than nothing to do with the future construction of houses. And that the President's Conference on Home Ownership and Home Building was not, with the exception of the Committee on Large-Scale Housing, really concerned with houses at all. (It would be so nice, and so American, they yearned wistfully, if every family could go out and buy a delightful piece of ground and build thereon the individual home of its dreams and incidentally become a conservative property-owner. Home ownership vaguely connotes stability, and the misplaced emphasis on a comparatively unimportant effect is merely a typical case of governmental frustration and romantic wish-fulfilment. Actually, buying a house when you are always in danger of losing your job or being moved somewhere else contributes about as much toward safety and stability as buying stock on margin without having additional resources.)

The point is well clinched by ■ summary of actual achievements in the construction of working-class dwellings in the United States since the war. The list, which includes the work of cooperative societies, limited-dividend companies, private philanthropists, and public authorities, is as follows:

New York City: Under 10,000 apartments (private funds for the most part under State Housing Board control);

California: 7,500 houses (under the Veterans' Farm and Home Purchase Act);

Chicago: 1,000 apartments (private funds, philanthropic);

Rest of country: 1,000 dwellings.

This makes ■ grand total of under 20,000 dwellings, more than half of which are too expensive for any but the highest income group. For obvious reasons, the deplorable results of the earlier unregulated tax-exemption experiment in New York are not included.

Meanwhile, in England, Germany, and Holland about 3,000,000 working-class homes have been built since the war. Many miles of slums have been cleared—something which has not even been started in America. And the negative subsidy of unrestricted tax exemption "has cost the New York taxpayers ■ great deal more than London has paid for her 'assisted' working-class housing." But we are, again in Mrs. Wood's words, "still thanking God that we are not as other men are and that we do not interfere with the sacred laws of supply and demand in the matter of providing homes for those who need them."

C. K. BAUER

Italian Literature

History of Italian Literature. By Francesco de Sanctis. Translated by Joan Redfern. With an Introduction by Benedetto Croce. Harcourt, Brace and Company. Two volumes. $7.50.

THAT ■ book can be understood and estimated more accurately when the reader brings to it ■ knowledge of the age which produced it has become so accepted a truism that its more extreme upholders feel that they must use it not as a conclusion but as a point of departure. It has led, as a result, to some unbalanced critical judgments and ideas. Some of our sociological critics, ignoring their book, have lost themselves, and their readers, in the background; others, disapproving of the social or economic character of a period, have indicted its writers with almost as little reasonableness as ■ traveler would show if he despised the inhabitants of a foreign country for its evil climate.

Literary criticism that seeks to evaluate a book within its setting and influences requires a genius to whom this double seeing would be not a program but a natural act, the result of an almost intuitive power. And as he saw the two together, a unity, so would he write of them, and not as theoretical critics do, laboriously, first a chapter of one, then of the other. Such criticism calls also for one who is a very fine writer himself, so that he may speak of other writers—without self-consciousness, of course—as their peer, and as one who has shared their experiences.

De Sanctis is such a genius. His method, being natural to him, requires no long preface of analysis and justification. When he opens in the beginnings of Italian literature, we are at once in the midst of men, events, ideas, books. Their interpenetration is as complete and active as the fused matter in our minds; and it is achieved not by any breathless mannerism of style but by the spontaneity and whole-heartedness of De Sanctis's interest in his subject, which takes him deeper than his scholarship alone would have enabled him to go. He is so thoroughly interested, so actively concerned, that his emotions are fluent, and their movement communicates directly to the reader happiness, pride, anger, scorn, awe, or sadness, in the same sequence as the men and events that cause them.

About a book like this there is actually little to say except that it is admirable and almost unique in critical literature, and that it would be well for us if every other great national literature had a De Sanctis for its historian. The book has some defects and shortcomings, of course. Being a collection of lectures, it has the lecture's necessary evil of excessive repetition. It was gathered hastily, some parts are less careful than others, and some magnificent metaphors are crudely finished or undone by a mixture. Above all, as an intellectual fruit of the Risorgimento, it gives too much weight to patriotism, and explains too many possibly racial insufficiencies by national disunity. The author's patriotism, however, is in no sense factitious or extraneous, but has become an organic part of his outlook. And his native vision was too clear, and he was too much the artist, for him to allow it to spoil his book.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

Death of an Empire

The Birth of the German Republic. 1871-1918. By Arthur Rosenberg. Translated from the German by Ian F. D. Morrow. Oxford University Press. $4.75.

THE nature and contents of this book would be more nearly expressed by calling it "The Death of the German Empire," for it begins with an analysis of the social forces under Bismarck in 1871 and ends with November 10, 1918—just before the Weimar Assembly drafted the new constitution. The period covered, however, receives a thorough treatment, and the author has done his work in a fine spirit of critical detachment. The internal political conflicts under William II, the World War and the Burgfriede, the dictatorship under Ludendorff, the peace resolutions of 1917, Ludendorff at the zenith of his power, and the final collapse—these are the main topics which form the outline of the book; but the wide gulf between Kaiser, chancellors, and military leaders, on the one hand, and the numerous political parties representing the masses, on the other, forms the background of the tragic story of a system which received its death blow on the battlefield of the Marne, and the passing of which ended an epoch in German history.

Dr. Rosenberg was admirably qualified for this work, for he was a member of the Reichstag Committee of Inquiry into the causes of Germany's collapse and therefore in a position seldom accorded to the historian for getting material at first hand. He belonged to no party or organization, and he had an opportunity for hearing from the leading soldiers and politicians their own explanations of the downfall of the empire. The failure to weather the storm without, according to the author, has its chief explanation in the old constitution, which ignored popular opinion and placed the control of government in the hands of the Emperor and incompetent leaders. Prussia, which controlled the empire, had a class government supported by the army, and when this class, which included the nobility and leading army officials, was destroyed in the first year of the war, there was no party trained to formulate a new policy. When the old army, which numbered some three-quarters of a million men, was replaced in 1916 with four million recruits composed of the divergent political tendencies of the nation, the new officers, though by no means democratic, felt themselves the political leaders of society, and looked to Hindenburg and Ludendorff rather than to William II and the Crown Prince to rescue Germany; but this merely led to the dictatorship, which, failing in the end, left Germany bleeding and torn, with no guiding principles. The result was the Versailles treaty.

While the criticism of the Bismarckian constitution which runs through the narrative may perhaps be just, one may still question whether any other form of government in Germany at the time would have succeeded better. Our system, too, placed the conduct of the war in the hands of one man, the President, limited, to be sure, by the Senate. In a crisis it is not only politics but democracy itself that is adjourned.

KARL F. GEISER

International Drama

The International Note in Contemporary Drama. By Evelyn Newman. New York: Kingsland Press.

THIS is a very serious attempt to follow the growth of international accord from one angle only: that of an increasingly passionate belief in and desire for universal peace. In that respect Dr. Newman's thesis is an international note, clearly seen in the plays of England, France, and Germany—incidentally of America—from pre-war to post-war days. There is, of course, a larger vision of internationalism, of which this is only a part. Theatergoers are fast becoming international-minded. A season demands a familiarity with the stages of all countries. Eugene O'Neill's "Desire Under the Elms" and "Emperor Jones" are as familiar in France and Germany and Czecho-Slovakia as are "R. U. R.," by Capek, "From Morn to Midnight," by Kaiser, "The Unknown Warrior," by Raynal, and "Masse Mensch," by Toller, to Broadway.

Dr. Newman assembles all those plays of the chief belligerent countries in the Great War that have to do with the general theme of war and the specific hope for economic and social adjustment in the future. She shows clearly how the different avenues of approach center in an intense condemnation of the old idea of the glories of war, no matter what country the dramatist hails from. It is evident from the findings that the writer for the theater, even though he might give us a British "Journey's End" or an American "What Price Glory?" has taken war from the battlefield and has placed its strain in the inner being of man himself; and it is man who is being sapped and shattered and disillusioned by the old concepts of bravery and honor and loyalty.

In other words, says Dr. Newman, "literature has broken from war," and she proceeds, in the five chapters of her thesis, to assemble the facts in favor of her arguments. If you have seen "Merchants of Glory," by Pagnol, you have witnessed what can be done with glory which is exploited for political preferment. If you have seen "Wings Over Europe," by Nichols and Browne, you have sensed how the ideals of peace and the instruments to assure peace are valued by the powers in office, and how cabinets abhor ideals unless they offer practical outlets for the increase of national power. The realism of the dramas written directly about war on the battlefield gives way before the philosophical approach in the post-war years, where despair, such as one detects in "Hoppla, Wir Leben!" by Toller, is uppermost. There is an international distrust of the machine age, there is an international fear of the next war, and these are the themes recurrent in the new international drama. Dr. Newman reviews over 125 plays; she painfully outlines their essential plots: that is the dispiriting part of an otherwise interesting theme, for no synopsis can do justice to the shadings of a play. She shows us what we felt when Granville Barker produced Euripides's "The Trojan Women" in our college stadia, that even the ancients were propagandists for peace. Though the contemporary dramatists veil their fervor behind a cloak of past history, historical characters stand reinterpreted as champions of humanitarian ideals. Georg Kaiser, Fritz von Unruh, Alfred Neumann, Ernst Toller have thus used history. Rolland and Shaw, O'Casey and O'Neill have also in their way pleaded for a higher social spirit which is as necessary for conquest of war as the scrapping of armament. No matter to what country you turn for drama, you find some concept of what peace should mean, and how it should be gained.

It would never do to read this book carefully for its literary value; but it does bring you this unity of desire, which certainly is one manifestation of the international note in the contemporary theater.

MONTROSE J. MOSES

Book of the Cloud

The Flowering Stone. By George Dillon. The Viking Press. $1.75.

IN the symbolic vocabulary of Blake George Dillon's first volume of poems, "Boy in the Wind," might have been called his Book of the Lily (innocence, wonder); "The Flowering Stone" is his Book of the Cloud. It represents that interval, described with such humble savagery by Keats in his preface to "Endymion," when the poet wanders between the imaginations of boyhood and maturity, afflicted by the perturbations of his senses and the ferment in his soul. An indigestion of new influences and the sterile idolatry of an abstract Beauty are characteristic of this hiatus. A little earlier and a little later both taste and genius are more dependable. Mr. Dillon is intrinsically too good a poet to conclude one of his most interesting conceptions with a sympathetic evocation

Of ladies and their lovers mouth to mouth
Deep in the south.

September Noon, however, is not his only poem to suffer from a sudden aberration of judgment. The failures in this volume include The Wakening, The Charm, Extemporaneous Lines, Elegy, Soliloquy Along a Sidewalk, Woman Without Fear. But "failures" is too strong a word: Mr. Dillon is incapable of writing a wholly bad poem.

The best poem in "The Flowering Stone" and in many respects the most remarkable he has yet given us is the untitled sixth piece in the section called Anatomy of Death. To give a hint of its value I must ruthlessly tear a few lines from their context:

Here on a spoiling planet everywhere
Life starts from its tireless cisterns, strange, renewed,
In lovers' bodies. It is by no means subdued.
It seethes from its coldness, a quarrel of ice in the sun . . .

It is an elaborate conceit; beautifully sustained through its mazes of meaning, fierce, incisive, startling, and cruel. Unlike Mr. Dillon's other poems of moderate length (e. g., the fourth poem of the same section), it presents itself as a unit, instead of jerking forward—and sometimes backward—line by line at the caprice of the rhymes.

I like, too, The Mad Hunter; The Summery Night; Before the Frost; Mind Without Substance, Bright and Shadowy; What Artifice; Fantasia of Winter; and Autumn Movement. The ten sonnets that comprise An Address to the Doomed are marked by a quiet strength and dignity of utterance, but the set form brings with it a host of stale conventions, traditional themes, and time-honored postures, which Mr. Dillon adeptly recapitulates without quite achieving a fresh statement. I feel that the outline of his personality as a poet is yet to be clearly drawn. There is no bold demarcation between his ego and the climate of life; although, until these boundaries are unequivocally established, the structure of personality must be at best an illusion, like the shape of a cloud.

In general these are poems of mood rather than of conflict. They are more sensitive than intense. This poet (mirabile dictu!) believes in the beneficence of earth. Three of his worst lines exhort us to Go laughing, though. Go loving, though.

Go hounding beauty always. Oh,
Endure the dazzling dream unblurred,

In his cosmology both man and God are "dreamer[s] in a dream"; "life is proud and long"; "Beauty cannot die"; the eternal dualities are merely a "childish pair," whose divorce the happy man will have "patched up"; the purpose of death is "to fashion a more marvelous thing." This is a comforting faith which we should all like to share, but I am not persuaded that Mr. Dillon's reconciliations are either inherent in his temperament or the inspired optimism of a whole vision. It is significant that in the present collection the finest poems, containing the germ of a more curious metaphysics, poke at a body of evil that is not lightly to be dreamed away.

The stages of a poet's progress are not equally profitable. Some may find "The Flowering Stone" disappointing after "Boy in the Wind," if only because the character of the poetry has altered. A real cause for disappointment would have been the repetition in this second volume of the charming perfections of the first. The poetry in a man is organic: it is subject, typically, to diseases peculiar to each period of its growth. There is ample evidence in "The Flowering Stone" that George Dillon's is a ripening art.

STANLEY J. KUNITZ

Books in Brief

The Imperial Theme. Further Interpretations of Shakespeare's Tragedies, Including the Roman Plays. By G. Wilson Knight. Oxford University Press. $4.50.

Mr. Knight, whose previous books, "Myth and Miracle" and "The Wheel of Fire," have done as much as anything else to direct the trend of current Shakespearean criticism toward a consideration of the literary aspects of the plays as distinguished from the historical and the bibliographical, carries on in this volume with essays about "Julius Caesar," "Hamlet," "Macbeth," "Coriolanus," and "Antony and Cleopatra." He has not abandoned his resolve to find in Shakespeare evidences of an occupation with "life-themes"—honor, order, and love—and "death-themes"—hatred, disease, disorder, and death. Indeed, in the concluding chapters he brings his exposition to a climax when he demonstrates that "Antony and Cleopatra" is Shakespeare's best play because it holds all of these themes in a wholesome balance—love, however, triumphing. There is danger in a critical theory which decides for one play as against another because its "values" are "positive"; and Mr. Knight is not without excesses and absurdities. Nevertheless he is a very brilliant commentator. In no one else at present is there anything like his passion for Shakespeare; and no one else has his ability to discover new excellences. If only a tenth of the virtues he finds in his hero were actually there—and perhaps nine-tenths of them are there—we could understand how it is that Shakespeare rises head and shoulders above all other poets and playwrights. Mr. Knight is absolutely saturated with the plays. He lives with their images, he suffers with their persons, he breathes their poetry. And he is well on the way toward an estimate of Shakespeare the artist which must stand somewhere in the neighborhood of final things.

A Naturalist in Brazil. By Konrad Guenther. Translated by Bernard Miall. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

Dr. Guenther has what is rare in a naturalist, a genuine love of nature. It gives a gusto to his work that makes his book extremely readable in spite of occasional effusiveness and sentimentality. His chapters on the social insects present no new material, but the presentation is keen and dramatic. The chapter on the tropical forest, however, is invaluable, and makes as visible as words can make it the difference between forests in the equator and those in temperate zones. The chapter on Nature as an Organism is packed with interesting information, and is itself constructed upon an organic concept.

Fortune's Favorites: Portraits of Some American Corporations. An Anthology from Fortune Magazine. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

Since the war, which created an astonishing number of millionaires in America, there has been a decided appetite among our business men for dignity. The magazine Fortune was organized to meet this demand—as well as the standing American demand for the "inside story." The present volume contains, supposedly, the inside stories of fifteen of our largest corporations: American Telephone and Telegraph Company, Swift and Company, Aluminum Company of America, Drug, Inc., American Can Company, A. O. Smith Corporation, Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, International Telephone and Telegraph Company, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Allied Chemical and Dye Corporation, Standard Oil Company of New York, New York Times Company, Bausch and Lomb Optical Company, Niagara-Hudson Power Corporation, Coca-Cola Company. One article is signed by Stuart Chase; the rest are anonymous. The style is consciously tony; next to sales data we are apt to find an allusion to the classics. The innocence of these anonymous authors concerning the true forces at work in the building of large corporations is beautiful. No millionaire's six-year-old daughter could be more certain of her daddy's benevolence. Such ignorance is necessary of course, for the purpose of the articles is plainly eulogistic; they are simply a new kind of market letter.

De Maisse. A Journal of All That Was Accomplished by Monsieur de Maisse Ambassador in England from King Henry IV to Queen Elizabeth, Anno Domini 1597. Translated from the French and Edited with an Introduction by G. B. Harrison and R. A. Jones. Random House. $2.50.

This is the first edition in English—incidentally, there is no edition in French—of a journal which has been much quoted by historians and by biographers of Elizabeth. De Maisse, sent by Henry IV to find what was in Elizabeth's mind concerning a possible peace with Spain, was baffled, as most men were, in his attempt to read that mind. But he left one of the most intimate accounts we have of the queen's character and appearance—particularly her appearance, which in these handsome pages may henceforth be viewed for the astonishing thing it was.

Infants of the Spring. By Wallace Thurman. The Macaulay Company. $2.

In his first novel, "The Blacker the Berry . . .," Mr. Thurman gave a rather remarkable account of the struggles of a Negro girl whose problems arose not from white discrimination but from the prejudices of the lighter-skinned members of her own race. His new book is more ambitious. Describing the lives of several Negro artists and intellectuals, it necessarily concerns itself with various fundamental economic, racial, and philosophical problems. In narrating the events in which his characters take part Mr. Thurman often writes vividly, and even the long passages in which the characters talk over their problems show considerable insight; but the impression remains that the author is too close to these questions to make the discussion of them objective, and the resulting confusion is heightened by his attempt to deal with several more or less unrelated themes. The effect of all this is, naturally, to diffuse Mr. Thurman's powers and obscure his virtues.

Art

William Gropper

WHAT passes for pictorial satire in the average comic or political periodical in America is in most cases inferior academic drawing humorously captioned. Remove the caption, and the cartoons will serve with perfect appropriateness to advertise the soap that floats, the skin you love to touch, or the runless stocking. A notable exception is made by the small group of cartoonists and caricaturists in the radical movement—Young, Minor, Ellis, Gellert, Burck, Gropper, and a number of others who might be considered on the fringe—Soglow, Dehn, Covarrubias.

The current exhibition of William Gropper (John Reed Club) shows him to be a vitriolic critic of established society and a fine graphic artist as well—one who has developed a style fully adequate to his message. Here is, for example, Police Brutality, a subject treated countless times in the radical press; but notice how superior Gropper's drawing is to most by virtue of his better technical equipment—taking for granted his native gift. One of "New York's finest" with uplifted club is bearing down into the mob over a figure lying in his way. A few solid strokes of pitch-black ink serve to define the brute strength of the policeman's back; a mobile contour renders the forward motion of the horse under him; thinner lines used with the same economy suggest the less essential details. Areas of ink diluted to the consistency of a faint wash and distributed with excellent judgment bind the various parts into a cartoon of striking effectiveness.

The best work of Gropper exhibits a similar procedure, although his chief concern is not with "art" at all. No political cartoonist can be "above the battle." Gropper repudiates impartiality. He is quite avowedly committed to a cause which envisages contemporary society as the battleground of a relentless class war between capitalists and workers. Gropper employs his cartoons as a weapon in the class war, as a means of mobilizing the working masses for "the final conflict." Therefore an inventory of his themes is simply a wholesale, withering arraignment of the evils of the system he detests: the sleek hypocrisy of the politician, the venal corruption of the judge, the lawless terrorism of police and "gorillas," the bellicose aggressiveness of the imperialist, the pharisaic unctuousness of priest and rabbi, the smug complacency of the philanthropist, the open racketeering of labor lieutenants, the callous inhumanity of boss and landlord. Each of the artist's strictures is simple, laconic, bare of all superfluities; each is embodied in a living type both concrete and symbolic, easily recognizable—and preaching a sermon more eloquent than a dozen editorials.

The revolutionary cartoonist has a twofold aim: to hearten and encourage those already in the revolutionary ranks, and to win new recruits into those ranks. Lincoln considered Thomas Nast a "recruiting sergeant" for the Union! Gropper is a recruiting sergeant in a much greater civil war—a civil war involving all mankind. As previously noted, however, the significance of Gropper's work is not exhausted by its illustrative value alone, by the ideological weight of its statements. To avoid monotony and add force to his statements Gropper constantly experiments with papers gray and white, thick and thin, rough and smooth, with wet and dry brush, black and diluted ink, patten, dots, dashes, crayon, new compositional schemes—with the result that his best cartoons carry power, vitality, and conviction which a mere recording of actual events could never achieve. Daumier, to stress the contemporary character of his work, said, "Je suis de mon temps"; Gropper and all other artists enlisted in the same cause revise Daumier's statement to read, "Je suis de ma classe," making it clear that la classe ouvrière is meant.

LOUIS LOZOWICK

Drama

"Worse than Death"

S EVEN years ago one of the experimental theaters brought forth a play by a certain Dan Tothoroh called "Wild Birds." It told the story of two young lovers in the West who fled from cruel parents only to die like babes in the woods, and it was rather widely praised for a kind of naive charm which persisted despite a pervading, slightly infantile, absurdity. Nothing further was heard of the author in New York until the appearance of "Distant Drums," which has just been produced at the Belasco and which, unfortunately, is only slightly more substantial than the former offering.

This time the play is concerned with the adventures of a group of pioneers en route for Oregon in a train of prairie schooners. All the scenes take place in the semicircular encampment formed by the wagons, and the chief character is a mysterious woman of vaguely poetical temperament who does not know what she came for until it is discovered that she is the price demanded by an Indian chief for the information which will enable the pioneers to find their way out of the mountains. After some debate, she goes shudderingly to him and the play is over.

Profoundly ignorant as I am concerning the habits of Indians, I really do not know whether or not they had any interest in white women except as possible victims of scalping, and it may be that they did have; but the point is simply that the present play does not make me ready to believe the fact. The central incident remains improbable and appears wholly factitious—something invented for the purpose of supplying the necessary plot by an author who started out with a desire to write about the pioneers, but whose genuine imagination never carried him farther than the general atmosphere of such an expedition as that which he presents. This atmosphere, indeed, is not ineffectively created. One believes in the minor characters, one believes in the reality of the romantic caravan, and one is

Speaking of the Cost of Good Books

THOMAS MANN'S THE MAGIC MOUNTAIN

Complete and Unabridged in one volume in the

MODERN LIBRARY

EDITION AT

95 CENTS A COPY

In Germany, traditional land of inexpensive books, the cheapest edition of "The Magic Mountain" is 10 marks ($2.38). In England it is published in two volumes at 18 shillings (about $3.06). This is only one of a number of Modern Library books cheaper than any other edition in existence.

Other Modern Library High Lights

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT DOSTOYEVSKY
OF HUMAN BONDAGE . . . MAUGHAM
TONO BUNGAY H. G. WELLS
DROLL STORIES BALZAC

A five dollar bill brings you all five of these books!

At all booksellers. Send for list of titles

THE MODERN LIBRARY, INC., 20 East 57th Street, New York

NEXT WEEK IN THE NATION

Close-up of Washington an article by

William E. Woodward

Author of "George Washington—
The Image and the Man."

SOCIAL FORCES IN SOCIAL WORK

The trained social worker regards the individual, family and community he serves as centers of convergence of racial, religious, economic and other social forces which hark back to the past and must be utilized to fashion the future. This view is especially important if the worker's field lies in such a highly distinctive group as the Jews.

College graduates should examine carefully the advantages, both tangible and intangible, of

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

A number of scholarships and fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each academic year are available for especially qualified candidates.

For full information write to

M. J. KARPF, Director

The Training School

For Jewish Social Work

(a graduate school)

71 W. 47th St., New York City

Soviet Russia Equals

Europe . . . in cost to the traveler

For the summer of 1932 the Open Road is able to offer its standard travel services in Russia at European prices.

A month's round trip to the U. S. S. R. with expenses New York to Russia and return steamship passage from Europe can be made for . . . $238, third class on land and sea (with tourist class Baltic crossing and second class sleeper Helsingfors-Leningrad). $359, second class on land, tourist class at sea (first class Baltic crossing).

Itineraries may be drafted to suit. Experienced Open Road representatives in Leningrad and Moscow know how to make a little time go a long way in a country where the visitor plunges into a bewildering new civilization and where every waking hour of the sojourn is precious.

In writing for itineraries and rates, indicate what phases of Russian life interest you most and whether you prefer to travel with a group or independently.

The OPEN ROAD

Salmon Tower, 11 West 42nd Street, New York City

Cooperating in U. S. S. R. with INTOURIST

ready for the drama which the setting seems to promise. But the preparation is wasted and the big scene does not come off. The distant drums are beating; terrible things are about to happen just off stage. And yet it is impossible to forget even for a minute that this is a play. Instead of thinking about Indians and the drama of the West, one finds oneself thinking about all the other lives "worse than death" to which so many other heroines of melodrama have been about to go. Usually the villains are Chinamen, and one begins to doubt if this chief is really a chief at all. Perhaps he is the mysterious Mr. Wu in disguise, for everybody knows that Mr. Wu would be capable of even that trick.

The central character is played by Miss Pauline Lord—she of the vague gesture and infinitely pathetic helplessness—who lends to the character whatever credibility it has. To watch her in even an unsatisfactory play is to be touched in a very special way, for she has the power of being appealing quite independently of her lines or situations. Once I compared her to Charlie Chaplin, who seems always to be acting in a kind of continued story about himself, and the comparison will still hold. Even in "Distant Drums" she is the same bewildered and charming person whom one has been drawn to so often before, and we believe in her even when we do not believe in the incidents which she is enacting.

"Mr. Papavert" (Vanderbilt Theater) is an even less satisfactory play. Produced a few weeks ago and closed for revision after two performances, it remains crudely conceived, crudely acted, and, even in its central situation, rather less promising than tender-hearted reviewers professed to find it. Undoubtedly something might be made out of the tendency of radical groups to exploit for their own purposes those victims of injustice whom they undertake to defend. We have, as a matter of fact, a now-pending case in which something of the sort is alleged to have occurred. But the particular situation used in "Mr. Papavert" is distinctly unfortunate since it reminds one inevitably of Tom Mooney or Sacco and Vanzetti, no one of whom was, like the hero of the present play, out of sympathy with his champions.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Contributors to This Issue

DAVID W. WAINHOUSE was formerly assistant director of research of the Council on Foreign Relations.

WINIFRED RAUSHENBUSH has for many years been engaged in sociological research in various fields.

ROMAIN ROLLAND, famous French author, is the outstanding literary exponent of pacifism.

MORRIS L. ERNST, a New York attorney, is the author of "America's Primer."

JAMES RORTY is the author of a book of poems, "Children of the Sun."

C. K. BAUER is executive secretary of the Regional Planning Association of America.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

KARL F. GEISER is professor of political science at Oberlin College.

MONTROSE J. MOSES is the author of "The Fabulous Forrest: The Record of an American Actor."

STANLEY J. KUNITZ is the author of a volume of poems, "Intellectual Things."

LOUIS LOZOWICK, painter and illustrator, is a contributing editor of the New Masses.

LINDSAY ROGERS is professor of public law at Columbia University.

French Logic Versus Customs Unions

By LINDSAY ROGERS

EVEN though the Austro-German customs union has been relegated to the limbo of abandoned projects, it is still much discussed. There is little likelihood that the manner of its abandonment will be speedily forgotten. In formulating her policy toward Germany, France will frequently hark back to the method and substance of the attempted economic Anschluss. The advisory opinion of the Permanent Court will be cited when future customs unions are projected, and when such schemes for the Danubian area come to fruition, French logic will have a severe test.

That this may be the case was suggested by an article on the court's opinion which M. Jacques Bardoux published in the Paris Temps of October 1, 1931. The Temps is a semi-official journal. Its opinions, that is to say, are rarely opposed to the views held by the Quai d'Orsay. M. Bardoux is a distinguished and widely read publicist. His attitude is therefore of double interest. Moreover, M. Bardoux's reasoning has double implications, for not only does it relate to the decision of the Permanent Court, but it is an excellent illustration of the curious manner in which certain French publicists forget that the points which they make so neatly in behalf of France are really points which can be made against France.

M. Bardoux declares that the opinion of the Permanent Court was a "victory" for Sir Cecil Hurst, lately legal adviser to the British Foreign Office and now one of the judges at The Hague. The "victory" resulted from the fact that by a majority of one the court refused to accept the French thesis of incompatibility between the customs-union protocol of March, 1931, and Article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain, which forbids Austria to compromise her independence. The court simply held that the customs union would be in violation of the protocol of 1922, under which Austrian finances were restored and Austrian economic independence was guaranteed against violation. Thus of two barriers to the conclusion of the customs agreement the court selected the one which was less important and more precarious. The issue, therefore, is not closed but may be reopened.

In obtaining this result Sir Cecil Hurst—the argument runs—achieved a great "political success." He isolated in a "weak and precarious majority" representatives of Latin thought on the court—France, Italy, Spain, Rumania, South America, and Poland, France's ally. On the other side were the representatives of England, the United States, Germany, and Holland. It was an "accident" that the Chinese and Japanese judges were in this group. The presence of the Belgian in such a coterie was a "warning"—a warning, doubtless, that Belgium may not follow France when she is convinced that the French position is incorrect. Here was a cleavage between the Latin and non-Latin conceptions of law. The latter, with its common-law background, closed the door without locking it. But why discuss the decision in terms of a triumph for Sir Cecil Hurst?

The fallacy of doing this is apparent if one thinks of the article of the same genre which could be written for an English or German newspaper. The French have a judge on the Permanent Court. He is M. Fromageot, lately legal adviser of the Quai d'Orsay but not specifically mentioned in M. Bardoux's article. The decision holding the customs union illegal under the 1922 protocol could be interpreted as showing how successful M. Fromageot had been in lining up the Latin judges and persuading them to accept his views. The Rumanian and Polish judges came from countries which are France's allies. The political success of the Quai d'Orsay in counting on their votes was assured from the beginning. Only in the case of Belgium was France unsuccessful in securing a natural adherent of the bloc. M. Fromageot was unable to convince the Belgian judge. He was unsuccessful in that only seven judges considered the customs union illegal under the Treaty of St. Germain, but he was successful in that eight judges considered the union illegal under the 1922 protocol. Such an analysis of the Permanent Court's opinion would be grossly unfair, but it is no more unfair than M. Bardoux's comments on the non-Latin bloc which, it is alleged, was built by Sir Cecil Hurst. To suggest this is not to defend the decision and its political basis. Nor is it to deny the truth in the jest that if the judges had been weighed instead of counted, the decision would have upheld the legality of the proposed customs union. My point is simply that M. Bardoux, experienced publicist though he be, thinks only in terms of France, so that he writes in blissful ignorance of the fact that his argument can be very neatly turned against him.

M. Bardoux, unfortunately, is not an isolated case. He assumes that the French position on the customs case was unchallengeable; that it was so right that the unwillingness to accept that position in toto discloses a conspiracy against France. If all states took such a rigid point of view no international negotiations would be possible. Because the French point of view did not triumph completely, the customs decision is considered a political success of Sir Cecil Hurst. Just as fairly or unfairly, the decision may be considered as a triumph of M. Fromageot. If each side argues in this fashion, what hope is there for intelligent discussion? Too many French publicists "reason" without seeing that precisely the same kind of "reasoning" can be used against France.

When, for example, reparations were being settled at The Hague, and Philip Snowden, Chancellor of the British Exchequer, announced that Great Britain would not make further sacrifices, he was denounced as willing to break up the conference. That was the tone of practically every article in the French press. There was little or no discussion of the merits or demerits of the British case. Would it not have been equally fair or unfair to say that France was willing to break up the conference because of her refusal to discuss England's refusal further to sacrifice? If that had been the tone of the non-French press, what would France have said? At The Hague it remained for Italy, whose diplomacy is rapidly becoming the most astute on the Conti-

HUNGER AND LOVE

A Novel by Lionel Britton
Introduction by Bertrand Russell

is

- no book for the faint-hearted;
- no book for the intellectually lazy;
- no book for those who wish to believe this the best of all possible worlds;
- no book for those who do not want to be stirred, aroused, angered, electrified, embittered.

Among those who have been extravagantly enthusiastic about this novel, which has created a sensation in England (it is now in its third printing there) are BERNARD SHAW, BERTRAND RUSSELL, ARNOLD BENNETT, LAURENCE STALLINGS and UPTON SINCLAIR. Originally published in this country by Harper and Brothers at $4, it is now reissued at $3 by its present publishers, who have acquired all American rights.

623 Pages

$3 at all bookstores

THE VANGUARD PRESS

100 Fifth Ave., New York

YOU'LL want to read

Jessie Fauset's powerful novel about modern Negroes—

The CHINABERRY TREE

Countee Cullen says:

"It mightily establishes Miss Fauset's position as our foremost Negro fictionist." Author of "Plum Bun."

At your bookshop. $2.00

F. A. STOKES COMPANY, 443 Fourth Ave., New York

PROOF!

Oscar Ameringer's new journal of opinion, in seven months' time has shown the following growth:

April 3, 1931.....	3,618	Aug. 1, 1931.....	8,942
May 1, 1931.....	5,012	Sept. 1, 1931.....	11,216
June 1, 1931.....	6,326	Oct. 1, 1931.....	15,829
July 1, 1931.....	7,842	Nov. 1, 1931.....	18,027

Born during the worst period of the depression, without the use of a single premium, without the payment of one cent to subscription agents, The American Guardian has had such excellent growth.

Imagine a newspaper voicing the radical spirit of the day, receiving in its mails, subscriptions from bankers and day laborers, professional men and workers, letters from men and women in every walk of life, saying, "I like your humor, your wit, your logic, and I'll help you grow." Write for samples. Let the paper speak for itself.

$1.00 for the Year

THE AMERICAN GUARDIAN

BOX 777

Oklahoma City, Okla.

ment, to point the way to an adjustment that was more equitable than either extreme position would have been.

There are two other aspects of the customs case which will be of some future interest. Before the Permanent Court's decision was announced, there were plain indications that if the court ruled in favor of the legality of the customs protocol, France would nevertheless object on political grounds to the consummation of the union. If that had been done—and who will deny that it would have been attempted—France would have sought to revise the treaty settlements. The Permanent Court would have ruled that the treaties and the protocol of 1922 permitted the economic Anschluss. France would have then endeavored to prevent the economic Anschluss and in effect to amend the treaties. The French position has been that the treaty structure of Europe is sacrosanct. Should not the logical position now be that the treaty structure is sacrosanct unless France wishes to change it to her own advantage?

And what will France's position be when closer economic arrangements are discussed for the states bordering on the Danube? Could Austria enter into a customs union with Hungary without compromising her independence? The advisory opinion would seem to say no, but the juridical question would not arise since the French representative on the League Council would probably not object. Would he thereby sanction on political grounds an agreement which violated the protocol of 1922? When such questions are posed and answered, that logic of which the French occasionally boast may be subjected to slight strains.

□ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT □

PLAYS TO SEE

Brief Moment—Cort—W. 48 St.
Civic Light Opera Co.—Erlanger's—W. 44 St.
Counsellor-at-Law—Plymouth—W. 45 St.
Cynara—Morosco—45 St. W of B'way.
Distant Drums—Belasco—W. 44 St.
Electro—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
Hay Fever—Avon—W. 45 St.
Jewell Robbery—Booth—45 St. W. of B'way.
Mourning Becomes Electra—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.
Of Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.
Reunion in Vienna—Martin Beck—45 St. & 4 Ave.
Springtime for Henry—Bijou—45 St. W. of B'way.
The Animal Kingdom—Broadhurst—44 St. W. of B'way.
The Bride The Sun Shines On—Geo. M. Cohen—B'way. & 43 St.
The Devil Passes—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
The Good Fairy—Henry Miller's—124 W. 43 St.
The Left Bank—Little—44 St.
Whistling in the Dark—Ethel Barrymore—47 St. W. of B'way.

DEBATE

"Should Divorce in America Be Made Easier,"—Morris L. Ernst, and Rev. Wm. Sheafe Chase, D.D., Tuesday evening, February 9, 8:30 p.m., at Auditorium, 150 West 85th Street.

OPERA BENEFIT

"La Juive," Metropolitan Opera House, February 22, at 2 p.m., American Ort Benefit, to aid the Jews of Eastern Europe.

See page ii for plays, films, debates, lectures, reunion and benefit.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1932

No. 3476

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	181
EDITORIALS:
A New Partition of China	184
Christian Science Economics	185
A Four-Year Program	185
The Cynical Youngest Generation	186
CHINA FIGHTS BACK. By T. A. Bisson	187
THE OPPOSITION IN JAPAN. By Upton Close	189
MR. HOOVER RIDES THE DONKEY. By Paul Y. Anderson.....	190
A CLOSE-UP OF GEORGE WASHINGTON. By W. E. Woodward..	191
DOLE OR INSURANCE? By William M. Leiserson.....	193
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	195
CORRESPONDENCE	195
FINANCE: ENGLAND GROPEs FOR MARKETS. By S. Palmer Harman	197
MIDWINTER BOOK SECTION
LYTTON STRACHEY. By Joseph Wood Krutch	199
POEM FOR MY DAUGHTER: II. By Horace Gregory.....	200
THE CALM WITHIN THE CYCLONE. By C. Hartley Grattan.....	201
LULLABY FOR JONATHAN. By Frances Frost	204
BOOKS:
What's Wrong with Utopia? By Henry Hazlitt.....	204
Two Reviews of Mr. Tarkington. By Clifton Fadiman	206
Education in America. By Abraham Flexner	207
A Cloud of Dadaists. By Matthew Josephson	208
Books in Brief	209
MUSIC: Mental and Bodily Rhythm. By Arthur Mendel.....	210
DRAMA: O'Neill Again. By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	210
FILMS: Propaganda. By Margaret Marshall	212
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	212

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN FRED A. KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

WHEN THE DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE at Geneva opened it was faced with obstacles that seemed virtually insurmountable. To these, at the eleventh hour, was added the Japanese invasion of Shanghai, which so greatly embarrassed the delegates that few dared predict anything but miserable failure for the conference. There is still grave danger of failure, though the Japanese have relieved the embarrassment noticeable at the first session, not by acting sensibly, but by making themselves appear ridiculous. The second session had to be postponed an hour to allow the League of Nations Council time to discuss the events at Shanghai. At the Council meeting the Japanese representative arose and solemnly indorsed international intervention at Shanghai "to protect the Japanese from Chinese aggression." Suddenly, according to Frank H. Simonds, reporting the conference in the New York Evening Post, "a low shrill laugh was heard. In a moment almost a hysterical outburst of derisive laughter swept statesmen, diplomats, and audience." What is happening at Shanghai can certainly never be laughed off. But the spontaneous outbreak of bitter laughter that greeted the Japanese representative may serve to clear the atmosphere in Geneva. Having penetrated the all-too-transparent camouflage of Japan's argument, the League may now be able to deal with Japanese aggression in China as justice and international conscience require.

THE FRENCH PROPOSAL for an international police force composed of the heavier armaments of the members of the League of Nations—with the non-member states under the control of a mysterious "international authority"—is the reductio ad absurdum of the attitude that armed force keeps the peace. History is full of examples to the contrary—the strongest nation, the nation most completely equipped with armaments and most securely strengthened by allies, is the nation confident enough to venture any war. The French suggestion, however, is entirely consistent with the steadily held French demand for security. By thrusting it at the conference almost before the preliminaries are completed, France evidently hopes to disguise that demand by proposing a gift of security for the whole world. That the proposal has nothing to do with disarmament should be plain to all. It has had a cool reception: England does not welcome the idea of placing its navy under the control of any outside agency; our isolationist Senators refuse to take the plan seriously; Dr. Curtius, former German Foreign Minister, declares that the French wish merely to disrupt the disarmament conference. At that conference the Soviet delegates remain the only champions of complete disarmament, although Signor Grandi of Italy is quoted as urging "the reduction of armaments to the lowest possible level," and the "entire abolition of certain arms." By the proponents of armed security, these positions are generally dismissed as unrealistic, but the French, usually the super-realists of civilization, have this time made a gesture impossible of realization as it would be ineffectual if it were realized.

TEN MILLION SIGNATURES attest the wishes of their signers that world armaments be substantially reduced. Packing-boxes of petitions containing the hopes of these and many more millions for success to the conference at Geneva were piled about the table in the hall where the delegates are meeting. Eight million women sent their names; 2,500,000 men and women from Holland alone added their pleas; representatives from 25,000,000 Catholic women, representatives of peace organizations with a combined membership of 45,000,000, representatives from 50,000,000 Methodists, from the International Cooperative Alliance, with a membership of 70,000,000 families—each in turn marched up to the peace table and declared the hopes of their several memberships. One wonders just what went on in the minds of the delegates to the conference as they heard these pleas for release from the numbing burden of world arms. Each delegate has his plans, also; each one knows just how far his government is willing for him to go in the direction of limitation of armaments; each one knows what reservations will be made, what limitation of limitation. Each one knows that every country is in the last analysis dominated by fear, and fear demands force to protect it from possible enemies. But every delegate must know also that if these millions who are on record as desiring peace should severally and jointly refuse to participate in the next war, there would be no more wars. The petitioners themselves do not realize their power. Until they do, their petitions remain so much paper in packing-boxes, vague registrations of an attitude wholly just and sound, but ineffective until reinforced by action.

THE APPARENT DETERMINATION of Senator Glass to rush through his banking bill as if it were an emergency measure is unfortunate. There is, strictly speaking, but one provision of the measure that needs to be acted upon quickly. This is the one setting up inside the Federal Reserve system a corporation to liquidate the assets of failed member banks and promptly to pay depositors as large a proportion of those assets as possible. But there is no reason why this provision cannot be passed as a separate measure, leaving other provisions to maturer consideration. The Nation has already indicated its sympathy with many of the other provisions of the Glass bill—notably those extending branch banking, removing the Secretary of the Treasury from the Federal Reserve Board, and seeking to control banking affiliates—but other provisions might prove immediately harmful by forcing liquidation of certain types of loans at a time when the business community is least prepared to withstand such liquidation. We need further study, moreover, to know whether the provisions for controlling banking affiliates would really control them or whether they would merely drive some of the large banks out of the Federal Reserve system and under State charters where the law would be ineffective.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, who stood with Wilson in 1920 for the League of Nations and the new internationalism, has now gone over to the nationalists and isolationists. He has turned against the League of Nations, and he insists that Europe must pay its debts. He seems to realize that the trend in American sentiment today is away from Europe, and, if we may take his speech before the New York State Grange at its face value, he apparently means to cater to this growing nationalist sentiment in the hope of catching votes for himself as a Presidential candidate. The League today "is not the League conceived by Woodrow Wilson," he said. "It might have been had the United States joined." But as we did not join, "the League has not developed through these years along the course contemplated by its founder." Therefore, "I do not favor American participation." Just what does this mean? Clearly nothing except that Governor Roosevelt has not the courage to stand out bravely for the internationalism he once sponsored. His attitude on the war debts is equally unrealistic. He would grant the European nations a respite "if it were considered advisable in the present condition of world finance," but he would "insist upon an accord as to when payments should begin and in what amount." The high spot of his address was his denunciation of the Smoot-Hawley tariff, which he correctly pointed out was adding to the cost of living in this country. But instead of urging that the American tariff be reduced, or pledging himself to work to that end when and if he becomes President, he vaguely recommended that an international tariff conference be called.

ALFRED E. SMITH has announced that he is willing to accept the Democratic nomination for the Presidency, "if the Democratic National Convention, after careful consideration, should decide it wants me." This means, in less diplomatic language, that former Governor Smith is now an avowed candidate for the nomination. It does not mean that he will be nominated or elected. For months the anti-Roosevelt Democrats have been leaderless and planless; they have swung from one candidate to another, from Owen D. Young to Albert Ritchie to Newton D. Baker to John Garner, without being able to crystallize sentiment for any one of them. In consequence the boom for Franklin D. Roosevelt moved steadily forward, until in the last few weeks it began to appear as though the nomination would go to the New York Governor by default. Smith's statement has changed this. Although he said that he would not make a personal campaign to win delegates himself, his announcement was clearly a call to the anti-Roosevelt people to tackle that job for him. It is not likely that he will go into the convention with enough delegates to win the nomination for himself, but there can be little doubt that he will have enough votes to block Roosevelt, if that is his desire, and to veto the nomination of anyone else to whom he might be opposed.

THE OBVIOUS COMMENT upon the transfer of Andrew W. Mellon from the Treasury Department to the Embassy of the United States at the Court of St. James's, is that this is a convenient way to remove from Washington an official long since supplanted by his subordinate, who now succeeds to his position. A long time ago the myth was exploded that Andrew W. Mellon was the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton. Our late captains of industry and leaders of Wall Street have forgotten to use this complimentary description of Mr. Mellon ever since the crash of 1929. His administration of the Treasury Department could no better bear analysis than could that of most of the men alongside of whom he has sat during his eleven years in the Cabinet. To pretend that this appointment measures up to the standard set by our ambassadors to London until recent years, is obviously preposterous. Mr. Mellon typifies the successful pursuit of wealth, coupled with the acquisition of some political power in his State and a complete readiness to represent in political life the desires of the masters of America. His successor, Ogden L. Mills, has undoubtedly a more liberal viewpoint, comparative youth, great ability, and the faculty of presenting his views in public with remarkable clarity and force.

Besides "making the world safe for democracy," the most impelling reason why the United States entered the World War was to protect its capital loaned abroad. It had loaned money to the Allied nations, and its arms manufacturing had rolled vast quantities of war materials to be shot by the Allies into Germany, and against the German army, in protecting France and Belgium.

THIS BOLSHEVISTIC UTTERANCE we have clipped straight out of the editorial columns of the Chicago Journal of Commerce, the organ of big business, the exponent of unrestricted capitalism, of more business in government, and less government in business. This paper is one hundred per cent American and down with all critics of the best social and political system in the world! Yet here it is using exactly the words for which Eugene Debs was sentenced to prison in Cleveland soon after the outbreak of the war. He, too, declared that it was a war by capitalists for capitalists and the idea that there was a vestige of idealism about it was a fraud. For that he stayed in jail until Mr. Wilson disappeared from office and a kinder and more humane man, President Harding, took his place. It is true that before his death Mr. Wilson admitted that the war had its origins in economic strife, but never before have we seen such a confession as the one we have quoted right in the citadel of big business. At least it is gratifying now to know that the Chicago Journal of Commerce has seen the light and can declare, speaking of the Shanghai situation, "We have no business in this mess except to protect American citizens and treaty rights. We have no business, regardless of sympathies one way or the other, to sell arms and war materials to either Japan or China. . . . One sale of ammunition to either side would make us a potential ally." Shades of the war to end war!

DESPITE THE DISAGREEMENT in its own ranks, the British Cabinet has submitted to the House of Commons a resolution providing for a general tariff. The measure would place a 10 per cent ad valorem duty on all imported goods except raw cotton, raw wool, meats, fish, and wheat. A tariff will be put on wheat later when a quota system, yet to be devised, is adopted. Imports from the British dominions are to be excluded from the provisions of the tariff act pending the outcome of the Imperial Conference at Ottawa in July. Thus does Great Britain formally renounce free trade, for there can be no question that the overwhelmingly Conservative House will approve this measure. In offering the resolution Neville Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, said that the general tariff would be used for bargaining purposes. Nothing could be more absurd. Does Mr. Chamberlain or anyone else really suppose that this will lead to a leveling of tariff walls? Quite the contrary; other nations will be quick to raise their tariffs so that they will be in better position to bargain with Great Britain. Such bargains at best will mean merely a subsequent return to the present levels. And if the bargains fail, we shall have tariff walls even higher than those which are now slowly choking to death the foreign trade of England and all other protective countries.

IT WAS NO ACCIDENT perhaps that Lithuania should have chosen this particular time for a coup d'état in the autonomous territory of Memel. This district is a stepchild of the League of Nations. It once belonged to Germany, but under the Treaty of Versailles Germany ceded it to the Allies, who placed it under French administration. Lithuania felt that it ought to have been given to her inasmuch as the port of Memel provides the only ocean outlet for most Lithuanian commerce. On January 15, 1923, the Lithuanians by a surprise attack seized Memel and forced the French garrison to surrender and evacuate. Under an agreement proposed by the conference of ambassadors in Paris and signed in May, 1924, Memel was constituted a unit within the sovereignty of Lithuania. But the city was considered a port of international concern, and therefore it was given a clearly defined measure of administrative and financial autonomy. The President of Lithuania was granted the privilege of appointing the governor of the territory. As the population of Memel is predominantly German, the governing council has been in German hands. But now Lithuanian troops have arrested the members of the council, and a Lithuanian directorate has been set up to govern the city. This is clearly in defiance of the 1924 agreement, responsibility for which lies with the League of Nations. It is unlikely that Lithuania would have taken this step had she had any real respect for the authority of the League, but so low has that organization fallen in the esteem of the world, largely as the result of the Manchurian failure, that even minor Powers like Lithuania feel confident that they can with impunity ignore it.

TO GOVERNOR PHILIP LA FOLLETTE goes the honor of being the first Executive to sign a bill setting up a compulsory unemployment-insurance system in America. This will go into effect in Wisconsin next year unless employers in the meantime adopt a satisfactory voluntary plan affecting at least 175,000 workers. Once more Wisconsin, under the La Follette leadership, is in the van of progress. The law requires every employer to set aside 2 per cent of his pay rolls until a fund of $75 has been built up for each employee. Any employee laid off because of curtailment of work will draw a maximum benefit of $10 a week for a period of ten weeks. It is obvious that in a crisis like the present such a provision will prove entirely inadequate. The bill is plainly but a beginning. This its sponsors admitted, and they are looking forward to strengthening and improving it as experience in its operation is acquired. The important thing is that a beginning has been made and an example set. It now remains to be seen whether the Industrial Commission to which the enforcement of the statute is committed will discover in June, 1933, that there is sufficiently extensive voluntary insurance to postpone the enactment of the statute, or whether all employers in the State will have to make their first payments under the law in June, 1934.

A STATE SECRET is out at last! When Vice-President Coolidge took the oath ushering him into the Presidency of the United States he stood in the old homestead at Plymouth, Vermont, and with his hand on the family Bible, and by the light of a kerosene lamp, repeated after his own father, a justice of the peace, the significant words. We all read it at the time, and it helped make the picture of the simple, taciturn Yankee, American to his roots, who was to guide the destinies of America. Every roto-gravure section of the Sunday newspapers carried affecting pictures of the simple scene, and the little drama was worth thousands of dollars in Presidential human interest. It seems, however, that there is no Santa Claus. For Mr. Coolidge, with characteristic Yankee suspicion, thought perhaps the simple, country oath had been something less than adequate, and two weeks later the oath was privately administered by Justice A. A. Hoehling in Washington, with nobody present but the President and the Judge. It remains a question whether or not, from August 3 to August 17, 1923, we were without a duly sworn President of the United States. Probably the issue will never arise. But the next time we read of the President's grandchildren looking for bears in the White House, or of the puppy which takes liberties with the President's breakfast unrebuked, we shall be frankly skeptical. We have been deceived once. Hereafter an ineradicable suspicion will be a part of our formerly credible nature and salt will be the main article of our diet.

A New Partition of China

JAPAN has proposed a new partitioning of China. She would have five of the principal cities—Shanghai, Canton, Hankow, Tientsin, and Tsingtao—demilitarized and surrounded by neutral zones from fifteen to twenty miles in diameter. The neutrality of these areas would be guaranteed by the foreign Powers; Chinese troops would not be allowed to enter the zones. The extraterritorial rights of foreign residents would be retained in these five cities, though abolished elsewhere in China. Permanent international intervention of this character is absolutely essential, say the Japanese, if China is to have enduring peace and a stable government. Could anything be more fantastic—or more hypocritical?

The Japanese base their proposal on two contentions: first, that the Nine-Power Treaty has failed of its purpose, and, second, that twenty years have passed since the republican revolution and these twenty years have failed to produce peace and stability. Therefore, "it is high time that the Powers do something." It cannot be denied that there has been little peace and stability in China since the revolution of 1911, but can it seriously be argued that by taking over the five principal commercial centers of the country the Powers can insure internal peace? And what assurance does history give us that Japan or any of the other Powers would go about this task sincerely and honestly? None whatever. Indeed, the statement of the Foreign Office spokesman in Tokio clearly suggests the true motive behind the Japanese proposal. The spokesman said that by internationalizing these cities the Chinese war lords would be deprived of their principal sources of revenue and thus could no longer carry on their costly and disturbing civil warfare. Who then would control these revenues? Obviously, the foreign Powers.

It is true that the Nine-Power Treaty has failed, but this failure has not been due to any defect in the treaty itself. The treaty has failed because Japan has smashed it with ruthless military force. The Japanese seek to justify their action in Manchuria on the ground that the Chinese themselves were unable to maintain that measure of stability and administrative integrity which the Washington agreement was supposed to guarantee. Hence the Japanese contend it was imperative for an outside Power to step in and help the Chinese. But this is utter nonsense. The Nine-Power Treaty was adopted in Washington for the very reason that conditions in China were unstable, and therefore it was considered necessary to set up an international guaranty that would protect China against the aggression of another Power which might seek to use the unstable conditions as an excuse for aggrandizing itself. It was deliberately and frankly designed to prevent the very sort of military aggression which the Japanese have undertaken in Manchuria and at Shanghai. Having destroyed the treaty, the Japanese now propose that another shall take its place, and that this new covenant shall legalize Japan's unlawful action in conquering Manchuria and bombarding Shanghai.

But the Japanese scheme has other and perhaps more serious aspects. It openly flouts the historic Chinese policy of the United States, and it would undo those peaceful efforts (though it must be conceded that all our past relations with China have not been peaceful or entirely unselfish) which we and other Powers have made in the last thirty years to help the Chinese establish an enduring government. We have tried to help the Chinese modernize their court system, and have promised to abolish extraterritoriality when this is done; we have restored tariff autonomy to China; we have encouraged it in its struggle for political stability and independence by recognizing the Nationalist Government and by maintaining friendly diplomatic relations throughout the period of its distress. Now we are called upon to renounce even these efforts, feeble as they are, to assist China. The Japanese would retain extraterritorial privileges for all foreigners in the internationalized cities, though abolishing them elsewhere. But it is just in these cities that the bulk of the foreigners live, and it is against their retention of special privileges that the whole Nationalist campaign has been directed. Do the Japanese propose that we now take away from the Chinese the tariff autonomy we yielded to them only a few years ago? They can have nothing else in mind. The only way the Powers could possibly prevent the Chinese government or the Chinese war lords from obtaining the revenues available in these cities is by collecting the customs duties themselves or by hiring Chinese puppets to do this for them. Furthermore, by thus controlling the chief commercial cities the Powers would in effect be controlling, not the narrow zones that the Japanese suggest be neutralized, but the whole economic hinterland of each city. In brief, the Japanese plan would put virtually all of China—or at least all of it that is worth exploiting—completely under the domination of foreign Powers.

That Tokio has signified its willingness to share the loot with other countries does not make its projected crime any more justifiable or excusable. Clearly the Japanese have taken this attitude only because they have suddenly discovered that the Shanghai situation is more than they can handle alone. At Shanghai they have come into open conflict with the interests of other Powers, and, what is probably more important, they have been rebuffed by the Chinese. To clear the Chinese soldiers out of the Shanghai area they would have to send a large-sized army into China. But that would increase the chances of a clash with the other Powers and therefore the chances of an international war. Though it was not so clear a week ago, it now seems certain that Japan at this time does not want to risk a war against the rest of the world. What could be more reasonable, therefore, than to invite the Western Powers to help Japan accomplish what she apparently set out to accomplish alone? Manchuria presents a different situation. There no other Power—except Russia—has a definite political interest. Hence, say the Japanese, "we can handle that problem single-handed." They are willing to be generous when it comes to partitioning China proper, but Manchuria, which they have been able to steal without direct outside aid, they intend to reserve for themselves.

Christian Science Economics

WHAT is optimism?" Cacambo asks in Voltaire's novel. "Alas," replies Candide, "it is the mania of maintaining that everything is well when we are miserable." This is the definition of Mr. Hoover's official optimism; and that optimism is his chief prescription for getting us out of the world depression. If we could all conspire to have "confidence," we are led to believe, the depression would be over in three months. This theory was never put forward more bluntly than in the President's recent appeal to the public to end currency hoarding. Yet even if the theory were fundamentally correct, Mr. Hoover's appeal, and the ballyhoo conference that followed it, would have been dubious actions. There are few more effective ways of undermining confidence than to tell everyone that a lack of confidence already exists.

The President, moreover, partly through lack of knowledge and partly through lack of candor, has greatly misrepresented the real situation. He maintains that at present more than $1,300,000,000 of currency is being hoarded. This estimate is apparently based on the figures of Federal Reserve notes in circulation. On February 3 these amounted to $2,664,000,000, an increase of $1,187,000,000 over those in circulation in the corresponding week a year ago, and of $1,340,000,000 over the circulation in the week of August 20, 1930. It is a general belief, which the President shares, that there has been no increase in business in the meantime to account for the larger volume of currency in circulation, but on the contrary a decrease in business, the additional currency has all been called for to supply or to take the place of currency in hoarding. This theory, however, overlooks one extremely important factor. Since the beginning of 1931 more than 2,500 banks have closed their doors, leaving hundreds of communities without any banking facilities of any kind. When people are no longer able to do business by check, they are forced to carry on whatever business remains with cash. Naturally, therefore, the demand for hand-to-hand cash must have increased enormously. Exactly what proportion of the $1,300,000,000 increase in Federal Reserve notes is the result of this type of demand it is of course impossible to say; but it is obviously a very substantial one; and such currency can certainly not be called "hoarded."

Curiously enough, while the President greatly exaggerated the volume of genuinely hoarded money by neglecting to think of—or to mention—this factor of closed banks, he gave a misleading impression on the other side by his statement that "the very act of creating the [Reconstruction Finance] Corporation has already shown results in the dissipation of fear and the restoration of public confidence, as indicated by the fact that recently we have had on balance no increasing in hoarding of currency in the country." The Federal Reserve note figures, certainly, do not support the President's statement; they show an increase in the note issue of $51,000,000 since the beginning of the year, compared with a decrease of $187,000,000 and $226,000,000 respectively in the two preceding years.

Mr. Hoover also greatly misrepresented the situation in asserting that "every dollar hoarded means a destruction of from five to ten dollars of credit." If the public were now hoarding gold, the President's remark would at least have had a certain purely theoretic justification, for credit cannot be further expanded when the gold-reserve ratio falls below a certain point. That purely theoretic consideration, however, has absolutely no practical importance or relevance at the present time. The Governor of the New York Federal Reserve Bank has only recently pointed out that on the basis of our present gold reserves, credit could now legally be expanded—if there were any effective demand for it—by the stupendous total of $35,000,000,000. Yet even such a purely theoretic justification does not exist for the remark that the hoarding of currency "destroys" from five to ten dollars of credit. Everyone in the least familiar with banking knows that bank deposits and bank notes are convertible into each other dollar for dollar in accordance with public demand. In the Federal Reserve Bank statement, the bank notes do not appear on the "resources" side with the gold reserves, but, quite properly, on the "liabilities" side with the deposits.

But the major criticism of the President's statement is that it reveals, more nakedly even than his previous statements, that his policy is not to concern himself with the roots of the present depression but merely with its symptoms. Hoarding is obviously far more a result of conditions than it is a cause of them. And it is certainly not going to be ended merely by patriotic appeals or high-pressure propaganda. There is an element of truth, of course, in the belief that business improves when confidence improves. But Mr. Hoover must some day be brought to recognize that confidence itself must in its turn be based on something. It will begin to make its appearance when Mr. Hoover and Congress have shown a willingness and a competence to deal with conditions with intelligence and courage. The Christian Science economics of the Hoover Administration is as much as any factor postponing the return of confidence that the President so ardently and rightly desires.

A Four-Year Program

WE are including with this week's issue of The Nation the four-year Presidential plan prepared by the League for Independent Political Action as something that could be in large measure achieved between 1932 and 1936 by any President who had social vision and a progressive political party behind him. That much of it could only be initiated is true. But a President who espoused even half of this program could readily change the whole face of things in America provided that he had a Congress to back him.

Let us point out at once that the league itself is not a political party and under its charter could not turn itself into one. It was conceived as a clearing-house of progressive opinion, as a rallying-point for those who refuse any longer to be buncoed by either of the outworn and corrupt parties now existing. The program is therefore not advanced as a definitive and all-inclusive program. Any third-party movement which may be launched either this year or four years from now will be bound to take this program into consideration. It would be a mistake, however, for any party organization to use for its statement of principles a document as long and detailed as this. Failing a single compelling moral or economic issue, any such political venture should confine itself to some few major principles. It is the misfortune of progressives today that there are so many wrongs crying for adjustment, that the whole field of economics has overrun the field of politics, and that international relations have become so tremendously involved and so vital. There seems no hope that out of all this welter will come one or more compelling issues, unless it should be the question whether the American Republic shall or shall not collapse under its present misguided leadership, and whether or not thousands upon thousands of Americans shall die of starvation because of the insistence of a few men in political life, at the behest of their mistaken financial masters, that no direct aid shall be given to these unfortunate persons.

Failing that—and we trust with all our hearts that no such issue will present itself—the question of social and economic reform is of the utmost urgency. We repeat that it is hopeless to expect the slightest advance from the Republicans or the Democrats. Were there courage or intellectual honesty in the Republican Party today, the leaders, who are overwhelmingly opposed to the renomination of Herbert Hoover, would say out loud what they are saying privately about the failure in the White House. As for the Democrats, there is not a candidate in sight who is not weak or a typical compromiser. If anybody thinks that Franklin Roosevelt or Newton Baker could achieve anything worth while, in conjunction with the present Democratic Party, his political insight is of the stuff that dreams are made on. Hence the necessity that some group should be studying political problems from the point of view of political theory and economic necessity. Certainly this document of the League for Independent Political Action embodies the most advanced thinking that has been done in non-Socialist circles since the Bull Moose platform and that of La Follette.

By that we do not imply, nor, we are sure, would its authors suggest, that it is beyond improvement. We regret, for example, that it does not unqualifiedly call for the complete wiping out of debts and reparations. But as a whole, particularly in view of the short time in which it was produced, we find it a worth-while and challenging document. There will be those to regret that it was not built around some central policy, and many will feel that it is not radical or impassioned enough for the existing situation. None the less, we believe that it is a great step forward; if this were a country given, like England, to a discussion of political theories and principles, this program would at least demand a response from the parties now in the field. Somehow, sometime, a program like this must be put before the electorate if we are not going to be given the choice between extreme conservatism and the radicalism of the Communists. Now at least we have a program which embodies in very considerable measure the reforms for which The Nation has pleaded these many years, for which little groups all over the country are beginning to organize. Here at least is a basis for discussion for those whose foresight and patriotism rise above indiscriminating adherence to political parties long since outworn.

The Cynical Youngest Generation

THE one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Horatio Alger has passed uncelebrated in these columns. Apparently it passed equally unnoticed in a good many others, for the Children's Aid Society was moved by the general lack of excitement to investigate the state of Alger's fame in the ranks of the youngest generation, and has come to the conclusion that the man who was once by far the most popular writer for boys in America has fallen very low indeed.

Less than 20 per cent of the seven thousand members of New York's juvenile proletariat had ever heard of the author of "Tom the Bootblack"; only 14 per cent had read even one of his 119 published works; and not a single boy owned a single volume of the series, though about half of the seven thousand queried "have a book." What will be even more alarming to some is the fact that a considerable number dismissed the theory of "work and win" as "a lot of bunk," and that only one youth could be found sufficiently conservative in his literary taste to boast that he had read every one of Alger's books. Doubtless he will grow up to be a member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

We must confess, however, that our own melancholy as we contemplate this example of the transitoriness of literary fame is purely sentimental, and that it does not spring from any faith in either the aesthetic merits of the works themselves or in their capacity to elevate the moral standards of their readers. We once read all of them on which it was possible to lay our hands and we read them with a passionate loyalty, but it is hard even to remember what their charm was or why we did not simply read the same one over again as often as the need to read anything arose. The formula was invariable, and always involved, first, the rescue of the banker's daughter from a mad dog or a runaway horse, and then a false suspicion of theft which raised its ugly head against our hero. Alger is said to have been distressed all his life with the desire to do "serious work," but we know of no one who ever revealed less promise, and it is our considered belief that the literary value of his novels is about as near absolute zero as it is possible for anything composed in intelligible sentences to be.

Neither, for that matter, are we aware that our moral tone was stiffened, or that we would have been any more efficient in handling a mad dog than we would have been if we had spent all our time in the company of Old King Brady. Putting aside the nice ethical questions involved in the effort to evaluate the exact degree of moral beauty to be discovered in the general injunction "Be good so you can get rich," it is to be observed that all Alger's insistence upon the duty of thrift did not prevent him from being extremely improvident or from dying poor, and we are inclined to believe that the effect of his work could be pretty accurately measured by its effect upon him. If detective novels and gangster movies do the youth of the land no more harm than the Alger books did their fathers good, then the youngest generation is safe.

China Fights Back

By T. A. BISSON

THE January events of 1932 at Shanghai throw a lurid glare back over a path that the Powers have been following in China for nine decades, since the Treaty of Nanking in 1842. They presage the end of an era. Events not too dissimilar are transpiring in India; the burden of their message is the same. The two great colonial nations of the world—China and India—are in revolt. The grip is slipping; the heyday of imperialism has passed.

The Treaty of Nanking marked the turning-point in China's struggle to maintain its integrity in the face of the ever-accelerating onslaught of the West. For China it broke down the wall of exclusion erected in self-defense. For the West it established an "open door"—through which to enter, and then to get and to hold. The Opium War of 1839-42 was fought by Great Britain, which therefrom gained two especial benefits: the cession in perpetuity of Hongkong, and an indemnity of $21,000,000. The more significant advantages—unrestricted freedom of trade, a low fixed tariff, extra-territorial jurisdiction—were shared by the United States and France in treaties they made haste to negotiate with China in 1844. The American policy of equality of opportunity secured the same advantages to all the Powers that followed—some twenty of them by 1900.

By 1844 China was well started on the road to a colonial status. The steps on that downward path indicate how completely the goal was achieved. They include the following: loss of territories—Siberian Maritime Province, Upper Burma, the Loochoo Islands, Indo-China, Formosa and the Pescadores, Korea, Tibet; leaseholds—Kiaochow, Liaotung, Kwangchowwan, Kowloon Extension, and Weihaiwei; some fifty concessions and settlements in a score of cities and towns; railways from Manchuria to Yunnan; indemnities and loans, met from revenues of the foreign-administered maritime customs and salt gabelle; 5 per cent ad valorem tariff, fixed on the 1858 price level and unchanged until 1902, when it represented an effective 2 or 3 per cent, raised to an effective 5 per cent in 1902 to make possible payments on the Boxer indemnity; extraterritorial jurisdiction; right of coastal and inland navigation for foreign vessels; policing rights, through foreign warships on Chinese waters and military forces at Shanghai, Tientsin, Peking, and elsewhere.

Not the least significant phase of foreign economic penetration is represented by Shanghai. Through this commercial metropolis of the Far East have poured the machine-made products of the West. Aided by the nominal customs tariff these goods have flooded China, overwhelming the native handicraft industries, disrupting the delicate equilibrium between the products of farm and handicraft characteristic of the older Chinese economy, disintegrating the guilds, and throwing thousands of artisans back upon an already overcrowded agriculture for their means of livelihood. It is to the working out of this process, especially to the loss of the effective economic and political controls formerly exerted by the guilds, and not to a facile assumption of Chinese political incapacity, that the present disorganization of Chinese society must be chiefly traced.

The areas now embraced in the International Settlement and the French Concession, and the authority wielded by the foreign governmental authorities set up therein, constitute the results of a gradual evolutionary development that began in 1842. The Treaty of Nanking denominated Shanghai as one of the five treaty ports within which foreigners might take up their residence for purposes of trade. The establishment of a settlement in which foreigners might acquire land and rent houses and set up business establishments constituted the totality of the rights conferred by treaty. The British Settlement was established at Shanghai on this basis in 1843. No definite boundaries were fixed; no administrative rights were delegated to the foreign residents. On this slight foundation, so far as legal right is concerned, the superstructure of modern Shanghai, with its extensive foreign-administered areas, has been built.

The bounds of the British Settlement, first definitely marked out in 1846, inclosed an area of about 150 acres, which was expanded to 470 acres in 1848. In the following year a French Concession was delimited, the area of which, by successive acts of usurpation, has been steadily extended. An American Settlement with undefined boundaries was recognized in 1854. Ten years later the American and British Settlements were consolidated into the International Settlement, which then comprised an area of 2.75 square miles. In 1899, at the nadir of China's strength, the foreign authorities at Shanghai forced the Chinese government to grant an extension of the International Settlement area to a total of 8.35 square miles. Simultaneously, the French Concession was greatly expanded. Since 1916, especially, the Shanghai authorities have further extended the Settlement limits by the device of building extra-Settlement roads, over which they exercise police authority, out into the Chinese areas. These roads now total approximately twenty miles in length, and are the subject of much bitter Sino-foreign controversy.

Foreign administrative authority within the Settlement areas, similarly unauthorized by any treaty grant, has been established by a similar process of usurpation. The rights thus acquired are expressed in a succession of land regulations, the first of which was issued by the local Chinese magistrate (the taotai) in 1845, requiring registration of lands at the British consulate, and specifically forbidding the exercise of foreign police authority. A second series of land regulations, adopted in 1854, permitted the registration of land at any consulate, and established a municipal council with policing and taxation powers. These significant changes were afterwards accepted by the taotai. From this period dates the beginning of the all-inclusive administrative powers now wielded by the Municipal Council of the International Settlement. A third series of land regulations, strengthening the power of the Municipal Council, was adopted in 1896 without even the formality of consulting the local Chinese authorities.

Extraterritorial jurisdiction has, of course, prevailed by treaty right within the Settlement since its inception.

With the admission of increasing numbers of Chinese residents after 1853, however, it became necessary to institute a Mixed Court for cases in which the Chinese were defendants. Such a court was established within the International Settlement in 1864. From the beginning it was dominated by the foreign consuls, who sat as assessors. Foreign domination of the Mixed Court became even more pronounced after the revolution of 1911, when the Municipal Council assumed control over the court, and the foreign assessor was given power to sit both for civil and criminal cases.

The peculiar limitations upon franchise in the International Settlement have placed control of the Municipal Council in a virtual oligarchy comprised of the heads of the leading foreign business establishments in Shanghai. The land regulations designate several classes of residents—land-renters, rate-payers, foreign persons, and Chinese. Certain members of the first two grades are eligible to be members of the council; others who are not eligible for the council have the right to vote; while the great majority, foreigners and Chinese alike, are completely disfranchised. In 1925, out of a population of 840,000, there were approximately 30,000 foreigners, of whom but 2,700 were entitled to vote. Until 1926 the Chinese did not even have a representative on the council, thus presenting the anomaly of a great city, which was 96 per cent Chinese, governed by an insignificant minority of foreign traders.

As an aside, it should be here noted that the growth of Japanese influence in the Settlement during the last twenty years has been phenomenal. In 1890 there were only 386 Japanese in the International Settlement; in 1910 there were still fewer than 3,500. During the next five years the number more than doubled and by 1925 exceeded 13,000. In 1916 thirty Japanese police were added to the Settlement force. Two of the municipal councilors are now Japanese.

With the growth of Chinese national consciousness during the past fifteen years, effective resistance against foreign encroachment has begun, and the process of decline reversed. The World War caused the first notable breach in the rampart of foreign privilege in China. The concessions, extraterritorial jurisdiction, and the other special privileges of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Russia were swept away. Supported by a well-organized boycott, the case for the return of Shantung by Japan prevailed at the Washington Conference. Chinese tariff autonomy became operative in 1929. A number of the concessions and leaseholds have been regained. Some ten nations have concluded treaties of complete mutual equality with China. All but four of the Powers—the United States, France, Great Britain, and Japan—are pledged to relinquish extraterritoriality, and the Big Four are weakening.

At Shanghai comparable gains have been made. The shooting of a number of unarmed Chinese students by the Settlement police on May 30, 1925, gave birth to nationwide revolt against a situation which permitted foreigners to exercise police authority over Chinese citizens on their own soil. A bitter struggle ensued. Boycott and strike were called into play by the Chinese. In 1926, when three Chinese members were admitted to the Municipal Council, the first wedge was driven into the foreigners' ranks. Four years later the number of Chinese councilors was increased to five as against nine foreigners—at present one American, two Japanese, and six Britishers. A new Provisional Court, set up in 1926 to take the place of the old Mixed Court, proved but a nominal change. In 1930, however, a District Court entirely under Chinese control was established for all cases whose jurisdiction did not lie with the foreign consular courts. In 1930 a governmental decree required all foreign business establishments to register with the Nanking government. This order was enforced upon the foreign businessmen in Shanghai by denying them the right to sue in the Chinese District Court unless they had registered. The insistent Chinese demand for complete rendition of the Settlement was met by the pledge of a full and impartial investigation, for which Justice Feetham of South Africa was retained. His report, published in the summer of 1931, recommended only minor changes and was the occasion for a recurrence of vigorous Chinese protests.

Step by step, using lawful and pacific means, the Chinese have thus been regaining political and economic autonomy. Western governments, with a healthy respect for a Chinese boycott, have increasingly turned a deaf ear to pleas for a show of force from the foreign diehards in China. Only under the utmost provocation, as at Nanking in 1927, or against Communist "bandits," is force resorted to by the Western Powers. The Japanese "liberals," represented by Baron Shidehara, who have guided Japan's destinies during the greater part of the last decade, have chimed in with this policy. Not so the Japanese militarists, bureaucrats, and clansmen, who periodically usurp governmental control in Japan and recklessly drag the nation into military adventures. To this clique the surging forces of Chinese nationalism, the steady whittling down of foreign privilege, must be counteracted or all is lost. Of late, in Manchuria, matters have been going from bad to worse. Since 1930 Marshal Chang Hsueh-liang has definitely swung the Three Eastern Provinces within the Nationalist orbit. His railway projects, and especially the construction of the new port of Hulutao, are viewed with concern. Rate cuts by the Chinese lines, when supported by the patriotic sentiments of the Manchurian Chinese, plus a dash of coercion from Mukden, turn freight and passengers from the South Manchuria Railway. With the depression, profits decreased from 45,000,000 yen in 1929 to 21,000,000 yen in 1930; dividends were cut from 11 to 8 per cent. These things cannot continue. Something must be done. Thus, September 18, 1931.

When this clique rules in Japan, the colonialism of a past age is in vogue. Its members verily believe that Manchuria can be conquered, controlled politically and economically, and developed profitably by the Japanese business man. Once again, however, the crushing weight of the Chinese boycott has worked havoc on Japanese trade. It has led to a resort to force at Shanghai that passes all bounds of decency, even when dealing with China.

Most significant, however, is the Chinese resistance at Shanghai. For the first time in recent history, a Chinese force not overwhelmingly superior in numbers and definitely inferior in armament has thrown back a foreign onslaught. Not that China could resist the concentrated attack of the Japanese naval and military machine. But the witness borne by this success to the morale of the Chinese nation, the extent to which it is aroused, and its determination to resist at all cost admits of no contradiction. China, as a colonial nation, has ceased to exist. It can no longer be ruled by force against its will.

The Opposition in Japan

By UPTON CLOSE

BLIND nationalism in Japan today faces its supreme test. Japan and France stand at this period as two prize spectacles of nationalist society. Of all the peoples of the world the Japanese and Frenchmen are most likely to think of themselves first as Japanese or Frenchmen, rather than as conservatives or radicals, or religionists, or rich or poor. Yet in neither Japan nor France would the commanders of the people do well to strain loyalty to the point of national collapse.

The military's coup of September 18 last was more successful in first results in Japan than in Manchuria. The latter is yet far from under control. Japan, on the other hand, was completely within the power of the inner military clique within a week. But the victory was a little too facile to be permanent, and workingman, rich man, and politician who lined up behind the military were given to expect far more in advantages than there is now any hope of their gaining.

Within the last few weeks the cohorts of doubt have been gathering. A cable to New York states that election bets are three to two on the return of the Minseito—with Wakatsuki and Baron Shidehara—to a majority in the Diet in the elections set for February 20. The unfavorable odds representing the prospects of the present government's party are based not upon popularity but upon guesses regarding the extent to which the political and military chiefs will dare go in bribery and police interference with the balloting. The present regime already faces accusations of failure in its "platform" to end the Chinese boycott, get foreign loans, procure foreign markets, and stimulate internal industry. Should its appeal to the voters be defeated, it would be in an insufferable position and would be forced to resort to open dictatorship until the next Diet session in July.

Unless it dares undertake sufficient interference with the polling, the most promising strategy for the Seiyukai Government is to create a national crisis of the first magnitude. This may in part lie behind the Shanghai adventure, but the opposition is not hesitating to use that same crisis in its vigorous attack charging the Seiyukai with endangering Japan's national existence. The Seiyukai Government is bolstered by a mass of contradictions, making it vulnerable from all sides. One of the most glaring is its promise—purely for the sake of popularity—of suffrage to women. This gives it the powerful support of the Hatoyama family, once body-guard to the august person. But the Seiyukai supporters of the military clique have put themselves in a most uncomfortable position in promising suffrage to the women who have sent to Geneva the longest petition in the world against war and for disarmament—not that Japanese women at this time would take effective action, but that a wonderful opening is given to lampoonists.

Another danger to the ruling clique is its affiliation with the house of Mitsui. Without Mitsui money the Seiyukai could not have preserved its organization during the lean years. Now it finds itself sold, body and soul, to these interests, which, if ever the word were justified, may be called "predatory." The argument of the Seiyukai as to the patriotic necessity of going off the gold standard was rather vitiated when the Mitsuis availed themselves of the opportunity to clean up a hundred million dollars by "selling their country short," leaving a very considerable shortage to be made up to the government exchange bank from taxpayers' money. A mob of students attacked the Mitsui Bank in Tokio and sixty of them were cudged into submission and dragged off to jail, but public feeling was such that the Home Office saw fit to release them without trial. This news the Japanese censorship suppressed.

Aside from the liberal Minseito Party (which received overwhelming public indorsement in prefectural elections as late as September 17, the day before the coup) there are yet more interesting elements of opposition. A bitter anti-political feeling directed at professional politicians of all parties is spreading among smaller Japanese business and professional men. This numerous community the new Japanese "Nazi" organization, the Sakai Kokuseito—"Social Nation Force Society"—plans to capture. Having started as part of the so-called "China ronin"—irresponsible chauvinist hoodlums—the "Nazis" now declare the inner military clique, the five wealthy houses, the two political parties, and the radicals to be alike menaces to the nation, and offer a program of dictatorship gathered from radicalism and fascism.

The organized radical groups are potentially rather than actually important. Although Kagawa, with his very important following of Christians and pacifists, can do little in direct opposition to the military policy, he has just begun the publication in the largest Japanese newspaper of another nation-stirring serial novel called "Two Sparrows"—revealing the tragedy of the Japanese factory women. This attacks the clique in power on an even more vulnerable front, for the pressure that will eventually overthrow the military will begin with the overworked and underfed or unemployed and starved industrial workers. Inspired by Kagawa are the peasants, increasingly socialist in temper, militant against their landlords. These peasants have been promised more money for cocoons and rice in return for their traditional pro-Seiyukai ballots. The Seiyukai fulfils its promise by the facile method of going off the gold standard. But the peasant is already finding out that more yen may not mean more money.

Japan, historically, has gone through political changes faster than any other country in the world. Organized radicalism there can still be ignored but it provides a bold nucleus of leadership for the time when the peculiarly Japanese "supreme disgust" shall settle upon the increasing multitudes of doubters, whose present feelings, as nearly as they dare send them through the mail, are indicated with truly Japanese allusiveness in the words of a letter received this week:

After the second gold embargo the depression is getting better, but only superficially, I guess. In such a small country as Japan, it is very easy to make people patriotic(?) by force, and this can be said now that everyone of this country feels somewhat that our military is doing good for us. By reading the newspapers every day and every evening we all get such an illusion.

Mr. Hoover Rides the Donkey

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, February 6

PRESIDENT HOOVER finally has found a party he can control. In a burst of that fine chivalry which impels them irresistibly to espouse causes which are both lost and discredited, the Democrats in Congress have hastily enacted most of the Hoover proposals and confirmed nearly all the Hoover appointees, and now they are valiantly opposing what Hoover calls the "dole." To be perfectly consistent they should also support him for reelection. "Dole," it should be explained, is a term colloquially employed to define a federal appropriation for relieving starvation in the United States. It does not apply to federal appropriations for relieving starvation in Belgium, Germany, Serbia, Poland, Russia, and points east—that comes under the head of "American altruism." It does not apply to federal appropriations for relieving hungry banks, railroads, insurance companies, or farm cooperatives—these are "constructive measures." Nor does it cover municipal, county, State, or private relief funds—they are in the noble category of "local self-help." In its glorious fight to save starving Americans from contamination by the "dole," the Administration once more has found a leader in the person of Senator Joe Robinson, the Arkansas statesman. The fact has provoked malicious whispers. Some persons are base enough to connect Sunny Joe's accommodating disposition with the appointment of Harvey Couch to the board of the new Finance Corporation—merely because Joe's law firm happens to be counsel for Mr. Couch's power companies. I heartily dissent. Anyone who knows Joe will agree that the Finance Corporation is the sort of thing that would naturally appeal to him, and that a "dole" (except to Arkansas drought sufferers) would arouse his natural antagonism. The circumstance that he and Hoover have a mutual friend and benefactor in Couch is mere coincidence. People should not yield to morbid suspicions about great men.

THE Administration's astonishment over the Japanese invasion of China proper would be ludicrous if it contained fewer possibilities of danger. It is now apparent even to the colored messengers in the State Department that Secretary Stimson utterly failed from the outset to comprehend the scope of Japan's program or the determination behind it. Less than two months ago he was cheerfully assuring the press that the Japanese would never venture as far south as Chinchow, in southern Manchuria. Today their guns and airplanes are raining death and desolation upon the heart of Shanghai, and Henry L. Stimson enjoys the unique distinction of having run backward 700 miles in four weeks, leaping the Great Wall en route. The bloody Shanghai gesture was necessary to awaken this Administration to the fact that it was confronted with the evolution of the same definite and settled policy which prompted the original Twenty-one Demands. In the furtherance of that policy a certain amount of veering and tacking has been expedient, but the ultimate object—control of Manchuria and domination of Asia—was not for one moment abandoned. Nor was there anything in the situation to persuade a prudent man that it had been abandoned. We may understand how a member of the Hoover Cabinet would forget that it is possible for a government to adopt a fixed policy and adhere to it, but understanding does not save us from the consequences. Failure of the Administration to perceive the real scope and resolution of Japan's purpose has subjected us to a series of humiliations from which we can now escape only through the alternatives of added ignominy or an insane war. Charles Evans Hughes may have exhibited excess solicitude for the rights and opportunities of American oil companies in the Far East, but he always knew what he was doing. More important, he knew what other people were doing.

* * * * *

AT the President's urgent request, Uncle Andy Mellon has relinquished the Treasury to become American Ambassador to Great Britain. This curious transfer represents the success of Hoover's last desperate effort to pry the aging but tenacious Andrew out of a job which Ogden Mills actually has filled for nearly two years. That the Pittsburgh octogenarian possesses almost no qualifications for the new position does not seriously matter. His tenure will be brief, and his duties in London, as of late months in Washington, will be performed by a younger and better-qualified man. His reluctant decision to accept the change doubtless was hastened by the uncomfortable discovery that the House really was giving serious consideration to the impeachment charges pending against him there, as well as by Hiram Johnson's disclosure of the government's part in obtaining the fabulous Barco oil concession for the Mellon interests in Colombia. It is high time he retired from the position to which Harding and Harry Daugherty elevated him. It is my solemn judgment that he has done more to lower the standards of public service in this country than any other man who has held public office during the last fifty years, not excluding members of the Ohio Gang who came in with him. Others have used their official positions to augment their personal fortunes, but it remained for the saintly Andrew to make the practice "respectable." Probably we shall never know the exact sums returned to his corporations by his department in the form of tax refunds, or the personal savings effected through tax measures sponsored by him, or the profits accruing to his family and himself through tariffs advocated by him, or the penalties evaded through failure of the Department of Justice to prosecute the Mellon companies under the Sherman Act; but we know the total runs into many millions. Linger on for a little while, he will presently fade into the oblivion which awaits the few survivors of the Harding regime. He leaves a bad taste but few mourners.

BUT away with melancholy! If the Washington scene offers much to depress the thoughtful observer, it also has its comic aspects. Consider, for example, the sight afforded by those gentlemen who for fifteen years have been warning us against the perils of bureaucracy and the dangers of government interference in business. Today, in worn cutaways and frayed silk hats, they are camping on the steps of the Capitol beseeching the despised Congress to extricate them from the mess into which "private initiative" and "rugged individualism" got them. Washington correspondents have seen too many wizards of industry and finance made to look ridiculous by so-called hick politicians to retain any faith in the old myth of business-man superiority, but it is gratifying and diverting to watch them as they crowd to the mourners' bench. Of course, fairness compels us to acknowledge that all the peanuts do not grow in Wall and La Salle streets. No matter how much we may laugh at Pat Hurley, Bob Lucas, Secretary Lamont, and "Puddler Jim" Davis, we cannot laugh them off. In recent months Pat acquired a reputation for Irish wit and eloquence which was the more spectacular because it was so unexpected. This interesting development was rudely arrested a few days ago by the disclosure in a Washington newspaper that the War Secretary's cleverest speeches were the handiwork of Captain Abraham Ginsberg, brilliant young Russian-born member of the Army Intelligence Service. I need not dwell on the Secretary's chagrin. Promptly the offending newspaper was visited by the Captain, who, in the presence of Hurley's trusted secretary, implored the reporter to certify that he had obtained his information outside the department. Since this was wholly true, the reporter consented, but his Samaritan instincts availed nothing. In a whimsical moment he had also suggested that Captain Ginsberg's talents might have been enlisted by Bob Lucas and the Republican National Committee. This wild guess proving to be all too true, nothing could convince Pat that Ginsberg didn't tell, and a promising career in arms and literature seems doomed. You can always depend on a good Moose to enliven a grim situation, and "Puddler Jim" has not disappointed. Two years ago when he was elected Senator from Pennsylvania (to fill an unexpired term), it was on a dry platform. A month ago Bill Vare of Philadelphia tersely announced that the Republican nominee in the approaching campaign would be wetter than a bathing suit in August. This week the "Puddler" informed a waiting world that, after a careful study of the Wickersham report, he was convinced that prohibition had been a failure, and would advocate repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act, with beer and wines in the meantime. Secretary Lamont's contribution to Washington gaiety was less spectacular but more expensive. It develops that in the new seventeen-million-dollar Commerce Building he enjoys the exclusiveness of a private elevator and a secret passageway. The guard who watches the secret door receives $100 a month and the elevator operator gets $90 a month, although to reach his private elevator and his secret passage the Secretary must walk in front of two public elevators! Probably this is the Administration's contribution to the unemployment problem.

A Close-Up of George Washington

By W. E. WOODWARD

GEORGE WASHINGTON was born two hundred years ago this February 22. More books have been written about him than about any other famous American. Yet there is no record in existence of any of George Washington's conversations. No verbatim report. Curious fact, this is. Men would spend the evening in Washington's company and write to their friends that the General told some anecdotes, talked about planting fruit trees, drank Madeira wine, and cracked nuts between his big, strong fingers. But exactly what did he say? And how did he say it? What was his personal conduct toward verb and adjective? Did he ever use slang in his conversation?

My inference is that the Father of our Country was not a brilliant conversationalist. If he had been a good talker some of his anecdotes would have been preserved, in his own words. No flashes of wit fell from his tongue. Nor did his talk contain much, if any, of those plain and simple generalizations known as "homely wisdom." He was slow and deliberate in his speech. I think his diaries give a clear idea of his conversational style, for a man who writes something to be seen only by himself is likely to write as he talks. Here is an extract—a record made in his diary at Rye, New York, on the first day of a tour of New England:

The Road for the greater part, indeed the whole way, was very rough and stoney, but the Land strong, well covered with grass and a luxurious crop of Indian Corn intermixed with Pompions [pumpkins] (which were yet ungathered) in the fields. We met four droves of Beef Cattle for the New York Market, (about 30 in a drove) some of which were very fine—also a flock of Sheep for the same place. We scarcely passed a farm that did not abd. in Geese.

During his first year as President he lived in New York, in a large, comfortable house on Pearl Street. If that house were still standing it would be almost under the shadow of Brooklyn Bridge. George was called "His Excellency" and Martha was "Lady Washington." Their entertainments were on a large and elaborate scale, though they were not as exclusive as Martha thought they ought to be. Some concession had to be made to the common herd, as everybody had a vote, and the day of the politician was in its rosy dawn. Martha wrote that the walls of her drawing-room were marred "by the dirty fingers of the democrats."

William Sullivan, one of the best observers of the time, with an eye for character and a sense of picture, used to attend the Presidential receptions. He says His Excellency was usually surrounded by young and beautiful women. That is not surprising; for some reason elderly distinguished men possess an extraordinary fascination for young girls.

One may imagine the scene: the large room, brilliantly lighted by hundreds of candles set in silver brackets on the wall; the men in knee breeches of velvet of the color of puce, wearing coats of green and lavender silk with lace at the cuffs; their hair concealed under powdered wigs. The dowagers, austere and stiff with dignity, sit on sofas covered with damask or figured French cloth. Their billowing skirts flow about them. Their headdresses are composed of their own hair, raised in a towering structure by a framework of wire. They look like Britannia ruling the waves, or a device on a coin, or some such symbol of feminine force.

At the end of the room, before the crackling fire, stands the towering Washington. The young women crowd around him, their fans fluttering in the perfumed air. Outside the throng men with axes to grind look on wistfully, thinking of schemes to break through the wall of girlish chatter.

Sullivan says that on these occasions, though Washington was surrounded by young and admiring beauties, his countenance "never softened, nor changed its habitual gravity."

Of course Washington was dull in manner. In saying this I am not attempting to belittle him. Far from it; quite the contrary. Cleverness is the opposite of greatness. All great men are dull, and most of them are melancholy; and all really great books are heavy and dull. Sprightliness runs so easily into a sacrifice of essential truth. The memory of the wisecracker is never embalmed in the majestic whatever-you-call-it of human endeavor. Dull men are so puzzling. Perhaps that is why we call them great.

I lived with George Washington for two years while I was writing his biography—"George Washington, the Image and the Man." I mean that I lived with his spirit. Daily; every day; all day. For two years I hardly thought of anything but G. W. I found out all sorts of interesting things. About Washington's voice, for instance. He had a hollow voice, somewhat muffled. The kind of voice that never carries far. Whenever he made a speech—and he was a poor orator, I may say—he had to exert himself to be heard.

Although he had great physical strength, there was a strain of weakness—congenital, I fancy—in his constitution. He was always getting sick; bowel complaint, bad colds, liver trouble, and so on. He dosed himself with the strong, gripping remedies of the day.

Another fact is that the commonly accepted portrait of Washington—the Gilbert Stuart Athenaeum painting—is not his best picture. What I am saying here will be considered the rankest heresy; nevertheless it is the truth, like a good many other heresies.

His face was leaner and longer than it appears in the Athenaeum portrait. He had a finer, more sensitive countenance. In 1785 the French sculptor Houdon made a life mask of G. W. Incidentally the making of this mask frightened Martha almost out of her wits. She did not know the mask was to be made, it seems, and she walked into a room and found her husband lying flat on his back, his face covered with plaster, and Houdon bending over him. Great alarm—and considerable explanation required.

This life mask shows Washington's features perfectly, of course. It is a mechanical reproduction. The life mask lacks the beefy look of the Stuart picture.

The more I found out about Washington the better I liked him. I had to unlearn, at first, all the silly fables that had been taught me at school and which have existed a century or more in our folk-lore. But as these childish myths were stripped off, I saw that a great personality was beneath them. I began to admire him ardently. He had honor, truth, honesty, and courage. What great qualities these are—and how sadly lacking in a world of sham and hypocrisy!

He was not a great general or a great statesman, but he was a great man. His greatness flowed from character, from personality. When I say that he was not a first-class general I mean that he did things which were strategically unsound. He never won a major engagement. But he held the army together by his persistency and his will; he won the war through his defeats. The British found out that you cannot keep on beating a man forever unless you kill him. If you can't kill him, after awhile you have to surrender to him. The British, sick and tired, finally surrendered to Washington.

It is a curious fact that there is nothing whatever in our intellectual and political traditions that could be called Washingtonianism. Jefferson and Hamilton both left to posterity coherent theories of government. Washington didn't. He seems never to have evolved, even in his own mind, an articulated set of principles. The essence of his energy was practical. He set himself to doing whatever lay before his hands.

Anything that tells the truth about the Father of our Country is denounced, even if the truth is favorable. Isn't that one of the strangest things you ever heard of? My book was cursed up hill and down dale, which helped its sales, but made me rather sad. The denunciation was accentuated by an incident in my literary life which may interest you.

Everyone has moments of fatal indiscretion, times when the jackass that lives in all men and women steps out and brays. Unfortunately these moments are usually beyond recall and survive forever. Before the jackass is batted over the head, the deed is done, the check is mailed, the marriage proposal has been made, the boss has been insulted, the asinine anecdote has started on its travels. It is a law of life. This principle, by the way, has been expanded by me into a psychoanalytic theory. It appears in all the up-to-date books on psychoanalysis as the Woodward Theory of the Inner Jackass, and has been accepted by Dr. Freud as a basis for fresh meditation.

While I was writing my first book the inner jackass came out for a moment and brayed. The book was called "Bunk." I wanted to devise a word which would mean "taking the bunk out of human affairs"—and I made up the word "debunk." It is probably the ugliest word in the language.

Of course, I became known immediately as the great debunker. I cannot open my mouth without people expecting me to debunk something or somebody. As soon as my life of Washington was published I saw headlines in the newspapers which said, "Woodward Debunks Washington."

The Daughters of the American Revolution in some States advised people not to read the book, and that helped the sales. Here and there posts of the American Legion denounced me and all my works, and declared that I ought to be sent back where I came from. That helped sales, too.

I have given all this not only to show the peril of the literary life, but also to indicate how difficult it is to get the American people to accept a truthful valuation of George Washington, even if the truth is favorable to him.

Dole or Insurance?

By WILLIAM M. LEISERSON

THERE are only two methods of dealing with unemployment—by insurance or by doles. The insurance method assumes that the cost of supporting the unemployed is properly a charge against industry, like the maintenance of unemployed capital. It forces management to treat the labor investment as a fixed charge in the same way that bond interest is handled. The dole method relieves industry of this labor-maintenance cost and throws the burden on the community—on private charities or on public relief funds, or on both.

Of course, neither insurance nor the dole offers any permanent solution for unemployment. But however practical and desirable the plans for stabilizing employment may be, can they guarantee steady jobs for all willing workers at all times? Those who think that unemployment may be handled by abolishing it may well be reminded that fireproof buildings have not abolished fires. Safety work has not solved the problem of accidents. Preventive medicine, sanitation, and health work have not eliminated sickness and disease. What reason is there to believe that the measures designed to eliminate unemployment will be any more effective than these other preventive measures have been?

Those who are advocating permanent solutions for unemployment are like the "new-era" economists who a few years ago thought that depressions had forever been abolished. Then it was mechanization of industry, mass production, high wages, and high prices that would make prosperity permanent. Now it is scientific management, regularization of employment, public work for the unemployed, economic planning boards, and reductions in hours of labor that will forever abolish unemployment and the consequent distress. But this second new era is likely to prove as chimerical as the first. Modern industry, even under such controlled conditions as exist in Russia, cannot be carried on without fluctuations in employment, sometimes small, at other times large; and for handling this inevitable unemployment there are only the two methods, insurance or doles.

The method that we now use is the dole method. Private charity doles are our first resource; but in a depression charity funds are soon exhausted, and taxpayers are then asked to provide for the unemployed by public doles from local-government treasuries. In the present depression it is becoming increasingly evident that federal doles will also be necessary. In the effort to avoid this the President has appointed an Emergency Relief Committee to stimulate neighborly charity and the voting of local public-relief funds. But in spite of a frenzied national organization and advertising campaign, representatives of community-chest organizations throughout the country testified in Washington the other day that local and State funds will be insufficient, and that the federal government will have to contribute its doles for the maintenance of the unemployed.

But why should either charities or the taxpayers bear the cost of supporting industry's employees? If industry must have its employees idle for weeks and months at a time, why does it not provide means of support for them during the enforced periods of idleness? The reason is that we have so pauperized American employers that they now look upon contributions from the public for the maintenance of their labor forces as a matter of right. By laying off workers they automatically draw on public and private charity funds. In times like the present large sums are diverted from the care of the crippled, the sick, the aged, and the mentally defective to maintain the able-bodied workers until their employers need them again. But while an industry may keep itself solvent and show a profit by this method of removing from its books one of its essential costs, it is from the point of view of the community an unprofitable industry. It is receiving a subsidy from the public. Whether the money is contributed by private charities or by the taxpayers, the result is the same—the payment of a dole not only to the unemployed workers but also to their employers.

When workers are unemployed, capital is also unemployed; but the interest and capital maintenance charges are paid by business whether the capital is working or not. The fixed charges for idle labor also have to be paid. But the public has been footing this bill. When men decide to become printers rather than to enter other trades, they invest their labor in the printing industry just as the owners invest their money in it. And they cannot change their trade so easily as bond- and stockholders can sell out their interests. Yet the industry assumes no responsibility for the labor investment. Is it not about time that we served notice on American industry and its managers that we do not propose in future depressions to subsidize them by supporting their employees from government and charity funds? Can we not make it the duty of all employers of labor to provide against the disasters that recurring depressions bring to their working forces in the same way that they are compelled to provide for their interest and other capital charges?

Unemployment insurance is the most economical method by which this can be done. With the cost spread over a wide variety of industries the charge against individual enterprises is small, and the addition to production expenses is negligible. Industry is thus compelled to be self-supporting, to bear all its costs, and to quit depending on doles for the support of its workers. The insurance benefits maintain the health, efficiency, and self-respect of the necessarily unemployed workers, and are the only alternative to the degrading dole.

American business, seeing the trend toward insurance, has launched a nation-wide campaign to convince the country and its legislatures that compulsory action is not necessary. Employers will themselves voluntarily establish reserve funds to protect their employees, we are told. The United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, and the National Industrial Conference Board have all indorsed the idea that industry must provide reserves to assure incomes for employees during periods of idleness. Even the Senate committee headed by Senator Hebert, which was packed with a majority to oppose the Wagner national unemployment-insurance bill, has come out for insurance conducted by private industries. The need, the justice, the desirability of insurance are no longer denied. Those who for years denounced it as the "dole" have changed their position. They agree in principle, as the diplomats say, and they offer a substitute—voluntary private insurance.

What employers would set up their own reserve funds if all were not compelled by law to insure? Obviously the more foresighted and efficient, those who had taken steps to regularize employment. The rest, those who cause the most unemployment, would say that it is not practical in their business. And when the uninsured laid off workers, who would support them? The taxpayers and the community chests of course. The most backward industries and employers would thus be subsidized, while the more progressive and responsible would be burdened with expenses both for regularizing employment and for paying unemployment benefits. In the face of this obvious result of voluntary private insurance, it is strange to hear from its advocates the complaint that compulsory state insurance would penalize the efficient employers and use their premiums to help pay for the unemployment caused by the inefficient.

Underlying the plea for voluntary action by employers is the idea that if business were properly managed each enterprise could fully take care of its own unemployment. Private reserve funds, it is claimed, would provide the incentive for each employer to regularize his employment to the utmost. But when records of firms which have stabilized work are examined, it is found that the effect of their regularization is the same as if labor-saving machinery had been introduced. More work is done with a smaller force of steady employees and the rest are thrown on the community.

Private insurance funds must necessarily neglect the mass of unemployed labor released not only by regularization programs, but by technical and managerial improvements of various kinds and by declining industries. It is for these released workers, however, that insurance is most needed. Adequate protection, therefore, must be based on the general insurance principle that all who are subject to risk shall contribute to a common fund, and those who suffer losses shall draw from this fund. Voluntary insurance selects the good risks for protection and leaves the worst risks uncared for. There is no more reason for an industry that has little unemployment to object to paying insurance premiums than there is for a person to object to paying for his fire insurance because he has never suffered loss from fire.

There are serious objections also to the administration of private insurance funds. A corporation in Wisconsin has just announced a plan which requires employees to contribute 5 per cent of their pay until reserves equal to six months' pay have been accumulated, when the contributions are to decline to 2 per cent. Benefits are payable only in times of general business depression, and then, after a waiting period of three months, 40 per cent of average weekly earnings will be paid. Employees may not withdraw their contributions when they quit the company. What is to prevent the spread of such fantastic schemes? Other plans provide for contributions from the employer only, but usually with reservations that workers acquire no legal rights to the funds, and that the plans may be changed or discontinued at the option of the employer. The originator of one of these plans stated he did not want the employees to contribute because this would require that they be given some control over the funds. When a worker is discharged for cause, he is always disqualified for unemployment benefits. What is just cause for discharge, and how are employees to be protected against dismissal to avoid payment of benefits?

Those who are lucky enough to work for firms that have insurance plans will be unequally protected. Some employers will be liberal, others will be able to afford only meager and inadequate benefits. The amounts paid to the unemployed workers will be determined not by their needs but by what the employer considers the business is able to pay. The basic weakness of voluntary insurance is that it sets up no authority that is in any way responsible for the community's or the country's problem of unemployment. Its primary concern is not the needs of unemployed workers but the interests of business enterprises. If these interests are considered compatible with the payment of unemployment benefits, such benefits will be paid; otherwise not. Some slight reduction in the number of those whom industry throws on the community to support may be expected. But the essential problem of getting rid of public subsidies to industries to enable them to meet the cost of their unemployed labor cannot be solved by voluntary insurance; nor can an effective substitute for the dole be found in it.

It is because business and industry have no means of providing jobs or maintenance for all willing workers that compulsory action by the government is necessary. It is absurd to think, however, that public officials would know how to provide employment when business men do not know how to do it. Therefore government action must take the form of compulsory insurance. Such government compulsion to protect workers and their families has always been an essential characteristic of real Americanism. The notion that able-bodied and willing workers shall be forced to beg for charity while the government keeps its hands off is a Tory myth, not an American principle. Seventy years ago the United States government adopted the Homestead Act, giving to everyone who wanted to work the land a free farm of 160 acres. The act was denounced as an attack on prosperity and as an agrarian (communistic) scheme for dividing wealth, but it was passed.

About a hundred years ago America decided to provide education for all its children. When working people found that they were denied opportunities because they lacked training and education, they demanded tax-supported schools. Today compulsory taxation of the rich to educate the children of the poor is looked upon as an essential principle on which the very foundations of American institutions rest. But when the public-school system was about to be introduced, the Philadelphia National Gazette wrote (August 19, 1830):

The scheme of universal equal education, at the expense of the state, is virtually "agrarianism." It would be compulsory application of the means of the richer, for the direct use of the poorer classes; and so for an arbitrary division of property among them. . . . One of the chief excitements to industry, among those classes, is the hope of earning means of educating their children respectably or liberally; that incentive would be removed, and the scheme of state and equal education be thus a premium for comparative idleness.

The Homestead Act and our public-school system show what the truly American tradition requires when the opportunity to work and live is at stake. They are our precedents for compulsory unemployment insurance.

In the Driftway

FROM time to time the Drifter hears comment on the younger generation. A novelist says the boys and girls of today are lazy, untutored, illiterate; a minister says they are immoral, irreligious, disrespectful; a mother says they are a nuisance; and a father appears against his son to press a charge of grand larceny that will send him to prison for life if he is convicted. It is hardly necessary to indicate what reflections these criticisms cast on the elders of the young persons in question, who presumably are responsible for their education and moral training. The Drifter does not need to do so, for the young persons of his acquaintance do not in any way merit the indictment. A friend of the Drifter's the other night urged that he might be permitted to read aloud from a manuscript that had been sent him. Somewhat reluctantly the Drifter consented. The article was a criticism of seventeenth-century English poetry; it was considered, fresh, admirably phrased, expert in its critical judgments, and displayed a healthy erudition. "Very nice," said he, in the manner of an editor who can take things calmly even if they are very nice. "Who wrote it?" "One of my freshmen," said the friend, who was a professor of English. "I'll read you another." This time the Drifter did not protest. The essays had been submitted by a class of twenty-odd; every one was better written than the average article submitted for magazine publication. Every one showed not only learning and skill, but devotion to a task, industry, and patience.

* * * * *

THE Drifter knows rather better another lad now ■ senior at a large university. He spends as many week-ends as he is allowed in New York City; he likes to dance, he is by no means inexpert in courting agreeable young ladies. But his real passion is economics, and he gives his father, a well-known newspaperman, many uncomfortable half-hours by the searching and detailed questions he asks on recondite political subjects. His brother is younger. He favors the radio, and since the age of twelve has been able to assemble with surprising skill radio apparatus of the more complicated sorts. It is possible to multiply instances indefinitely of boys and girls who apply themselves with industry and eagerness to tasks that their elders would sigh at or shrink from. No laziness here, no irresponsibility. Honest work, on the contrary, and more often than not work that is not required either by parents or professor. Nor are examples of another sort lacking. A boy of fifteen spends his Saturdays and one or two evenings at work to earn money for camp; his father has not worked for two years, mostly from choice. The boy's grandfather keeps him and could send him to camp also if necessary. The grandson prefers to work.

* * * * *

ALL that the Drifter really seeks to prove by these scattered instances is that it is not safe to generalize. It is not safe to talk about the "younger generation" without qualifying by saying: "I mean that lazy, good-for-nothing boy across the street." The Drifter will not generalize either. All he will admit is that he knows on the whole many more lazy, reprehensible adults than lazy, reprehensible adolescents. In his experience the younger generation is sober, hard-working, knows what it wants. These young persons sometimes lack humor. But so far that has not been named in the indictment.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Birth Control—Pro and Con

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For some years past I have been a subscriber to your paper. The issue dated January 27 reached me yesterday. I find upon reading it that the front page and fifteen of its forty pages of reading matter are devoted to the advocacy of birth control, justly characterized by President Roosevelt in his day as race suicide.

I am the happy and contented father of nine living children and the grandfather of twenty-one grandchildren, and there is not ■ black sheep or a yellow streak among them. My dear departed wife (recently deceased) was my devoted helpmeet for nearly half a century and was the proud and loving mother of these nine children.

Your over-zealous hysterical advocacy of this harlot-like practice shocks me, and makes your weekly paper unwelcome in my home. If you and your fellow-believers practice what you preach in the years to come, they and your subscribers will soon be few in number. Please cancel my subscription.

Chicago, January 25

E. F. DUNNE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The only valid argument in favor of birth control is ill-health of the parents or their economic disability. If either party is sick, then self-control is the humane and, indeed, the necessary attitude of the other party, and self-control is neither impossible nor precarious; in fact, it is the efficient prophylactic for our modern neuroses.

If healthy married people desire children as normal people do, and are hindered from exercising normally this natural right by economic hazards, why, in God's name and in the name of the American people, is there no concerted effort made to save this natural right by abolishing these economic ills? Let those who have wealth and no children subsidize those who have children and no wealth. It is the living children of the poor that ring a wall of flesh about the country's wealth in time of war. The rich give patriotic sentiments while the poor give their sons.

The enthusiasm of birth-controllors is almost as hysterical as a revival and as economically careless as ■ crusade.

New York, January 27

JOHN MONAGHAN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to file a protest against your omission of Dr. William J. Robinson from among the contributors to the birth-control number of The Nation. For over ■ quarter of a century, when no one had ever heard of Margaret Sanger, when the subject of birth control was taboo to Drs. Pusey, Lake, and Knopf, Dr. Robinson agitated for birth control among physicians in his Critic and Guide, books, lectures, and so on. It was Dr. Robinson who converted the late Dr. Abraham Jacoby, former president of the American Medical Association, to the movement.

Detroit, January 30

M. E. KOHN, M.D.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me to express to you my admiration of your courage and farsightedness in devoting a considerable part of The Nation of January 27 to the discussion of birth control.

At the Philadelphia County Medical Society, with a membership of nearly 2,200, we arranged a meeting on birth control about a month ago, against considerable opposition on the part of the Catholic element in this community. An attempt was made to break up the meeting, but was unsuccessful.

I am a subscriber to The Nation, and I believe it is one of the most courageous sheets in the country.

Philadelphia, January 25 JAY F. SCHAMBERG, M.D.

Mr. Hoover's Strange Career

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A diplomatic incident has occurred at Brussels as a consequence of the publication of extracts from John Hamill's volume, "The Strange Career of Mr. Hoover." Mr. Gibson, the American Minister, who claims to be an intimate friend of Hoover, has lodged a protest with the Belgian Foreign Minister against such publications, and M. Hymans, the Foreign Minister, has expressed his regrets.

Such incidents will occur in every part of the world, as the volume has a wide circulation. The Chicago Tribune of January 4 regrets that the circulation of the volume was stopped, and that the matter was not threshed out in court; but the paper admits that certain facts are undoubtedly true! I have myself found notes from the Congressional Record of March 3, 1919, where a speaker proved with documentary evidence that rotten wheat and flour were shipped for the Belgian Relief.

Paris, January 16

J. GERSONG

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Though a regular reader of The Nation for more than forty years, I have bothered your editorial staff but rarely. Hence I am not going to apologize for doing so now. While in Milwaukee over the week-end, I chanced upon a copy of "The Strange Career of Mr. Hoover," by John Hamill. I have not finished reading the book as I write, but if the author is guilty of untruths, it would be the privilege, nay the duty, of President Hoover to bring him into court.

No doubt someone on the editorial staff of The Nation is competent to discuss this problem. Am I asking too much that The Nation throw light on the situation created by the appearance of this book, which seems to have called for a new printing almost monthly since it first made its appearance?

Madison, Wis., January 27

EDWARD KREMERS

Campaign Strategy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Hoover has not the slightest intention to answer domestic criticism. His campaign is not to be against any opposition party or candidate. All that is to be austere ignored. He will not take the defensive on his record, nor will his halberdiers do so for him.

What is to be is this: He will run against a more or less mythical menace from abroad. As matters now stand, it is my judgment that the Reds will not be regarded as adequate. I think privately that Stalin is fed up on nursing the infantile leaderships of other units of the Third International. He is well informed of the community of imperialist interests and will not be drawn into a world ambush by the Japanese maneuver. And so his wiliness is going to deprive him of the honor of being opposed for the presidency of civilization.

What, then, is to be chosen as a foe worthy of the G. O. P. steel? Already the newspapers are building up our national fears of a world arrayed against America, and before the campaign is far advanced it will be stated that it would be unpatriotic to oppose the President now. It will be "Stand by America" or some resonant equivalent of that.

You will recall that two years before Ramsay MacDonald's defection I hinted to you not to expect anything from him. Now I warn you that nothing, much less than nothing, can be expected of the Socialist Party, even if in the thick despair it should gain headway. It is just another capitalist party. But liberals, after all, must be good for something. I warn them that they are perilously underestimating Hoover in those qualities by which he has corkscrewed himself to wealth and eminence. The rich and powerful and the profligate in America have not grown sick of him as the silences might seem to indicate. The word has simply gone out that his attacking critics are to be allowed to wear themselves down.

Washington, D. C., January 18

BRUCE ROGERS

"Man Must Work"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I add my testimony to that of the Drifter in your issue of January 6? The Family Welfare Association of Minneapolis has inaugurated a very small program of work relief, i. e., payment of wages for work done rather than financial assistance. Part of this work consists in wood cutting in woods fifteen miles from the city, transportation for thirty miles daily being by open truck (I trust your readers know what that means in a Minnesota winter).

The plan involved having a certain number of men report each day to the truck to be transported to the job. But the number reporting was invariably greater than the number needed and the paymaster instantly jumped to the conclusion that the extra men would expect to be paid wages. She was prepared to make a careful statement of the association's policy of limiting work, and wages, to just enough to cover the minimum necessities of the family, when the ground was cut from beneath her feet by the men explaining with one accord that they knew they would not be paid but were thankful to do anything to keep busy. Numerous other experiences of this association bear out the Drifter's conclusion that "man must work."

Minneapolis, January 7

PEARL SALSBERY

What Shall We Do?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: During these days of crises it seems to me that The Nation, as a leader in liberal thinking, could do its readers a tremendous service by pointing out to them in a series of articles what the individual may do. The Communists say that the individual does not matter, but there are many who feel that he does, even in a revolutionary world. How are we to conduct our lives, plan our careers, direct our energies? Should we, for example, try to protect our investments by supporting the capitalists until their stupidities ruin us, or should we try to hasten the process by aiding, in small ways, the revolution? What we do probably does not matter, but we must keep up the illusion that it does.

Glen Ridge, N. J., January 4

HORACE COON

Finance

England Gropes for Markets

GREAT BRITAIN is reported to be considering tariff reciprocity with a number of European nations, for reasons which should interest the United States. When the pound sterling toppled from its gold base last September, Englishmen derived some consolation from the thought that the depreciation of British exchange in gold-standard countries would stimulate exports. With the pound 25 per cent below par, the cost of British goods to foreign buyers would in effect be reduced by an equal amount, so long as internal prices could be held at their old level.

These calculations, however, were rudely shaken when a number of Britain's best customers promptly followed her off the gold basis. New York exchange rates (gold-standard rates) in London, Oslo, Copenhagen, and Stockholm all now stand about 29 per cent below par; that is to say, they are at parity with one another. These are the European exchanges which are most closely tied with sterling through banking connections, and the fact that all are equally depreciated removes the bargain-basement attraction which British goods would have had if these Scandinavian currencies had remained above sterling in value. English exports to gold-standard countries are restricted by tariffs; to countries whose currency is in worse state than sterling, by lack of purchasing power and an actual premium exacted on British imports. For a depreciated exchange to produce a worth-while export stimulus, we evidently must have a world in which a substantial number of countries remain on the gold standard and refrain from imposing tariff barriers.

Confronted by these adverse conditions, it is not surprising that English merchants and bankers should be surrendering their illusions about the advantages of a discount on the pound and should now be returning to the idea of parity—a parity of misfortune between London and the Scandinavian centers. Here exchange parity, however, is not enough to insure large and stable trade; hence it is proposed to reinforce the existing monetary basis by reciprocity agreements.

Such agreements are the antithesis of the most-favored-nation principle, which is largely inoperative as a trade stimulus under existing tariff-barrier conditions, and which is not in our favor, in any case. A writer in the Revue Economique Internationale cites the Franco-German agreement of 1871, under which each nation agreed in perpetuity to extend as good terms to the other as were extended to England, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Austria, and Russia. Frenchmen of that day did not foresee Germany's rise to industrial supremacy, and found themselves unable to place low tariffs on the "ribbons of Basel, the silks of Zurich, the lingerie of Saint-Gall, and all the products of the Swiss chemical and electrical industries" without throwing the door open to the products of Crefeld, Elberfeld, Leipzig, Mannheim, and Nuremberg. Since there was no intention of doing the latter, a protectionist policy was inevitable.

It is, after all, a small territory which England now thinks of tying together with reciprocity agreements. It leaves the dominions out of account and will apparently call for endless detailed agreements. The British problem is to find an adequate market for British goods, and neither the Scandinavian countries nor the dominions provide it. Any reciprocity program abroad must add to the difficulties of finding a market for America's surplus goods. In the light of British experience, abandonment of the gold standard would be unlikely to help us.

S. PALMER HARMAN

... You Can't Know Soviet Russia from Books

Like all living things Soviet Russia must be observed to be understood.

Traveling with the Open Road, you see at first hand the workings of Soviet methods and institutions and you find out how they affect human lives.

With five years of experience in arranging Soviet travel and established American representation in Russia, the Open Road is equipped to serve the best interests of Americans traveling independently or as members of specially constituted Open Road groups.

For 1932 the Open Road offers standard services at reduced rates. In writing for itineraries and rates, indicate what phase of Russian life interests you most and whether you prefer to travel with a group or independently.

The OPEN ROAD

Salmon Tower, 11 West 42nd Street, New York City

Cooperating in U. S. S. R. with INTOURIST

LABOR NEWS "In the Raw"

During this winter of discontent when the suffering of the workers is to be the greatest in American history, you will want to get your facts straight from original sources without "the editorial slant."

Federated Press, labor's only daily news service, offers you either a daily news service from bureaus in Washington and New York plus less frequent service from Pittsburgh and Chicago, at $5 a month; or

A weekly news service including usually the most important release weekly from each of FP's four bureaus, at $10 a year. Both payable in advance.

Federated Press is non-partisan, has 100 correspondents watching the hot spots, gets the news too hot to print—and no editor can keep it from you if you take this service. We suggest that clubs, groups, classes and libraries take the service. Republication is expressly forbidden.

FEDERATED PRESS

112 E. 19th STREET
NEW YORK CITY

Three Biographies of Enduring Value

Matthew Josephson's

JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU

F. M. Kircheisen's

NAPOLEON

H. W. Nevins's

GOETHE: MAN AND POET

Josephson's Rousseau is acclaimed on publication as "one of the most remarkable biographies of the last ten years."—N. Y. Herald Tribune. It is a full, glowing, masterfully controlled story of a man who changed a world, whose life has been a hotbed of controversy. All critics so far seem to agree with Herbert Gorman that "it is the best biography of Rousseau in existence." $5.00 . . . Kircheisen's book on Napoleon, being a condensation of his nine-volume work, which is regarded everywhere as the authority, assumes first rank for modern readers. It combines a simple, dramatic narrative style with a wealth of authoritative facts. "The best biography of Napoleon in the English language."—Liverpool Post. $5.00 . . . Goethe's centenary, falling this year, calls to mind Carlyle's comment on Goethe's works. "To estimate a this, the time is not come; a century hence will be a fitter time. Goethe; Man and Poet attempts to fulfill this task. Nevins is a great English authority on the poet, and his work has already been commented upon by Hugh Walpole in the N. Y. Herald-Tribune London Letter, as "a magnificent book, generous, wise, beautifully written—a real book about a Hero."—$2.75.

TOWARDS A BETTER LIFE

Kenneth Burke

With this first novel by the author of Counter-Statement, "we are thrown into contact with one of the few original artists of our generation. He is looking for a better life. I believe that his search will continue to be a significant contribution to American literature."—N. Y. Herald-Tribune. A remarkable and original contribution which serious readers of fiction will not wish to miss. $2.50

THE PURITAN

Liam O'Flaherty

The author of Mr. Gilhooley is at his realistic best in this murder mystery of a religious maniac who loves and kills a woman of the streets. $2.00

THE HOGARTH LETTERS

The letter form, having the advantage of putting both writer and reader immediately at ease, has been revived for this series of intimate dissertations on a variety of subjects. E. M. Forster, Rosamond Lehmann, and Viscount Cecil of Chelwood are the respective authors of these first three letters.

Three pamphlets in slip case, $1.00

ZEPPELINS OVER ENGLAND

Capt. Treusch von Buttlar-Brandenfels

A first-hand account by the German officer who participated in most of the Zeppelin raids on England during the war. "It rings true as a human document because of its high spirits, humor, and gallantry."—London Times. $2.50

ESSAYS IN PERSUASION

John Maynard Keynes

Because he is easily the most interesting of economists—with his wit, wisdom, and high average as a true economic prophet—Mr. Keynes's view of the economic present and future in his timely new book becomes highly exciting and important reading. $2.50

ECONOMIC STABILITY IN AN UNBALANCED WORLD

Alvin H. Hansen

Furnishing a background of reliable knowledge on the present world-wide depression, Hansen's fundamental discussion of the causes of economic stability is a valuable, readable book that cuts through a maze of contemporary theorizing. $3.00

THE EMERGENCE OF MAN

Gerald Heard

The unusual method of this stirring book—applying psychology to man's history—results in: entering into the mind of half-man, tracing his emergence with the excitement of actual understanding, sensing the spiritual, not the material, steps of his progress. "It all means the most stimulating popularization of man's history written in our generation."—Horace Gregory, N. Y. Post. $2.75

Midwinter Book Section

Lytton Strachey

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

It would be difficult to find a literary career more neatly rounded and successful than that which has just been closed by the death of Lytton Strachey. At the age of thirty-eight Mr. Strachey was practically unknown; at fifty-two, when he died, he was firmly ensconced in the particular niche which he himself had chosen and to which he had won an undisputed right by the quiet but persistent cultivation of his own peculiar gifts. His output was not great, and his fame will rest upon not more than four books, but there were few by-products or false starts, and such quiet efficiency argues the presence of a clear-sighted confidence perhaps even rarer in writers than it is in other men.

Strachey enjoyed, to be sure, certain initial advantages. Member as he was of a literary family, the way was to some extent smooth before him, and he does not appear to have been very seriously oppressed by financial needs. But with his second book, "Eminent Victorians," he sprang forth fully formed, and he wrote exactly as though he had already achieved the position which that book was to win for him. Nor does there seem to be any good reason for doubting that he felt as confidently as he spoke. Whatever formative process he may have gone through was already over. He knew exactly what he wanted to do, and he knew that he knew just how it could be done. Only on such an assumption can one account for a passage like the following from his preface—a passage in which a practically unknown young man calmly annihilates one whole branch of contemporary literature and proposes with equal calmness that his work be taken as a salutary example of how biography should be written:

The art of biography seems to have fallen on evil times in England. . . . With us, the most delicate and humane of all the branches of the art of writing has been relegated to the journeymen of letters; we do not reflect that it is perhaps as difficult to write a good life as to live one. Those two fat volumes with which it is our custom to commemorate the dead—who does not know them, with their ill-digested masses of material, their slipshod style, their tone of tedious panegyric, their lamentable lack of selection, of detachment, of design? They are as familiar as the cortège of the undertaker, and wear the same air of slow, funereal barbarism. . . . The studies in this book are indebted, in more ways than one, to such works—works which certainly deserve the name of Standard Biographies. For they have provided me not only with much indispensable information, but with something even more precious—an example. How many lessons are to be learned from them! But it is hardly necessary to particularize. To preserve, for instance, a becoming brevity—a brevity which excludes everything that is redundant and nothing that is significant—that, surely, is the first duty of the biographer. The second, no less surely, is to maintain his own freedom of spirit. It is not his business to be complimentary; it is his business to lay bare the facts of the case, as he understands them. That is what I have aimed at in this book—to lay bare the facts of some cases, as I understand them, dispassionately, impartially, and without ulterior intention. To quote the words of a master—"Je n'impose rien; je ne propose rien; j'expose."

This is not the sufficiently common bumptiousness of a swaggering incompetence; it is the rare but justified confidence of a man who knows that he has done what he set out to do. And if the concluding sentences are sufficiently wide of the mark to make one suspect an actual disingenuousness; if, in other words, it is clear enough that Strachey was not impartial or dispassionate and that he certainly did have an "ulterior intention," yet the whole passage could hardly be better as the rhetorical prologue to what was essentially a work of art.

"Eminent Victorians" was a brilliant book, and none of those which succeeded it—neither "Queen Victoria," "Elizabeth and Essex," nor "Portraits in Miniature"—did much more than profitably reemploy the talents which it revealed. But unlike most brilliant books it seems almost as brilliant fourteen years after publication as it did when it appeared, and to turn its pages again is to realize that the sensation which it caused is perfectly understandable today. Even though read many times before, these essays remain arresting, vivid, and irresistibly interesting. Nor does their wit—the only quality which can be illustrated by a phrase—seem any less flashing than it did. There is Dr. Arnold, writing a Roman history "based partly upon the researches of Niebuhr, and partly upon an aversion to Gibbon," or rising in the pulpit on a Sunday morning to explain to his pupils "the general principles both of his own conduct and that of the Almighty." There is also Lord Acton, "a historian to whom learning and judgment had not been granted in equal proportions, and who, after years of incredible and, indeed, almost mythical research, had come to the conclusion that the Pope could err." And though the allusions are learned, or at least, and like everything that Strachey wrote, rather bookish, the phrases are witty because they compress into a few words such a voluminous comment that they make one wonder if any other English writer since Gibbon was so expert at the business of "sapping a solemn creed with solemn sneer." At every word a reputation dies.

Strachey was, of course, responsible for the development of the "new biography." Not only did he make the public (and the booksellers!) aware of the fact that biography might compete on its own formal merits with other branches of literature, but he actually set the details of a fashion by making, for example, the immediate past the most popular subject, and an ironic condescension the most popular tone. Yet it is not always sufficiently realized how free he was from the faults so common in many of his imitators—how the thoroughness of his information contrasts with their often superficial knowledge, and how the quiet deadliness of his rapier differs from the noisy ineffectiveness of their bludgeon. Nor should any criticism of his work fail to note how sure his judgment was in distinguishing between the art of the biographical essay and those other arts from which many imitators have borrowed all too freely. He made biography interesting and he gave it form, but he never lost sight of the fact that a distinction must be made between the use or interpretation of records and mere invention. Instead of imagining a telling incident after the fashion of the novelizing biographers, he winnowed the haystack of sources for the significant fact or the revealing remark, and he made such facts or remarks serve his purpose far better than any invention could have served it. Turn, for example, to the concluding sentences of his essay on Manning:

The Cardinal's memory [he writes] is a dim thing today. And he who descends into the crypt of that cathedral which Manning never lived to see, will observe, in the quiet niche with the sepulchral monument, that the dust lies thick on the strange, the incongruous, the almost impossible object which, with its elaborations of dependent tassels, hangs down from the dim vault like some forlorn and forgotten trophy—the Hat.

This is rhetoric if you like; but there could hardly be a more telling rhetorical symbol of Strachey's point—that Manning had sold his soul for a trophy which no one now values—and yet the symbol is not a bit of fancy but one of those established facts with which it is the biographer's business to deal.

It was inevitable that there should be a slight reaction against the high and almost universal praise with which his first books were greeted. Over "Elizabeth and Essex," as well as over the recent "Portraits in Miniature," certain reviewers caviled, but they could hardly do more than point out that Strachey was not a universal genius and that his range was, as a matter of fact, rather narrow. Primarily an essayist rather than a historian, or even, in certain senses of the word, a biographer, he was remarkable chiefly for the literary use which he made of generally sound information. Most often choosing as subjects persons concerning whom much had already been written, he seldom if ever added anything to the stock of available information, and doubtless his knowledge could not compete with that of technical experts in the various periods with which he dealt. But he was at least very learned by comparison with ninety-nine out of a hundred "interpreters," and it was his business to select the revealing and the picturesque fact wherever he could find it. No pure scholar immersed in the details of research could have written his delightful essays, and whatever limitations may be discovered in his style and tone are similarly compensated for by the fact that it was by accepting them that he was able to achieve so completely all that he attempted to achieve.

One naturally compares him with certain of the eighteenth-century masters whom he so obviously admired, and the similarity goes deeper than tricks of style—deeper than the clarity of his sentences, the grave irony of his mocking, and the set precision of his frankly rhetorical passages. And it goes deeper because Strachey had cultivated the mind to which such a manner is appropriate. He was aloof from all the enthusiasms which have been popular since its time, and the world of his books is very largely the world as it was seen by an eighteenth-century eye. The fact is made evident by the rareness of any references to the scientific or economic considerations which play so large a part in recent writings. Thus his point of view is political, rationalistic, and as nearly devoid of concern with amelioristic sociology as it is of romantic poetry. Thus, also, his ridicule falls swiftly upon any who deviate from common sense into eccentricity. He is so aware of Florence Nightingale's absurdity that he can hardly remember her greatness or respect her achievement. But this narrowness of interest, this impatience with anything which is not clear and rational, made possible to him, as it made possible to his models, the neat adequacy of his writings. Modern man is extraordinarily involved in things which he hopes, or senses, or half knows. He is aware of the inadequacy or incompleteness of his knowledge concerning things which he believes to be extremely important. Hence in his writing he is bound to be always qualifying and always inserting provisos. But all this, no matter how necessary it may be, is bad for his style. It clutters up his sentences and it blurs his effects. Strachey would have none of it. A writer before everything else, he would write about nothing which could not be written about well, and his essays are remarkable examples of the effectiveness to which such an attitude may lead.

To him one goes, not primarily for fact and not primarily for the most modern interpretations of either historical or other phenomena, but for that same literary delight which one seeks in a Gibbon. Take up any one of his essays and one may be sure of several rare and agreeable things. One may be sure that there will be no windiness or absurdity, no extravagance, and no folly. One may be sure also that one will find said all that shrewdness, wit, and cultivated common sense can say. There will be a beginning, a middle, and an end, and no loose threads left dangling.

Poem for My Daughter: II

By HORACE GREGORY

Tell her I love

to make these words a song with her careful lips

(O bride

Spring and bridegroom at your side) save them for the deep and long moment when the northstar mind perishes down quicksilver steep walls of flesh where love and death make a counterfeit of sleep.

Take this wreath to celebrate union of the fire and rain, bone and tissue

(Sleep O bride

for the waking limbs divide into separate walls again)
Tell her I shall be riveted into earth;

this wreath is grown from black bronze roots to weave a crown for the death mask and the head fixed with its metallic smile upward where generations climb making garlands of their own out of iron and of stone.

The Calm Within the Cyclone

By C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

ALL art is selection according to some prepossession in the mind of the artist. An artist's prepossessions may never rise to the dignity of a philosophy, may never be elaborated into a theory; but unless he is ■ fumbling incompetent, his fiction will tell us what he thinks about life. Whether he is ■ humorist, a writer of tragedy, or ■ concocter of sweetmeats for the feeble-hearted or feeble-minded, it is possible to trace out, by observing what he puts in or leaves out, his own scheme of values. Henry James had a definite point of view which he never attempted to formulate, self-consciously, into a theory of society. It was something apart from his idea of how to write ■ novel. Since he thought that art was based on selection and that the creation of ■ world within ■ world was the artist's purpose, we have every reason for seeking out his own picture of ■ desirable world. In tracing the outlines of his conception we must work from both positive and negative evidence. We must observe what he praises and what he condemns. There are more ways to condemn than make an impression on an untrained mind. It is as effective to condemn by irony as by emotional denunciation, by suave and subtle methods as by finger-pointing. Henry James never used the emotional method in his fiction. That he did not, increases the difficulty of stating precisely his vision of the world.

He was beyond all else the great exponent and defender of the leisure class. He joins himself, therefore, to the great aristocratic tradition in European literature. Coming late in the history of the leisure class, on the very edge, as we shall see, of its demise, he was lacking in many of the sharper prejudices cultivated before the middle-class revolutions of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. He accepted with entire insouciance the fact that the class must recruit its members from the children of newly rich business men. Indeed, he often placed them on a higher moral plane than certain of the impoverished representatives of the group that belonged to it traditionally. Neither was he without a certain sympathy for the proletariat, as shown in "The Princess Casamassima," even though his understanding of proletarian unrest was ludicrously inadequate. Henry James was, in a word, a man of his time. His insight into social forces was weak. His vision was of a static society.

The bias of his mind in favor of the leisure class was deeply rooted. His father had deliberately cultivated the idea that none were so admirable as the leisured and cultivated. In Newport, just before the Civil War, he caught a glimpse of what the representatives of this class might be, and when he came to examine American society after the war he was shocked to find that even the saving remnant that had perilously maintained its footing in Newport had disappeared. The whole emphasis of American society was hostile to the immediate development of the class. The next step in America was to be the development of ■ plutocracy. James perceived the results of the American development very clearly, but since he had been trained to believe that the leisure class represented the ne plus ultra in human development, he was not able to forgo it as a subject for his fiction.

He wrestled conscientiously with the American society that was before his eyes, but he could make nothing of it. He was permanently barred from contact with the dynamic individuals in American society, the business men, ■ fact which he regretted to the end of his days. Obscurely he knew that if he could grasp them in his understanding he would be close to the American secret. Not being able to do so, he accepted as final wisdom a conclusion he had drawn from his study of Balzac. Late in life he formulated it once again:

What we on our side in a thousand places gratefully feel is that [Balzac] cares for his monarchical and ecclesiastical society because it rounds itself for his mind into the most congruous and capacious theater for the repertory of his innumerable comedians. It has, above all, for ■ painter abhorrent of the superficial, the inestimable benefit of the accumulated, of strong marks and fine shades, contrasts and complications.

It was forced in on James that if he wished to deal with complex people he must search for them in ■ society exhibiting at least some of the paraphernalia exploited by Balzac. He found his resting-place in the nearest approximation to Balzacian society available after the revolutionary upheavals that had swept the world since his day. But he also went beyond Balzac in the sense that he concentrated his attention upon the finest types in that society. With his ineluctable prejudice against "simple organisms" he could hardly do otherwise. He knew that he was doing something unique and special, and the fact was confirmed during a lifetime of change. Scanning the works of his predecessors and contemporaries—Balzac, Flaubert, Zola, Maupassant, Searo, D'Annunzio—he found them all deficient in insight into superior people. None of them obtrudes except in the crudest fashion upon his own selected domain, and in that way, if in no other, he differed from his generation.

But as he pursued his quarry into its most secret places, he left behind him the seething world of naked social forces, and found it possible to deal with life and living without reference to the passions that are necessary to successful functioning in it. "In all the life that has energy enough to be interesting to me," wrote George Bernard Shaw many years ago, "subjective volition, passion, will, make intellect the merest tool. But there is in the center of that cyclone a certain calm spot where cultivated ladies and gentlemen live on independent incomes or by pleasant artistic occupations. It is there that Mr. James's art touches life, selecting whatever is graceful, exquisite, or dignified in its serenity." Henry James's people lived in sublime unconsciousness of their position in the center of the cyclone, and their creator was but dimly aware of the cyclone himself. He could only imagine that those who were excluded from it by birth and economic circumstances might be restless because they could not get to the "center." His careerists, moreover, are not Julien Sorels. The idea that reasonable men might wish to destroy it altogether never entered his mind. Only unreasonable men could cherish such an idea. And if he once reflected upon the terrible basis of exploitation upon which such a society rested, he was so enamored of the possibilities of the situation that he was able to blink away what he had glimpsed. His severest criticisms were reserved for the decay of manners and the corruption of ideals among those happy few whose hereditary or achieved resting-place the "center" was.

In his search for a society which would in some vague way provide him with the materials for the construction of his ideal world, he tried first the United States, then Italy, then France. He finally settled upon England, not because it completely corresponded to his conceptions, but because it offered the nearest replica in the actual world, and because living there was pleasurable to him personally. In England he found the requisite social machinery for the lives of the happy few in operation, and while he did not make use of it all in his stories, it provided him with a background against which to paint his pictures. In the famous passage from his critical study of Hawthorne he described the machinery he found necessary by enumerating the items lacking in the American scene:

No sovereign, no court, no personal loyalty, no aristocracy, no church, no clergy, no army, no diplomatic service, no country gentlemen, no palaces, no castles, no manners, nor old country-houses, nor parsonages, nor thatched cottages, nor ivied ruins; no cathedrals, nor abbeys, nor little Norman churches; no great universities, nor public schools—no Oxford, nor Eton, nor Harrow; no literature, no novels, no museums, no pictures, no political society, no sporting class—no Epsom nor Ascot!

But if he thought that to do a completely satisfactory novel he should work with a background in which all these and more were present, he made singularly little use of them in his fiction. He simply felt that without them present to him in the surrounding air his people existed in a void. Their very lives were conditioned by these factors, even if they were not dragged in on every possible occasion. They formed a part of the mental furniture of his people.

He concentrated his interest on his people, in this fashion still further removing himself from questions of social forces, historical movements. Character was James's consuming interest, and character in its highest expression, which he took to be under the conditions of leisure-class life. His people are very special types, carefully trained, specially disciplined, having ideals of conduct and motives for their conduct far removed from those galvanizing more ordinary mortals. They were controlled neither by social compulsions nor by unconscious psychological drives. Indeed, they were supremely self-conscious. Never for a moment did they lose an acute awareness of the freedom of their wills, and they are portrayed as acting according to the dictates of conscience controlled by taste and imagination. While their values might be based on traditional accumulations, they never acted without thought, but only after the most scrupulous examination of their motives. Correct conduct became with them the product of taste, conscience, and imagination, and in consequence high, fine, and above all beautiful. James is very close to the third Earl of Shaftesbury in his opinions. If his people were deficient in any one of these factors, their conduct was aberrant, and a fatal indictment of a James character is to say that he lacks taste and conscience. He may, though not if he is one of the truly celebrated, lack imagination. But if he lacks conscience, of which taste is the overt expression, he is damned. Taste may be rather strange so far as dress and manners go, but in moral matters it is impeccable. And as conscience is the basis of taste, so taste is the correcting and controlling factor with regard to imagination. It is imagination that carries James's people to the highest pitch of mental development.

With the three great factors active, the only logical result was an almost tedious self-consciousness about action. And it is the very fact that in James's world these factors are active that makes his "dramatic" novels seem so nearly static. No James character remains unconscious of his predicament. In direct contrast to the deterministic novels with their emphasis upon man as the creature of socio-psychological compulsions, the James novels deal with men and women who are acutely "aware." No more illuminating contrast can be drawn as illustrating one of the great differences between James and one of the most notable of his American successors, Theodore Dreiser, than the difference between James's self-conscious people, with their free wills, and the men and women of Dreiser's novels, who are supremely lacking in awareness, completely victims of a determining environment and psychological compulsions. This contrast goes deeper than any mere difference in fictional method. Its roots are in the fact that Dreiser explored, with as active a receptivity of impressions as James, the very American waste land that James rejected. He found his impressions crystallized and confirmed by the mechanistic evolutionary monism of Spencer and others of that time. This contrast is a measure of what in all probability James escaped, as it was precisely at the time that his ideas were taking definite shape that Spencerianism was most active and impressive. Would he have been able at once closely to study American society and escape the Spencerian conclusion after the fashion of his brother William? There is every reason to doubt it, for if ever a society seemed to justify a deterministic point of view it was American society from 1870 on. It is the absence from James's world of the factors with which Dreiser is so deeply concerned that makes it seem vague and unreal to those whose taste is for the sociological novel. They cannot see any rational basis to his psychology. That it had a scientific basis the writer would be the last to argue, but he does argue that properly and sympathetically viewed it makes James's world intelligible. Furthermore, it often results in the characters' acting from motives which are in exact correspondence with those current in the Anglo-Saxon world at large, so far as it is untouched by modern psychological findings.

Since James's chosen way of handling his material was dramatic, and since he could not work without placing his characters in "predicaments," it follows that he juxtaposed his evil and good characters to bring out the drama and define the predicament. The characters he admired are the "pure in heart." It is to Isabel Archer, Milly Theale, and Maggie Verver that his heart goes out. His disapproval weighs upon Gilbert Osmond, Kate Croy, and Charlotte Stant. And if their cases are considered thoughtfully, it will appear that the pure in heart are trying to live beautifully in freedom. They are defeated by the malignancy of the world. There is no doubt that James had a profound realization of the vileness of the world. "A prouder nature never affronted the long humiliation of life," he wrote of Fanny Kemble, and that judgment might almost stand as an epigraph for his great characters. The struggle for beautiful living, for freedom, for a situation in which one can act spontaneously from the purest of motives, tells us by plain implication his vision of the highest human felicity. He thought he saw the requisite fundamentals of such a society in the leisure class of his time. He did not take the leisure class at its own valuation, but starting from what it presented to the discerning eye, he projected a vision of a society higher and nobler than any he had found. In writing his fiction he was compelled to admit that his completely admirable characters could only expect to suffer defeat from contemporary conditions. And he censured the conditions in no uncertain terms, whether they were new growths or long-established traditions of human obliquity.

His pure in heart were usually Americans, and this in spite of the fact that he had rejected America as a scene on which to work. He may have been influenced in this view of the American character, particularly the female character, by his father's ideas unconsciously and inadequately absorbed. Whatever the origin of the bias, it is apparent that he thought that these women and men would suffer an even more complete defeat under American conditions, and that if they were to gain any satisfaction from life at all, it would be in the European situation. And if, in any imaginable future, they were to flourish in complete freedom, it would be in a society which was a sublimation of European leisure-class life into something unimaginably higher and finer.

Yet in spite of the splendor of James's vision there is something seemingly shallow and limited about it. In his curious distaste for "simple organisms," we may find one of the important limitations of his reasoning. It led him to consider the case of complex and highly disciplined people working on narrow "class" problems, and to ignore the more simple and naive types whose "implications" were more "human." In this way he narrowed the appeal of his treatment by seeming to narrow the application of the truth with which he was dealing. It is only when we consider his version of the difficulties of the pure in heart in comparison with that of Herman Melville that we see that he treated here a universal problem in a specialized manner. We find Melville dealing with the pure in heart in his last novel, "Billy Budd." The problem worried Melville to a far greater extent than it did James, but he presented his version of the difficulty on a far simpler plane than James. Billy Budd, our example, is the type of morally naive man—a man of primitive Adamic purity—victimized and brought to his death by a corrupt creature whose moral obloquy is beyond Budd's comprehension. Now Melville persistently visualized this situation and found no way of resolving it any more than James did. But—and here is the point—he saw that good and evil are permanent factors in the world whether we deal with their expression in simple or in complex people, and that evil will triumph over good as often as not. Higher than either is justice, and the best that we can pray for is that those delegated the function of dealing out justice really meet the exacting demands of their position. James had just as firm a grasp on the problem as Melville, but with his narrower social sympathies he so specialized the problem that it is with difficulty that we realize that he is dealing with a matter of universal import. This weakens the appeal of his work even if it does not detract from its validity.

Continuing on this same line, we find in this point the key to the fundamental flaw of his whole vision. In concentrating his attention upon highly complicated representatives of a highly specialized social group, he brought the interest of his stories to the narrowest possible point. And by developing a complex method with which to deal with his very special people, he still further narrowed the appeal. The fundamental problems remained the same, but his people expressed themselves, not directly with reference to native emotions, but in self-conscious and even niggling debates over points of conduct—secondary and tertiary growths. By burying the problems under a thick and luxuriant covering of manners, he led the careless reader easily to believe that manners are the whole story. But they are not! James was unquestionably right in insisting that the more complex the people and the more acutely self-conscious they became, the more interesting they became to the analyst. But in pandering to the analyst in him he hid the moralist. Indeed, he almost destroyed him, and his vision got almost hopelessly entangled in the enormous developing tropical plant of adventitious circumstances! If the critic may be so presumptuous as to put his finger on what he thinks to be James's first misstep, he may place it on that period in his life, the Newport time before the Civil War, when he got the idea that leisure-class life in a complex society was the highest expression of human living. Once that vision got a firm hold on Henry James's mind, it was only a question of time until he would end up by writing so baroque a piece of fiction as "The Golden Bowl."

Had James lived in a feudal society at the height of its glory and had at his command (an impossible conjunction of circumstances to be sure) all the resources he developed for fiction writing, he would have been one of the chief glories of that sort of society. It was his misfortune to live at the very end of an epoch in world history, when even the grip of the middle class over the governments of Western Europe was weakening, and the proletarian ideal was in the making. He accommodated himself very well in the world so long as no overt and dislocating catastrophe took place. He could ignore, with a certain complacency, the warning voices of such writers as H. G. Wells and Bernard Shaw. He could take a certain scared interest in the stirrings of the proletariat without finding any more drastic remedy than "democracy with a chance." But he could not envisage the extinction of his world. He could not foresee the time when the leisure class would be written down as a mere parasite on the social body, worthy only of the drastic treatment meted out to biological parasites. In direct contrast to the position of his brother William, he believed in the fixed and the permanent. His world was a static world, a closed universe. Had his social vision been broader, and had his sense of historical change been greater, he would never have been led into this astonishing error. Far from being a defender of civilization against barbarism, as a distinguished and cultured critic has recently celebrated him for being, or the proponent of cosmopolitanism against provincialism, as he frequently envisaged himself, he was the supreme representative of the leisure class advanced to the stage of selectively admitting the moneyed middle class to a part in the life on sufferance, but not to the stage of seeing that the whole structure was in acute danger of collapsing and disappearing at the demand of the onward-marching proletariat.

Lullaby for Jonathan

By FRANCES FROST

The earth in the night,
The earth in a spiral of stars
Rocks slowly with its white
Streams that fall
In alleys of crying down a mountain wall,
With its boulder-scars
Settled more darkly into the thawing hills.
The wild sap fills
The budded trees; vertical madness spills
In a froth of leaves from the shaken and secret bough.

This is an hour for sleep . . . O child, close now
Your eyes on the furious spring!
Weep not for anything who now may lie
Cradled upon a world that in the sky
Rocks with its cloud of savage blossoming!
Not yet must you be ardent and possessed,
Loving the flesh, the grass,
The dangerous winds and the steep
Grooves of wilderness-water thundering down.
Oh, close your eyes against the perilous, deep
Chasm of midnight where the strange stars pass . . .
This is the hour when in the valleys of spring
Only the very young and the old may sleep.

Books

What's Wrong with Utopia?

Brave New World. By Aldous Huxley. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

ON the flyleaf of this novel is a quotation from Nicolas Berdiaeff: "Les utopies apparaissent comme bien plus réalisables qu'on ne le croyait autrefois. Et nous nous trouvons actuellement devant une question bien autrement angoissante: Comment éviter leur réalisation définitive?" Mr. Huxley has portrayed here a Utopia that obviously he would wish to avoid. It is set ostensibly in the far future, the year of Our Ford, 632. One has not read very far, however, before one perceives that this is not really Mr. Huxley's idea of what the future will be like, but a projection of some contemporary ideals. So far as progress in invention is concerned, there is very little in this Utopia, outside of the biological sphere at least, that does not seem realizable within the next twenty years—though people do go to the "feelies." Economically, the ideals that prevail are those usually associated with Henry Ford—mass production and particularly mass consumption. Everyone spends freely, and games and other pleasures that do not require the use of elaborate and expensive apparatus are frowned upon. The social organization is communistic—there is a World State managed by ten World Controllers, who head an almost Catholic hierarchy; everyone is assigned his job, is educated to identify his interests with those of everyone else, and is suspected if he is ever found alone. The official religion is Fordianity; people under stress of emotion say "Ford forbid!" or "Ford's in his flivver; all's well with the world," and make the sign of the T. "My Life and Work" has replaced the Bible, and all old books are forbidden to circulate because they suggest the past and history is bunk. Moreover, reading wastes time that should be given to consumption.

The sexual mores stem from the ideals associated with the names of Freud and Bertrand Russell. There is complete promiscuity; every woman carries a set of contraceptives with her; the children are taught erotic games in the kindergarten; marriage and the home have disappeared; any approach to monogamy is considered hardly decent; children are brought to birth in bottles in laboratories, and mother and father have become merely obscene words. Sentimentality and a curious bottle-fixation seem to have survived, however, for the people sing such popular songs as:

Bottle of mine, it's you I've always wanted!
Bottle of mine, why was I ever decanted?
Skies are blue inside of you,
The weather's always fine;

For
There ain't no Bottle in all the world
Like that dear little Bottle of mine.

Curiously enough, there is no democracy, but, on the contrary, a rigid caste system. Each caste is set off from the others not only by the work it does, but by the color of its clothes and even by physical constitution. The Alphas represent the highest intellectual class, from which all the directors are recruited; they are selected from the finest chromosomes, and developed in their bottles under optimum chemical conditions. The classes graduate down through Betas, Gammas, Deltas, and finally Epsilons, who do the most menial work, and are even purposely stunted in growth by a shortage of oxygen in their incubator bottles. The purpose of the caste system is social stability. There could obviously be no social stability if everyone were an Alpha. The lower castes are prevented from being dissatisfied by having brains geared down to the work they have to do. In addition to these hereditary and prenatal precautions, conditioning along the lines discovered by Freud, Pavlov, and Watson begins at birth. The secret of happiness and virtue, as one director points out, is liking what you've got to do; therefore all conditioning aims at making people like their unescapable social destiny. Children are conditioned to hate flowers by giving them regularly an electric shock when they touch them. In their sleep certain maxims, like "Everybody belongs to everybody else," are repeated to them over and over again, so that the adult mind accepts them as axioms. Finally, these people are also protected from whatever physical and emotional pain there may be left in the world by regular doses of soma, a drug somewhat similar in its qualities to morphine, with none of the latter's bad after-effects.

What is wrong with this Utopia? Mr. Huxley attempts to tell us by the device of introducing a "savage," brought up under other ideals on an Indian reservation, and having read that author unknown to the Model T Utopia, Shakespeare. In the admittedly violent and often irrational reactions of the "savage" we have the indictment of this civilization. Not only is there no place in it for love, for romance, for fidelity, for parental affection; there is no suffering in it, and hence absolutely no need of nobility and heroism. In such a society the tragedies of Shakespeare become not merely irrelevant, but literally meaningless. This Model T civilization is distinguished by supreme stability, comfort, and happiness, but these things can be purchased only at a price, and the price is a high one. Not merely art and religion are brought to a standstill, but science itself, lest it make discoveries that would be socially disturbing. Even one of the ten World Controllers is led to suspect the truth, though of course forbidding the publication, of a theory holding that the purpose of life is not the maintenance of well-being, but "some intensification and refining of consciousness, some enlargement of knowledge."

"Brave New World" is successful as a novel and as a

The Book on the U. S. S. R. RUSSIA

By HANS von ECKARDT

The one book that answers every question about what is happening in the U. S. S. R. today and why. The author is Professor of Political Science at the University of Heidelberg and was for years professionally in touch with the economic situation of Russia. The book deals with Russian economics, history, politics, art, science, philosophy, and the communal life of today. With 127 illustrations and 13 maps. 6¼ x 9½ inches, 760 pages. $7.50

Tales as tall as the Michigan pines

BABE, THE BLUE OX, one of the woodcuts in—

THE SAGINAW PAUL BUNYAN

By JAMES STEVENS

These stories of that truly American legendary hero, Paul Bunyan, and his fantastic lumberjacks are a grand contribution to Americana. Besides Paul Bunyan and the bears who one winter hibernated in his beard, here are Babe, the Blue Ox, who measured forty-two ax handles and a plug of chewing tobacco between the horns, and the rest of Paul Bunyan's amazing crew. Illustrated. 5¼ x 8¼ inches, 276 pages. $2.50

MAN AND TECHNICS

A Contribution to a Philosophy of Life

By OSWALD SPENGLER

This first book since Spengler's epoch-making The Decline of the West is both a summary of his known philosophy and an introduction to his future work. It is compact and powerful. To be published February 19th. cloth, 5¼ x 8¼ inches, 110 pages. $2.00

LORENZO IN TAOS

By MABEL DODGE LUHAN

As thrilling as any novel and, in the opinion of many, the best portrait we are likely ever to get of that strange genius, D. H. Lawrence. Included in the text are some ninety odd letters from Lawrence to Mrs. Luhan which have never been printed before. To be published February 19th. Illustrated. cloth, 5¼ x 8¼ inches, 352 pages. $3.50

MODERN EDUCATION

A Critique of its Fundamental Ideas

By DR. OTTO RANK

With an Introduction by Ludwig Lewisohn

To the great names of Freud, Jung and Adler must now be added that of Otto Rank. Long an international figure in the world of psychology and described by Havelock Ellis as "perhaps the most brilliant and clairvoyant" of Freud's many pupils and associates, Dr. Rank has written here for the general reader on the basic problems of education. To be published Feb. 19th. cloth, 5¼ x 7½ inches, 256 pages. $2.50

BORZOI BOOKS

If the books listed on this page have caught your interest, you will certainly not want to miss the new Borzoi catalogue which is just off the press. It describes the Borzoi Books which will be published this Spring. Write to-day and it will be sent to you free of charge.

the talk of England and America

MEN IN DARKNESS

By JAMES HANLEY

"A man to be closely watched," this young author who has succeeded in sending both the English and American public and critics quite daft over his work. Percy Hutchison said in The New York Times: "Hanley writes like a riveting machine, or machine gun, in action. . . It is evident that Hanley, with his profound insight into the lower depths, with his surging but well-leashed resentments, is a man to be closely watched." There are five stories in all, but just read a few pages of Narrative yourself, and you will want the book. $2.50

UNINVITED GUESTS

A Short Account of the Animals Living On or In Us

By DAVID CAUSEY, Ph. D.

"Probably the most witty, interesting and yet accurate account of human parasites that has ever been offered to the general reader . . . it is heartily recommended . . .", says Dr. Edwin Grant Conklin, Professor of Biology at Princeton University, in recommending this book to Scientific Book Club members. 5¼ x 7½ inches, 144 pages. $2.00

ALFRED · A · KNOPF · 730 FIFTH AVENUE · NEW YORK

satire; but one need not accept all its apparent implications. A little suffering, a little irrationality, a little division and chaos, are perhaps necessary ingredients of an ideal state, but there has probably never been a time when the world has not had an oversupply of them. Only when we have reduced them enormously will Mr. Huxley's central problem become a real problem. Meanwhile reformers can continue to strain every muscle in the quiet assurance of their own futility. They may, for example, form their Leagues of Nations, draw up their Kellogg Pacts and Nine-Power Treaties, and hold their disarmament conferences, in the calm confidence that a Japan will still brutally attack a China.

HENRY HAZLITT

Two Reviews of Mr. Tarkington

Mary's Neck. By Booth Tarkington. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

MR. TARKINGTON'S latest novel might be reviewed in one of two ways. Let us call the first

THE MODE UNHUMOROUS

Readers interested in some minor sidelights on the decay of American middle-class culture should turn to "Mary's Neck," a new novel by an author who, once upon a time, in a book called "Alice Adams," evidenced a sincere desire to deal fearlessly with his material. As Mr. Tarkington is already comfortably provided with the goods of this world, he must have written "Mary's Neck" because he liked to do so, which is to say that it represents to a degree his present attitude toward a certain level of American life.

Mr. Tarkington is an observer of really valuable talents: he has a quick eye and ear, a true though not a philosophic sense of humor, and can tell a story more clearly and craftily than nine-tenths of his fellow-novelists. It is all the more regrettable, therefore, that he employs these talents so unfruitfully. He knows the surface behavior of Americans (the more comfortable ones) as few know it; but he has more and more consistently refused (out of laziness? out of timidity? out of stupidity? out of all three?) to recognize either the dramatic or the social meaning of this behavior. If Mr. Tarkington were merely a light novelist like Mr. Wodehouse, this intellectual constriction would be excusable, even laudable; for of Mr. Wodehouse and his kind we demand a certain fairy-tale defiance of reality. But Mr. Tarkington has the reputation of a social satirist. He deals in national types. No matter how gossamer the story of "Mary's Neck" may be, the book does have something to say about American society, American women, the younger generation, prohibition, and other solemn topics. And what it has to say about these things cannot be put in the category of happy-go-lucky chaffing. What it has to say is pernicious propaganda for smugness, stupidity, waste, cruelty, and weakness. Mr. Tarkington probably does not know this, but his good intentions do not alter the fact that the 100,000 comfortable Americans (particularly women) who read his books will subconsciously absorb it as an apology for their own mode of life.

In "Mary's Neck" there is only one even mildly intelligent character—Madame Parka; and there is only one relatively decent person—Mr. Massey, the narrator. The others, by their own actions, show themselves up—despite the author's gentle and tolerant smile—as snobs, dipsomaniacs, hypocrites, and vulgarities. The mainspring of the book is the activities of the Massey family. Mr. Massey performs a single function: he supplies money to Mrs. Massey and to Enid and Clarissa, her two half-witted daughters—or, translated into Tarkingtonese, wholesome American girls. The female Masseys spend the entire summer in various highly organized forms of conspicuous waste for which the emasculated (Tarkingtonese: good-natured) Mr. Massey pays. The present reviewer, who is noted for his lack of humor, here presents an approximate listing of the summer expenditures of the Massey family—that is, those expenditures specifically referred to in the book. I commend this list to the attention of Mr. Stuart Chase.

Traveling expenses from Illinois to Maine and back	$1,000
Cottage rent	2,000
Hired help (including gardener hired to satisfy Mrs. Massey's uncontrollable, though impermanent, lust for New England gardens)	500
Fake antiques brought home in triumph by female Masseys	1,000
Buying and enlarging cottage—necessary to assure female Masseys' peace of mind	10,000
Run-abouts for female Masseys	4,000
Repair of damages to furniture caused by presence of Eddie Bullfinch, Enid's semi-lunatic admirer	250
Purchases of "modern art"—Miss Massey's gesture toward Higher Life	1,500
Country-club dues (necessitated by social ambitions of female Masseys)	500
Extra expenses incurred as result of above	500
Fee and expenses of Doctor Gilmerding, lecturer (another gesture toward Higher Life on part of female Masseys)	250
Purchase of frame to enshrine picture of another of Miss Enid's dribble-mouthed young men	70

This makes an approximate total of $25,000 spent that the female Masseys may remain unconscious of the fact that they have no legitimate reason for existing.

There are about two hundred other residents of "Mary's Neck," all engaged in doing the Massey kind of thing. If we assume that the female contingent of each family indulges in conspicuous waste only up to the modest amount of $10,000 per family, we have a total of $200,000 thrown away during a single summer season at one small, exclusive resort. This outlay, meaningless, non-productive, and associated only with the meanest and cruelest of human emotions (greed, snobbery, and hatred), is really the skeleton of the anatomy of Mr. Tarkington's society. His women spend; and his "men"—the gelded rich—accede supinely to this spending because (Mr. Massey is a nice case in point) the very guts have been slowly drawn out of them by the confident fingers of their women-folk.

And all the fake art and culture which drives us to despair—all the Doctor Gilmerdings and New England antique collectors and art-colony fakers—all this is nourished by the stupidity and snobbery of the female Masseys and by the vacant-eyed, grinning generosity of their gutted male appendages who have enough brains to run large-sized industries but not enough to combat the exhibitionist whimsies of their women.

It is perfectly true that all this is material for farce, but Mr. Tarkington is not writing farce, he is writing social comedy. Apparently he invites us not merely to guffaw but to think—and then, because he is unable or unwilling to expose the real meaning of his very able observation, prevents us from doing any real thinking at all.

What is there in our literary set-up which produces "in-between" novelists such as Mr. Tarkington, Miss Hurst, Miss Ferber—men and women of keen minds and great diligence, but who, somehow, with the rich materials of our life under their very hands, draw back and present us with bastard fictions which are neither genuine entertainment nor genuine novels? In Germany a writer like Vicki Baum turns out the same bastard art form—but she does it self-consciously. She is faking, she knows she is faking, she wants to fake, and she is sure that her audience wants to be bamboozled. Not so Mr. Tark-ington, Miss Hurst, Miss Ferber: they are as honest as sunlight, but something betrays them, some essential blindness, some fear. Perhaps the fatal flaw in their work is due to their dim consciousness of the increasing non-significance of the class to which they have elected to belong. They have thrown in their lot with a way of life which already stinks of putrescence, and perhaps it is too much to ask of them that they should open wide their nostrils.

The second way of reviewing "Mary's Neck" might be termed

THE MODE AFFABLE

"Mary's Neck" is one of Mr. Tarkington's pleasantest and shrewdest tales. It deals with the adventures and misadventures of the Massey family, consisting of Mr. Massey, president of the Logansville, Illinois, Light and Power Company; his wife, and their two young daughters, Enid and Clarissa. The wholesome, average, upper-middle-class, but rather naive Masseys invade the exclusive Maine seaside resort of "Mary's Neck," and attempt, a bit fumblingly, to accommodate themselves to an environment to which they are not by nature adapted. Mr. Massey is one of Booth Tarkington's most understanding portraits. It is he who, in his garrulous, Middle Western lingo, relates, with a certain amount of humorous detachment, the efforts which his wife and his two attractive daughters make in the direction of art, literature, and the social elegancies of the best Eastern families. In the course of his gentle but shrewd satire, Mr. Tarkington creates a small gallery of amusing characters, all the way from destructive little Paulie Timberlake, aged nine, up to Doctor Gilmerding, lecturer and authority on the habits of the Ogilluwaya Indians. Mr. Tarkington, in the course of the years, has grown mellow and more tolerant in his view of American life. The Babbitt-baiters and the viewers-with-alarm will turn with contempt from this merry tale, but the rest of us, less stiff-necked perhaps in our literary preferences, will be only too happy to tender Booth Tarkington a vote of thanks for this consistently intelligent and amusing addition to his long list of distinguished novels.

CLIFTON FADIMAN

Education in America

The Theory of Education in the United States. By Albert Jay Nock. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

A SMALL volume on education, worthy in style and content of Matthew Arnold's pen and brain—is not this an amazing event? It comes, of course, not from a professor in a school or college of education, but from an urbane and mellow scholar, educated in what he calls the Great Tradition, and keenly sensitive to the meaning of words. Mr. Nock perceives the profound truth of Renan's observation: "Countries which, like the United States, have set up a considerable popular instruction without any serious higher education will long have to expiate their error by their intellectual mediocrity, the vulgarity of their manners, their superficial spirit, their failure in general intelligence." And we are expiating it with a vengeance. Misled by catchwords like "democracy" and "equality," we have in the realm of the spirit and the intellect leveled down to the average or subaverage person; and we have obliterated the distinction between liberal and instrumental. In thorough agreement with Mr. Nock, Justice Holmes once said that democracy and equality have a meaning in the social and political sphere; but "when the effervescence of democratic negation extends to spiritual things, we are not only wrong, but ignobly wrong." Precisely the same is true of sub-$1.

BONIBOOKS

AMERICAN OXFORD
DICTIONARY

Compiled by F. G. and
H. W. Fowler

EDUCATION AND THE
GOOD LIFE

Bertrand Russell

GREAT SHORT STORIES OF
THE WORLD

Edited by Barrett H. Clark
and Maxim Lieber

OXFORD BOOK OF
AMERICAN VERSE

Edited by Bliss Carman

ISRAEL

Ludwig Lewisohn

AGAINST THE GRAIN

J. K. Huysmans

OUR BUSINESS CIVILIZATION

James Truslow Adams

THE HIGH PLACE

James Branch Cabell

THIS EARTH OF OURS

Jean-Henri Fabre

WHAT IS WRONG WITH MARRIAGE

Hamilton & MacGowan

SOUTH WIND

Norman Douglas

MICHELANGELO

Romain Rolland

THE HISTORY OF MR. POLLY

H. G. Wells

TAR

Sherwood Anderson

ALBERT & CHARLES BONI

NEW YORK

ject matter and activities. Science, art, literature, politics, mathematics, music give scope to taste, ideals, and intelligence; out of them educated persons can be made. But street-cleaning, dish-washing, laundering, and shaving are merely instrumental: someone must do them; perhaps everyone, for one reason or another, should participate in them. But out of them no liberal education can be fashioned for either youth or adults. Indeed, the whole adult-education movement will founder unless the steadily increasing leisure of manual and other workers is utilized to bring into their lives interests and outlooks that are totally apart from their mental, mechanical, or instrumental activities. In his recent Inglis Lecture, Professor Dewey places zoology and laundering on some sort of educational parity. He says truly that zoology may be made "narrow and confining"; but he fails to note that laundering cannot help being "narrow and confining," whereas zoology rightly presented is an enlightening discipline. The generation that has been demoralized by the equalitarian philosophy that assumes equal importance for Homer, Spinoza, and "food etiquette" ought to be brought to its senses by Mr. Nock's careful and restrained exposition of what education really is.

But while the indiscriminate admission of any sort of knowledge or skill has for the time being destroyed colleges and universities and with them a race or group or remnant of educated men, I am much more willing than Mr. Nock to depart from the letter of the Great Tradition. Educable persons can be educated by means of so-called modern subjects; but, as Mr. Nock rightly maintains, not by being nursed and spoon-fed. Education is a difficult, perilous, exacting adventure; only those competent to struggle upwards with little help are going to be educated. Our schools and colleges and universities, in becoming "public-service institutions," have ceased, as Mr. Nock points out, to be colleges and universities. His appeal that they drop the name of college or university will fall on deaf ears—partly because they know not the enormity of what they do, partly because they are loath to disclose their nakedness.

ABRAHAM FLEXNER

A Cloud of Dadaists

The European Caravan. Edited by Samuel Putnam. Brewer, Warren and Putnam. $4.

THERE are compendia and compendia. "The European Caravan," however, as compiled and translated by Samuel Putnam and several associates, manages to be an affair of extraordinary interest. A strange book, well off the beaten track, its successful qualities seem rather the result of intuition and happy accident than of design. As a gleaning from ten years of the literary advance guard in Europe it is not always a happy amalgam: the English and Spanish sections—save for Gomez de la Serna—have but little excitement for us; the fragments come and go too swiftly to be tasted or appraised. As translation "The European Caravan" generally fails creditably before fearful hazards: those of reproducing the writings of young men who exclaim in the manner of Rimbaud, "Prends l'éloquence et tords son cou!"—who, hating literature, seek to "wring its neck." But in itself, the French section, filling half the spacious volume and bulwarked by a mass of explanatory notes, appeals to us powerfully through the bars of translation; as an account of a decade of artistic and moral experiment which has been little understood or recorded, it becomes superb dramatic history.

The amateur spirit has always thrived in France, to the shame of all the professional writers of books for railway stalls and all the academicians. The literary world pictured in this anthology is composed of a far greater number of apocalyptic characters than we ever hear of; it is made up of men and women who arrive from Chile or Rumania with their own absolute, uncompromising solutions, setting up their own altars, their own reviews, gathering apostles, or sometimes furnishing, in their own persons, an audience of a single reader. Thus many schools, "movements," controversies are paraded before us by Mr. Putnam with no little pedantry. You have dadaism in revolt against society and its arts; you have superrealism succeeding dadaism; and finally you have "creationism" revolting against both superrealism and literature. But "creationism," as this reviewer recalls, happened to be a hoax played upon the South American who was its only prophet and "angel." In any case we perceive clearly enough that during this period the moderns of the apocalyptic type were far more interesting for their actions than for their writings.

Dadaism has been defined as a tremendous and violent joke upon society in general. If it was a joke, it was a rather bitter one. In retrospect, it appears to have begun and ended in an affair of suicide. Certainly it was the most dynamic "movement" of the period. A young philosopher, dandy, and soldier, Jacques Vaché, who killed himself in 1918, seems to have furnished the cult in his letters and conversation with much of the nihilistic doctrine and sinister humor it embraced. There were other precursors, of course, for Breton, Aragon, and Soupault to nourish themselves with. After the war Tzara came over from Zurich to join them, bringing his barbarous boom-boom and the new god "Dada."

"Dada meant nothing," as its devotees asserted again and again. It was the end of all "movements." At the same time it promised a new technique for promoting disorders, farces, sensations, revolts, of all kinds, and especially publicity of a grim and offensive humor. It was to furnish a "weapon for the demolition of the Old World," for perpetual revolution. Those who attended, between 1920 and 1923, the noisy "conventions" and soirees of Dada, who heard the reading of dadaist texts to the accompaniment of jazz bands, who watched the bold conduct of plots or exploits in "bad taste" calculated always to insult the public, felt themselves privileged indeed. The leaders, including also Marcel Duchamps and Picabia, were men either of remarkable fertility or remarkable talent. At moments men like Valéry, Picasso, Paul Morand, and Cocteau were their partisans as well. Even the aged Tory, Maurice Barrès, admitted his envy of them. Why? Because manifestly the dadaist-superrealists armed themselves with a kind of absolute moral "sincerity" which repudiated all worldly compromise, thus approaching anew the anti-social and romantic doctrines of Jean-Jacques. If to be thus sincere meant, upon occasions, to be destructive, the ringleaders did not blench. Their "conspiracies" ranged from the pernicious dissemination of social defeatism to the more comic aspects of revolt, such as aiding in the escape from parental tyranny of young poets destined for the theological seminary. I remember well the organized and successful effort of a whole troop of dadaists, against the Parisian police and detective force, on behalf of an eloping couple whom they concealed in the heart of the city. For a period an underground fame and authority brought the insurgent young to their camp, as to an ardent foyer of revolution.

Among such nihilists and super-Bohemians there could not fail to be perfidy of the most elaborate kind, dissension most merciless. Trials were held which seemed fully as terrifying as those under the revolutionary tribunals of 1793. Again, and again, following storms within the microcosm, the movement would "purge" itself, until it was broken into unrecognizable fragments. The army of snobs and dandies who had followed it with delight knew not where to turn.

The rise and fall of a line of dadaist-superrealists is traced in detail by Mr. Putnam, and illustrated by examples of their "texts" which never fail to appear strange in English. (It is a pity that nothing by Louis Aragon has been included; although it may evidently have been impossible to secure the co-operation of a writer who, in the most menacing terms, recently forbade all the book reviewers in France ever to mention his name.) Some of the group had led double lives—that is, preserved good homes, brought up children, in after hours. Like Soupault, they could say, once the great days were over, "I write novels, I publish books. I keep busy!" Others have turned to the religions of Karl Marx or St. Thomas; even to the cult of conformisme. One of them at any rate, Jacques Rigaut, well known as an occasional resident of New York, carried defeatism to its limits. This charming, impeccably dressed young Frenchman ("Lord Patchogue") was the hero of a story written by one of his colleagues, called "The Empty Valise." On November 5, 1929, he ended his life with a pistol. "Here," as Mr. Putnam observes, "was one dadaist-surrealist who put the thing into practice." But then, suicide is an old story in the history of French letters.

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

Books in Brief

The Bridal Gown. By Kristmann Gudmundsson. Translated by O. F. Theis. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $2.50.

"The Bridal Gown" is in the best tradition of Scandinavian literature, a sober, detached study of two generations of Icelandic farmers. The symbolism of the stain on the bridal gown, the husband's fanatic repentance to his dead wife, his daughter's eventual breakdown in her attempt to remove the stain—this story of hatreds and lifelong revenge is clearly reminiscent of Selma Lagerlöf's "Ring of the Löwenskölds." There is a great difference in that the madness and cruelty of the characters of "The Bridal Gown" are treated with a matter-of-fact casualness and a tolerant humor that suggest an acceptance of them as normal human conduct. Melodrama so simply written that its excesses seem natural loses much of its effectiveness, but "The Bridal Gown" remains a powerful and memorable novel.

No Minor Vices. By Edmund S. Whitman. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.50.

A young man goes to Central America out of a proper New England home to work as timekeeper on a banana plantation. He disintegrates in the usual manner. Even the author's autobiographical interest in relating minutely all the details of life on a banana plantation, and the various angles of the problem of whether to sleep or not to sleep with brown-skinned women, cannot give the account any force or vividness; it sinks with each page farther into dullness.

Mud and Stars. By Dorothea York. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

Miss York has made a very complete and interesting collection of the soldier songs of the Allied nations in the late war. Her contention is that men in the trenches sang perhaps more of love than of war, that certainly when they wrote down their verses their subjects were most likely to be sentimental. She has, of course, done considerable editing of these songs, since otherwise many of them would not be allowed in print, but she has been able to keep the full flavor of the lines and much of their quick humor. Since variation was rather the rule than the exception, she has caught only one version—enough to indicate how the thing was done. Acquainted as Miss York is with a large body of this folksong, she is able to make some interesting distinctions between, for example, the songs of the Tommies and of the Doughboys.

"The best historical study of Japan, I believe, in the English language."—Nathaniel Peffer.

JAPAN

By G. B. Sansom

"This leisurely, scholarly book gives more background for a real understanding of modern Japan than any other book in the English language. . . . Amid a flood of books which suggest that Japan was born with the arrival of heavy machinery in the last half century, it is notable and unique."—Lewis Gannett.

Illustrated, 536 pp. $7.50

"The cleverest man of the 19th Century."

—Bernard Shaw.

LASSALLE

By Arno Schirokauer

"This volume is the first adequate biography of the great Socialist leader available in English, and its chief merit lies precisely in the sense of balance with which the full-length portrait is presented. . . . A fascinating personality emerges to delight readers of biography."—New York Sun.

Illustrated $5.00

The Century Co., New York

Discover the Human Side of the author of "Jurgen" in this New Book by

BRANCH CABELL

These Restless Heads

A new Cabell draws back the richly brocaded curtains which have hitherto concealed him. Dwelling with Cabellian irony on his personal experiences from the days of callow youth, he establishes their significance in the pattern of everyday existence. As you read this book pictures of your past will inevitably take form in your own head, whether it be restless or otherwise. February Selection of the Literary Guild.

$2.50

A New Book by

NORMAN DOUGLAS

Paneros

A diverting and sophisticated history of aphrodisiacs written with all the rare erudition, lightness and humor, wisdom and courage peculiar to the author of South Wind. Limited Edition.

$5.00

ROBERT M. McBRIDE & CO. 4 West 16th St., N. Y.

The Oxford Lists. By H. C. Boulbee. Oxford University Press. $1.

This is a slim little volume of capable but rather dull poetry on the themes of war, beauty, life, and death. The poet, who is probably Canadian, shows familiarity with the whole tradition of English poetry, and the skill which training in the history of that poetry sometimes gives. But he has almost nothing new to say and he uses a literary language which stunts the emotion.

Music

Mental and Bodily Rhythm

THE slightly misty word "eurythmics" has somewhat clouded, in the minds of those unacquainted with what it stands for, the signal importance of the works of Emile Jaques-Dalcroze. The fact that the system of musical instruction evolved by him has been of great assistance to dancers—and that some of the most conspicuous dancers, like Mary Wigman, are former Dalcroze pupils—has tended to obscure in the public mind the essentially musical origin and application of "eurythmics."

Emile Jaques (the "Dalcroze" is a synthetic pseudonym) came upon the ideas that underlie his work as a teacher of solfège (ear-training and sight-reading) and theory at the Geneva Conservatory. In his work he found—what is proved anew continually in the round of concertgoing—that, of the elements of music, rhythm is the least understood, and that while systems of melodic and harmonic instruction have been evolved in great detail, and are generally used, the rhythmic side of the musical personality is usually left entirely uncultivated. It had been felt that "either one had a rhythmic sense or one hadn't," and that in the latter case there was nothing to be done about it—chiefly because before Jaques-Dalcroze there had been very little idea what to do. His search for a form of instruction in rhythm that would correspond to the regular training in solfège and harmony led him to a study of bodily rhythm, and of the relations of bodily movement to musical rhythm.

These relations are, of course, fundamental—the origins of rhythm itself having been in these same bodily movements that Dalcroze organized and conventionalized for study purposes. Their historical connection is, of course, no guaranty of their pedagogic efficacy. But the direct advantage of rhythmic movement is that it offers to the novice the sort of active musical experience that he could not otherwise hope to participate in until after years of technical study; and that for the musician it isolates just those problems which his years of technical training have too often entirely failed to teach him.

The number of "finished musicians," for example, who can sustain an even tempo over a considerable period of time is lamentably small; yet there are doubtless few of these same musicians who have any difficulty in walking several blocks at a fairly even gait. Their training has cerebralized their rhythmic faculties to such an extent that they have forgotten that there is any relation between the two activities. To teach them to rediscover that relation, to use the regularities and irregularities of bodily movement as a guide to corresponding regularities and irregularities in music, and to prevent the child or the novice from losing his sense of the identity of bodily and mental rhythm, is one aim of the eurythmics class.

Almost as important—for the adult perhaps even more important—is the freedom from muscular inhibition which the rhythmic gymnastics bring. The difficulty with which the average adult achieves the simplest rhythmic exercises is only less surprising than the speed with which he acquires muscular control and freedom. And it is just the lack of that muscular and nervous freedom which keeps him from the poise and relaxation necessary to truly rhythmic realization of even the simplest music. Take a simple rhythmic problem: the simultaneous division of a given time unit into two and three equal parts. By dint of great effort of the will and considerable muscular and nervous tension, the average piano student stumbles through such passages of three-against-two. But he has never really learned the solution, of course, until he can effect it without any tension or conflict; and his body has been so completely excluded from participation in the solution of rhythmic problems that he does not really know whether the muscles of his wrist or arm or shoulder are relaxed or not. But set him to running the three's and clapping the two's against them and if there is the slightest conflict it will show in a dozen ways—lack of balance, unevenness of steps, tension in the arms—so that his clapping is frenzied and explosive instead of natural and relaxed. Moreover, the amplex of the movements in the eurythmics class is itself an aid toward muscular freedom—as contrasted with the narrow and too often cramped movements at an instrument.

The Dalcroze system began as a musical training, and its musical importance seems to me fundamental—above all for musical novices, both children and adults, as an aid to and foundation for their musical development, either as listeners or as performers. But with its musical advantages it combines important physical benefits. It does not aim directly at an aesthetic result, like the Wigman system; or directly at physical development, like Mensendieck; but for one whose interests are chiefly musical, it offers an exceptional opportunity for development in both the latter directions, simultaneously with and incidental to its musical advantages. It is no more dancing than it is piano-playing, or listening to music; for all three activities the joint participation of mind and body is essential, and to all three Dalcroze work seems to me an important preliminary and aid.

ARTHUR MENDEL

Drama

O'Neill Again

"MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA" continues to fill the Guild Theater, but several readers, less enthusiastic than I, have written to point out various alleged defects which I failed to observe in Mr. O'Neill's play. One, for example, devotes no less than five typewritten pages to complain that "Electra" is "too long." Another, somewhat more consistent, writes as follows: "Mr. Krutch implies that O'Neill lacks only language to make him almost the equal of Shakespeare; Shaw contends that language is Shakespeare's only greatness. Put the two together and what do you get?" You get, of course, a very striking illustration of how wrong Shaw can be.

Still others, failing to remember either Shakespeare or the Greeks, argue that a great play must have an original plot, or that any so-called tragedy which contains much violence must be, of necessity, no more than "mere melodrama." But the commonest complaint seems to be pointed directly at me, since no less than three correspondents have written letters whose burden may be summarized as follows: In "The Modern Temper" you contended that genuine tragedy could not be written today because we had lost the necessary sense of man's intrinsic greatness. Yet you imply that O'Neill's play is genuine tragedy for the reason that it does celebrate just that greatness. You cannot possibly have been right on both occasions, and we wait only to learn which of your words you are now prepared to eat.

The point is a good one, and I am glad to confess that what I wrote about O'Neill was written with the full consciousness of the fact that the point was raised. It is true that one swallow does not make a summer, and it is true also that O'Neill's language weighs him down for the very reason that he is a modern. But I admire his play just because it does come nearer than the work of any other recent dramatist to the spirit of the great tragedies, and I shall admire his next play even more if it proves, by equaling the greatest works of the past, that a modern poet has learned how to reconcile his intellectual comprehension of man with that need to believe him magnificent to which tragedy ministers. I shall still have the personal satisfaction of believing that I was correct in my diagnosis of the difficulty behind the failure of most modern attempts at tragedy, but I shall be very glad to confess that the solution of the difficulty was nearer at hand than I had supposed.

Certainly no reconsideration of "Mourning Becomes Electra" inclines me to believe either that I spoke of it with praise too high, or that the reasons which I gave for my enthusiasm were improperly chosen. I did not call it "better than Shakespeare" or even as good, but the impression which it made is as vivid as it was when I left the theater, and what I remember is still the stature of the persons concerned. Most modern realistic drama endeavors to compensate for the insignificance of its characters by involving them in complications which state some contemporary "problem," or by suggesting that the characters are important because they are so "typical." Most modern attempts to achieve any sort of emotional amplitude depend, on the other hand, upon the effort to reemploy some romantic or pietistic attitude which has become an anachronism. But O'Neill does neither of these things. He deals with no contemporary problem and he does not ask us to accept any standards not universally current. Yet far from making us question the significance of his people, he makes us accept that significance as something self-evident. Their passions move and their fates concern us because the magnitude of the persons has been put beyond question. "What's Hecuba to him or he to Hecuba?" Nothing yet everything, and it is characteristic of the really great works of literature that just that must be said of them. They do not argue concerning the nobility of man or the significance of life. They demonstrate it.

I must add also that I cannot feel the force of the argument raised by those who condemn the play for its psycho-analytical undercurrent. It contains no exposition of any intellectual theory, and if it is understandable in terms of certain hypotheses which have become a part of our mental equipment, I cannot see that there is anything strange or unfortunate in the fact. O'Neill, like Sophocles, is concerned with events which might occur in ancient Greece or in modern New England, but while the motives behind such deeds were quasi-normal in one society they are less so in the other, and the problem is merely the problem of understanding the people who commit them. We understand in terms of current conceptions, and there is no more reason for objecting to the fact that this play implies psychoanalysis than there would be for objecting to Greek tragedy because it implies the Greek religion. An audience must comprehend in the terms with which it is familiar, and the modern audience is familiar with Freudian terms.

No event of the week requires much comment, although "Robin Hood" (Erlanger Theater) is a worthy addition to the light-opera revivals of the Aborn Opera Company. "East of Broadway" (Belmont Theater) is a comedy-drama of Jewish life with some amusing moments, but is intended for only a very naive audience.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

—GEORGE— WASHINGTON

by
LOUIS M. SEARS, Ph.D.

The real Washington has been rescued from a maze of conflicting opinion.

576 pages
Portrait—Maps
$5.00

So closely based on Washington's own writings as to be almost an autobiography.

from CROWELL'S List of Good Books

Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 393 Fourth Ave., New York

The Birth of the GERMAN REPUBLIC

By ARTHUR ROSENBERG

Translated by Ian Morrow

The essential background for an understanding of the present situation. "... the most impressive and best coordinated work on the subject that has so far appeared in Germany... evidence from documents and witnesses at first hand."—New York Times. $4.75

GERMANY

The Spirit of BRITISH POLICY and the Myth of the Encirclement of GERMANY

By HERMAN KANTOROWICZ

Translated by W. H. Johnston. Preface by Gilbert Murray

A German exposes the sources of the myth of Germany's encirclement by England. "... casts a flood of light... His work is as valuable in relation to post-war as to pre-war Germany."—News Chronicle (London). $6.50

ENGLAND and the International Policy of the European Great Powers, 1871-1914

By A. E. Pribram

An Austrian view of Anglo-German relations, based on the State Archives in Vienna. $3.00

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Films

Propaganda

SINCE the American movie can seldom be accused of carrying propaganda for anything more civilized than the ambition to be rich, "The Man I Killed" (Criterion Theater) is important and refreshing. The theme of Ernst Lubitsch's latest work is the lumbering cruelty and blind stupidity, on an enormous scale, of war in relation to its human victims, who wish most of all to go on living and to experience the ordinary satisfactions of life. The picture that Lubitsch creates of the little German town after the war and of the people who live in it is completely real and very moving. The character that Lionel Barrymore brings to life, of the father grieving for the death of his only son, is unforgettable—in only two or three minor scenes is he betrayed into that lack of restraint that often mars his really fine acting. Nancy Carroll handles a rather quiet role with competence. Phillips Holmes, in my opinion, weakens the force of the story. He plays the part of the young Frenchman whose conscience will not let him rest, who finally hits upon the solution of seeking out the parents of the man he killed and confessing his crime, only to find that it is impossible to shatter their pathetic joy in their mistaken conclusion that he is the friend and not the murderer of the dead son. More because of his physical appearance than by any deliberate acting, Holmes gives throughout the impression of a weak boy gone neurotic. A normal person unnerved by the insanity of war would have been just as believable and much more effective from the pacifist point of view which informs the picture.

It need hardly be pointed out that the plot of "The Man I Killed" is far-fetched. Also, it has the synthetic quality which distinguishes propaganda from art. Nevertheless, it is effective, as a poster is effective.

The strength of Lubitsch as a director lies in his talent for significant detail which brings his characters and his settings to life. The meeting of the two mothers in the cemetery is an excellent example of his art. His weakness is a lack of restraint in piling up detail to the point of submerging both effect and character. Throughout the present picture he bears down too heavily on every ironic or pathetic touch. In the restaurant scene, for instance, the father, who finds his old friends cool because he has been entertaining a Frenchman in his home, launches into a peroration in which he demonstrates that it is the fathers and not the French who are the real murderers of their sons. It is an excellent speech, but it is rendered superfluous and stagy by the scene which immediately follows it. Outside the restaurant, the father hears, in memory, the passing feet of his son's regiment. In tones of heartbroken bitterness he says, "My son was marching to his death—and I cheered."

The other important film event to be noted is also propaganda, less artistically handled. "The Road to Life" (Cameo Theater), the first Russian talking film, is, like most Russian pictures, an educational tract, but it is not up to the standard of its predecessors. The photography is very uneven. Like the plot, it shifts from melodramatic blacks and whites to the subtler shades of realism and back again at the sacrifice of coherence and unity. The sequence of the stolen spoons is real; the building of a railroad by a crowd of former wild boys with the help of no visible engineer is not convincing. As for the Russian dialogue, it sounds as if it were a great deal more subtle and humorous than Michael Gold's acutely class-conscious captions in English would indicate. The acting is adequate but not exceptional. Despite all these handicaps, however, the picture is very much worth seeing, if only for that quality of eager and fresh life that pours into and out of every activity that new Russia engages in.

MARGARET MARSHALL

HUNGER AND LOVE

A novel by Lionel Britton

Introduction by Bertrand Russell

BERTRAND RUSSELL, BERNARD SHAW, ARNOLD BENNETT, LAURENCE STALLINGS and UPTON SINCLAIR are a few of those who praise this novel extravagantly.

UPTON SINCLAIR avers: It is the thing I have been waiting for some twenty-five years—that is to say a really great book by a proletarian writer of the new generation in Great Britain . . . This book is great in the fullest sense of the much abused word. It has the divine rage of genius; it has the revolutionary fire and, at the same time, a world-embracing grasp.

This novel, the story of Arthur Phelps' attempt to gain a mind, has set England agog; it is now in its third printing there. The present publishers, who acquired the rights to this novel from Harper and Brothers, have reissued it at $3.00 instead of $4.00. They are convinced that HUNGER AND LOVE is destined to take its place with the great literature of all time.

623 pages

$3.00 in bookstores

THE VANGUARD PRESS 100 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

BOARDING SCHOOL—GERMANY

One of the best German boarding schools for boys, located on a lake near Munich, with excellent teachers and a distinguished clientele, will make room for a few American boys, preferably with some knowledge of German. Highly indorsed by the Editor of "The Nation," to whom all inquiries should be addressed.

Contributors to This Issue

T. A. BISSEON is a member of the research staff of the Foreign Policy Association.

UPTON CLOSE, author and lecturer, has spent many years in China and Japan.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

W. E. WOODWARD is the author of "George Washington—the Image and the Man" and "Meet General Grant."

WILLIAM M. LEISERSON is professor of economics at Antioch College.

HORACE GREGORY, author of a book of verse, "Chelsea Rooming House," has recently published a translation of Catullus.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN has written a book on the James family to be published next fall.

FRANCES FROST is the author of a book of verse, "Blue Harvest."

CLIFTON FADIMAN is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

ABRAHAM FLEXNER is director of the Institute for Advanced Study, and author of "Universities: American, English, and German."

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON, who was closely connected with the dadaist and superrealist movements in France during their early days, is the author of "Jean Jacques Rousseau."

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1932

No. 3477

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	213
EDITORIALS:
Great Expectations	216
Open War in China	217
Who Wants to Disarm?	217
Mass Production	218
IF THE SOVIET SHOULD FALL. By Louis Fischer	219
IS FRANCE BACKING JAPAN? By Robert Dell	221
THE WORKERS DEMAND— By Felix Morrow	222
COURT REFORM—A JOB FOR LAYMEN. By I. Maurice Wormser	224
GOVERNMENT BY ORDINANCE IN INDIA. By A. Fenner Brockway	226
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	227
CORRESPONDENCE	228
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	229
FINANCE: WHY COMMODITY PRICES SLUMP. By S. Palmer Harman	230
BOOKS, ART, DRAMA:
So Long It Has for Echoing. By Eda Lou Walton	231
A Philosophy for Carnivores. By Henry Hazlitt	231
Travel Disappoints. By Henry Bamford Parkes	232
Cabell New and Old. By John Macy	232
How Utilities "Educate." By Amos Pinchot	233
Strange Interlude. By Arthur Warner	234
Books in Brief	234
Art: Conversation with a Surréaliste . By Paul Rosenfeld	236
Drama: Cleopatra's Nose. By Joseph Wood Krutch	238
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Liberty in the Irish Free State. By Robert Reinhart	239

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN FRED A. KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Mrs. Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE APPOINTMENT of Benjamin N. Cardozo to the vacancy on the Supreme Court caused by the resignation of Justice Holmes is the best news out of Washington in years. Of Justice Cardozo's fitness for the place it is not necessary to speak; he will bring as much honor to the Supreme Bench as will be added to him by the appointment. It is clear that while strong pressure must have been brought on the President to name a man who was in every possible way outstanding, equally strong representations must have been made by the West and the South for a local candidate in the fear of overbalancing the court by justices from New York. Mr. Hoover chose the handsomer course and he will deserve the gratitude of millions of his fellow-citizens therefor. Nor does it lessen the thanks that will be his due to add that he could hardly have made a happier political gesture. His critics will be speechless; his champions will be more enthusiastic than ever. But criticism silenced in as good a cause is altogether fortunate. The President, the new Supreme Court Justice, and the people of the United States should receive general congratulations all around.

WE HAVE already indicated our belief that the Administration is not likely to succeed in getting present hoarded money back into "sound banks" and "sound securities" by its present ballyhoo methods. It has already been embarrassed by Congressman La Guardia's request that it tell the money hoarders just which particular banks and securities are sound. (Not to speak of the difficulty, mentioned by F. P. A. in the Conning Tower, of finding money to deposit after the first bank which held one's funds has failed.) One positive measure it could take would be to remove the present limit of $2,500 on Postal Savings accounts, and so provide additional refuge for many present frightened holders of money. This is a step that could be taken immediately. Later it may be advisable for the Administration to consider the more thoroughgoing recommendations made in the program of the League for Independent Political Action. These included the removal of the Postal Savings system from the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department, the setting up of a government-owned banking corporation to manage it, and the establishment of separate savings banks in important centers.

AGAIN THE BLOODTHIRSTY Soviets have walked out far in advance of the rest of the world in the way to peace. M. Litvinov, presenting at Geneva the proposals of the Soviet delegation on disarmament, ended nearly all of his telling paragraphs with the remark that the only way to avoid war was to disarm completely. This was, of course, merely a repetition of the proposals made by Soviet Russia at earlier conferences; this time, one may note, it was not greeted with the abuse that welcomed it before. However, although the plans of France, Great Britain, and the United States, unsatisfactory as they were, appeared on the first page of the New York Times, M. Litvinov was relegated to page 4. An offer to disarm is evidently not news. Soviet Russia not only proposed total disarmament as the only way to peace, but offered to agree to every possible intermediate proposal for partial limitation that any other country might advance. In M. Litvinov's speech occurred another point worth remarking. It must be clear to all, he said, that "the Soviet requires neither increase of territory nor interference in the affairs of other nations to achieve its aim." By means of the Five-Year Plan, with its "colossal achievements in every sphere of economic life," by a furious and passionate zeal for industrial progress, the Russians have found the "moral equivalent for war." They can disarm because they have better things to do than fight.

THE ASSASSINATION of Junnosuke Inouye, former Finance Minister of Japan, has strengthened the hands of the Japanese militarists. By the same token his death is a serious blow to the hopes of that small group of public men in Japan who wanted the country to pursue peaceful methods in Manchuria and Shanghai. This group was led by three men: Premier Hamaguchi, who was assassinated last August; Inouye, who has fallen by the same foul means; and Baron Shidehara, former Foreign Minister, who, despite his illness, is continuing the struggle virtually alone. These men were frankly imperialists; they believed in the colonization policy of Japan, and doubtless recognized the dangers involved in following that policy. But they sought at all times, primarily by attempting to restrain the militarists, to prevent Japanese penetration of the Asiatic mainland from taking the form of military aggression. It seemed probable that the Minseito Party, to which these three men belonged, would carry the national elections late in February. Had they been victorious it was intended that Inouye should assume the premiership. But Inouye is dead, and it is now a question whether the Minseito liberals or the conservatives and militarists will win the election. The police are satisfied that Inouye's assassin acted upon his own initiative and was not connected with any of the militarist or superpatriotic societies. Nevertheless, the responsibility can be indirectly traced to the militarists, for their propaganda, with which the Japanese press has been filled since last June, has been sufficient to turn great masses of the Japanese people not only against the Chinese, but also against the liberals and moderates at home.

HOW FAR into the interior of China will the Japanese carry their present drive? Japanese diplomats suggest that they would be content to have the Chinese retire a minimum of twenty miles from Shanghai. But the Japanese commanders have established no such limit. Lieutenant General Kenkichi Uyeda declared that the farther the Chinese retired the better it would be for everyone concerned. Admiral Nomura was more specific. He said:

Our function is to drive the hostile Chinese armies far enough away from Shanghai so that they will no longer be a menace. I can say that the exact distance for this is dependent upon the character of the Chinese armament and means of transportation. In areas where railways and highways are non-existent it would be ample to eject them just beyond the range of their most powerful artillery, but where railways and highways exist the distances may be greater, depending upon their supplies, trucks, automobiles, and rolling stock.

This does not look as though the militarists would be satisfied with a twenty-mile neutral zone around Shanghai. Rather does it appear as though they intend to take over all means of transportation far up the Yangtze valley, dislodging the Chinese troops from their positions along the river and along the railways in this area, for how otherwise can the Japanese ever feel certain that they are safely removed from the menace of the terribly aggressive Chinese?

TWO JUDGES have recently been nominated by President Hoover for appointments on the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. One is James H. Wilkerson of Chicago. Donald R. Richberg, as general counsel for the Railway Labor Executives' Association, has this to say, among other equally arresting remarks, of Judge Wilkerson's fitness for the position:

In the Daugherty injunction case of 1922 he attempted to enjoin legitimate activities of labor unions in carrying on a lawful strike and he violated the express prohibitions of the Clayton Act. He set aside the constitutional guaranties of liberty of contract and free speech. He attempted to extend the authority of a single District Court throughout the United States. . . . He permitted his court to be used to prevent the settlement of the shopmen's strike. . . . He wrote bitterly partisan opinions in this case, branding as criminal conspirators labor leaders of unblemished reputations, although the government admitted that it had been unable . . . to produce any evidence connecting a single one of these leaders with any unlawful act.

Mr. Hoover's other appointee is Judge Kenneth Mackintosh of Seattle. Judge Mackintosh, too, has a record which organized labor would do well to protest. When sitting on the Supreme Court of the State of Washington he rendered the following opinion on picketing:

This Court has declared all picketing unlawful, announcing that the term sometimes used of "peaceful picketing" is self-contradictory and meaningless, that picketing, in and of itself, is coercive and that is its purpose and effect.

Aside from the fact that the late Chief Justice Taft rendered an opinion that picketing was lawful in the American Foundries vs. Tri-Cities Council case, thereby offering disagreement with Judge Mackintosh from the highest court in the country, it seems plain that neither Judge Wilkerson nor Judge Mackintosh, because of obvious bias and prejudice, is fitted to be seated on the bench of any court which will hear labor cases. It is a sad commentary on the strength of the labor movement in the United States that confirmation of these appointments seems all too likely. Yet while there is still time, every possible protest should be made, if not by labor itself then by the advocates of civil liberties and the right to organize.

AN INTERESTING BY-PRODUCT of Great Britain's new tariff enthusiasm and "Buy-British" campaign is the break that those in power have made with all expert opinion. Ferdinand Kuhn, Jr., in a dispatch to the New York Times, points out that nearly every British economist of repute is now opposing the new tariff policy. Sir Walter Layton, Britain's delegate on the Basel Advisory Committee, has remarked that Britain is making "an unrepentant plunge—sword in hand—in the midst of a tariff battle which is fast bringing the world to bankruptcy." Henry Clay, economic adviser to the Bank of England, has predicted that the new tariff will not help to restore Britain's balance of trade in the slightest. Francis W. Hirst and Professor T. E. Gregory have ranged themselves unreservedly against the new tariff, and J. M. Keynes, who had advocated a small revenue or emergency tariff before Britain went off the gold standard, has since declared that with the collapse of sterling the justification for a tariff has vanished. To all this the British Government turns a deaf ear, just as Mr. Hoover did to the protest against the Hawley-Smoot tariff signed by practically every economist of note in the United States.

WAR IN KENTUCKY is no less important to us than war in China. Indeed, the civil warfare now in progress in the mining sections of that State may have far more serious consequences. The Kentucky authorities are fighting with every weapon they can command, but their favorite weapons have been hunger and suppression of civil liberties. In The Nation of January 13 we discussed the case of Harry Appleman, Kentucky grocer, who was arrested on a charge of criminal syndicalism after he and his wife had spent their savings on a carload of flour which they distributed to the miners' families. More recently county officials have stopped the distribution of all food supplies and clothing sent to Kentucky from outside the State. When a committee of New York writers, including Waldo Frank, Mary Heaton Vorse, Edmund Wilson, and others, brought several truckloads of food into the State they were arrested on charges of disorderly conduct. After their release they were escorted to the State boundary, where two of their number were beaten up. As these lines are written, word comes that two National Guard companies have been sent to the mining country to suppress a meeting of the National Miners' Union, the only group that has sought to help the pit workers form an effective organization for their struggle against starvation wages and impossible working conditions. Kentucky's only answer to the pleas of these men for food and justice is to supplement the tyranny of the local authorities with a show of military force.

SOCIALIST MILWAUKEE is not alone in enjoying efficient municipal government. Cincinnati, which has a city manager, also did well in 1931. It was able to reduce its bonded debt by the sum of $1,193,719, and to cut its tax rate to $9.10 per thousand dollars, the lowest tax rate of any American city with a population of 300,000 or more. By abolishing politics from the municipal administration a saving of $26,000 was effected in the Public Works Department, while the saving in the Water Works Department ran to more than $75,000. As a result of these economies a new schedule of water rates has been adopted which will reduce the water bill of the consumers by approximately $300,000 annually. Major reductions were made in the appropriations for other departments which probably would have been impossible had not the City Manager, C. A. Dykstra, been unhampered by politics. Despite these economies, Cincinnati expanded its public-works program during 1931 and thus provided extra jobs for many of the city's unemployed; moreover, it spent more than $770,000 on direct unemployment relief. Of this latter amount $678,000 came from city departments which, as a result of their increased efficiency and through close economizing, managed to save that much out of their annual appropriations. This is doubtless a source of satisfaction to the citizens of Cincinnati, but to the residents of almost any other city in the country it is a sad, sad story.

THE CONVICTION FOR MURDER of one Vincent Mummiani was reversed on February 9 by the New York State Court of Appeals on the ground that the prisoner had been subjected to the third degree. Commissioner Mulrooney's comment on this is an indignant denial that Mummiani was beaten and starved into making a confession, as the defense alleges, and an announcement that hereafter an "outside" physician will be called in to examine every person held for a major crime. Just how disinterested Mr. Mulrooney's "outsider" will be remains a question; if he searched far enough the Commissioner might succeed in finding a physician who would attest that a bruised prisoner had received his contusions by falling downstairs in his eagerness to consult with the nice, kind policemen. But this is hardly the point. Mental torture leaves no traces on suffering flesh; sleeplessness, hunger, thirst, even the rubber hose expertly applied are not evidenced by black-and-blue spots on the human hide. Commissioner Mulrooney would do better to save his indignation, to put aside his plans to spare his policemen from unkind accusations of brutality, and to remember the law which provides for "prompt production of a suspect before a magistrate." Here, as pointed out by Zechariah Chafee, Jr., in the Atlantic Monthly, is the first and simplest way of avoiding charges of having administered the third degree. This device of merely obeying the law would be far more reassuring to a cynical public largely convinced of the prevalence of rubber-hose methods in the police station than any number of protestations about the steaks and the coffee and rolls furnished by obliging policemen to unfortunate prisoners, who are not, it seems, properly grateful.

WHILE THE SENATE is haggling over the question of federal aid for the hungry, the Connery Old Age Pension Bill has been unanimously reported out of committee in the House. This bill provides for a federal appropriation of $10,000,000 to be apportioned among the States to make up one-third of the fund; the States are to supply the remaining two-thirds. That the bill should be passed is obvious; that it is niggardly is equally plain. Persons to be aided must be sixty-five years of age, must not possess property in excess of $5,000, and must be without other means of support; in addition, while the amount of the pension is not fixed by the bill, no sum in excess of $1 a day is discussed in it. With this princely sum the forthright champions of rugged individualism will reward the aged and destitute citizens of the Republic. It is estimated that there are 6,600,000 persons in the country sixty-five years of age or over, and that of these a third are in need of an old-age pension. At a dollar a day, to pension them would require $800,000,000. The government's $10,000,000, therefore, even augmented by the $20,000,000 from the States, seems a modest enough sum to ask. The measure has been valiantly pushed by the American Association for Old Age Security, the need for it was surely never greater, and every person who has reached or who hopes to reach the age of sixty-five should be its champion.

THE THREAT OF EXTINCTION to the Police Gazette, which missed an issue for the first time in eighty-five years and may never appear again, will cause pain in many a manly breast. Gone are the days when it appeared in every barber-shop in town; gone, also, are the days when its ladies in tights were not to be viewed by one's maiden aunt. But the sentimental attachment to its bright pink pages is strong. A thousand barber-shops in New York still subscribe to it; every army post receives its copy; and the chaplain at Fort Leavenworth is on the list of subscribers. There will be mourners enough for its passing, even though one barber on Second Avenue declared that customers now are in too much of a hurry to read it. "They don't sit around to hear you play the guitar or sing songs like they did when my father ran the shop." Another proof that the good old days of leisure are gone. Today we shave hurriedly with a safety razor, gulp breakfast, and dash for the subway. If we read, we read the tabloids or the New Yorker, wherein, be it noted, ladies in tights—or ladies without tights—abound. Indeed, not the lack of leisure but too much competition probably proved the undoing of the Police Gazette. Readers with only two cents can get all the spicy reading about morals or murders they want in the Daily Scab; readers who will invest three-fifths of a quarter can buy louder, funnier, and smarter pictures and comments in brighter-colored magazines.

Great Expectations

THE jubilation which followed the proposal of the Glass-Steagall bill, under the impression, held for example by Senator Vandenberg, that "this bill means more money," and that "its effect will be to bring the price of the dollar down and the commodity price index up," is likely to be considerably modified when the real purpose and probable effect of the measure are better understood. What the measure proposes immediately is an extension of the rediscount privileges of the Federal Reserve banks, and it provides also for the possible issue of Federal Reserve notes against the collateral of government obligations. The measure is regarded by its chief sponsors as a purely emergency one; the increased rediscounting and note-issuing privileges it extends are to expire at the end of one year from the passage of the act.

The purpose of the Glass-Steagall bill is clear enough when the present situation and the present rediscounting and note-issuing arrangements are understood. Within the last year there has been a steady demand throughout the country for more hand-to-hand currency. This has developed for two main reasons. The failure of more than 2,500 banks, with deposits of nearly $2,000,000,000, since the beginning of 1931, leaving hundreds of communities without banking accommodation of any kind, has compelled the population of those communities to carry on business in cash instead of by check. But it has also undermined confidence in banks, and led to withdrawals of cash or failure to make fresh deposits. This in turn has driven the banks to borrow against—"rediscount"—part of their holdings of commercial paper at the Federal Reserve banks, and to secure Federal Reserve notes for them to meet the demands of their own depositors. The result has been that though price levels and business activity have steadily fallen in the last twelve months, the volume of Federal Reserve notes has increased more than $1,000,000,000. But even this increase does not mean that the situation has been met adequately. For the banks that were compelled to come to the Federal Reserve for more currency could do so only if they held "eligible" paper, that is to say, merchants' notes with (except for agricultural paper, which may run longer) a maturity of three months or less. When their holdings of such eligible paper were exhausted, they could no longer continue to borrow and to draw currency from the Federal Reserve banks, even though they held other sound assets. The Glass-Steagall bill attempts to meet this situation by permitting any group of five or more independently controlled banks to borrow against their joint promissory note—upon receiving the consent of not fewer than six members of the Federal Reserve Board—and it permits any individual bank, with $500,000 capital or less, under similar circumstances, to borrow against its promissory note for a period of not more than one year after the passage of the act. The notes in each case must be secured by satisfactory collateral, which presumably will include long-term obligations, but no loans of this sort are to be made unless the banks concerned have no further ordinarily "eligible" paper available; and all such loans are to bear an interest rate at least 1 per cent higher than the prevailing rediscount rate. Finally, at any time within the twelve months' period, should the Federal Reserve Board deem it in the public interest, it may, upon a majority vote, authorize the Federal Reserve banks to issue currency against the collateral of direct United States Government obligations.

In speculating upon the probable effect of the measure it is necessary to distinguish between the more liberal borrowing provisions and the new currency provisions. To permit banks to borrow against their promissory notes is a sound emergency measure, particularly when it is safeguarded by penalty rates. The chief criticism to be made of it in its present form is that it does not go far enough to be as effective as it might be. There is no sound reason why the privilege should be limited to banks with less than $500,000 capital, as an amendment, inserted after the original bill was published, provides. The purpose of the measure is not to help this or that particular little deserving bank, but general confidence, and this purpose can be achieved even more by providing help for large banks than for small ones. Another pointless restriction—inspired mainly by political prejudices—is that prohibiting foreign obligations to serve as part of the collateral against any of these emergency loans.

The currency provisions are more questionable. The main object in a time of crisis is to keep banks liquid; and when increased currency is permitted, it should not be for its own sake, but merely to achieve the end of bank liquidity. Any currency issued as a result of borrowing by the member banks, and secured by sound assets, is a good currency; and in a time of crisis these assets may justifiably be less liquid than in ordinary times. But the issuance of Federal Reserve notes against government obligations can easily be subjected to abuses; the Federal Reserve banks can and do buy government obligations in the open market on their own initiative, and if they should deliberately pursue a cheap-money policy, as they have in the past, they might issue such currency unwisely. The provision, nevertheless, may be useful as a weapon against any foreign government or bank that might suddenly begin withdrawing gold from our market. In that case the Federal Reserve Board could prevent a restriction of credit by authorizing the government-bond-secured currency to take the place of the gold withdrawn.

In sum, the measure will permit a greater expansion of the Federal Reserve currency than could otherwise take place, to meet the extraordinary demand caused by bank failures and hoarding; it will make the position of the member banks in the Federal Reserve system potentially more liquid, so that they will be somewhat more free to extend credit against sound assets than they have been. But two apparently widespread illusions ought to be dispelled. The new measure may reduce the number of bank failures, but it will not, as some sanguine supporters have asserted, put a stop to them; and unless it is very gravely abused it will not "raise prices" through "inflation." It will supplement the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but it will be of no direct aid to non-member banks, in which by far the greater number of failures has occurred. x

Open War in China

A STATE of war exists in Shanghai and the lower Yangtze valley. This can no longer be disputed by those experts on international law who are forever splitting hairs over the definition of war. The Japanese invasion of Shanghai has gone beyond mere "protection of the lives and property of Japanese nationals"; it has gone beyond that form of "reprisal" which international law allows stronger Powers to take against weaker nations whenever the spirit moves them. That the fighting in the Shanghai area actually constitutes war, despite the absence of formal declarations, is openly recognized by the special committee of the League of Nations which has been inquiring into the Shanghai situation. It is, moreover, tacitly acknowledged by the Japanese themselves, and by the other Powers. The United States went to war with Germany on the strength of a Congressional resolution which, strictly speaking, was not a formal declaration of war, but simply a declaration that a state of war with Germany existed. The Russo-Japanese war in 1904 was also begun with a surprise attack by the Japanese without a formal declaration.

Notwithstanding their public utterances the Japanese are not deceiving themselves as to the actual meaning of their activities at Shanghai. They intend to carry their operation in the Yangtze valley through to successful conclusion. To this end they are massing a formidable army in China. This force is not limited to the ten or twenty thousand men which Tokio has at various times hinted it might send to Shanghai, only to deny later that it was considering dispatching any reinforcements. But now, according to foreign military observers on the scene, the Japanese have actually landed 35,000 men, and there is no telling how many more may be on the way. It is recalled that when the Allied Powers intervened in Siberia in 1918, it was agreed that Japan should send in 10,000 of its troops and no more. Some months later Tokio asked permission to increase its quota to 12,000. This aroused the suspicion of Major General William S. Graves, the American commander, who investigated and found that there were not 10,000, nor even 12,000, Japanese soldiers stationed in Siberia, but 72,000.

As a matter of diplomatic technique it probably would be unwise for the other foreign Powers openly to announce that they consider a state of war to exist in Shanghai. They are nevertheless proceeding on that assumption and are insisting upon full observance of their rights as neutrals. What action they will take now that the Japanese have violated those rights remains to be seen. The International Settlement is to all intents and purposes foreign territory under the protection of certain Powers. Thus it is neutral territory. The representatives of the Powers and the authorities of the Settlement have announced that they mean to defend the area against invasion, and that they also intend to prevent its being used by the Japanese as a base of operations against the Chinese, for such use would be tantamount to a breach of the Settlement's neutrality. To this the Japanese agreed only a week ago, definitely promising the British Consul General, J. F. Brennan, that they would land no more troops in the Settlement. Nevertheless, this promise, solemnly given, was deliberately broken when the latest reinforcements arrived from Japan.

Throughout the action in the Shanghai district the Japanese have time and again ignored their promises and have upon several occasions disregarded the rights of other Powers. The League committee that has been studying the Shanghai question found that while it is still not clear which side started the fighting, "the offensive is entirely in the hands of the Japanese." The committee added that soon after the fighting began the Japanese initiated a reign of terror. But it should not be difficult to determine the aggressor in this affair. It was the Japanese who sent a naval force to Shanghai—a provocative act, if not legally an act of aggression—and it is the Japanese who are now sending an army into China, and who are, according to the League's investigators, carrying on offensive warfare. We certainly do not want this war continued; we want it stopped at once; but we nevertheless must recognize that a state of war exists, and that Japan began that war. Frank acknowledgment of that fact at Geneva and elsewhere would do much to clear the air and make the Japanese realize the seriousness of their position. Not even they could be foolhardy enough to brave the firmly and frankly expressed censure of the whole rest of the world.

Who Wants to Disarm?

AT Geneva are gathered the representatives of virtually all the nations of the world. They have come together for the avowed purpose of working out a program for reducing national armaments. It is clear that the peoples of all countries want actual, sincere disarmament. It is not so clear that their representatives in Geneva have any such desire. True, they say that they want to reduce armaments, and they know that their people want this done, but no delegation except that of Soviet Russia has yet offered a concrete suggestion that would help bring this about. The hypocritical proposals of France we have already discussed. France has been denounced ever since the war as a militaristic country. The French now wish to get out from under this censure, not by reducing armaments, but by sharing with the rest of the world the responsibility for maintaining a huge war machine. The British, taking issue with the French on the question of a League of Nations army, have nothing practical to offer in its place. Sir John Simon, the British Foreign Secretary, wants to discuss the entire question on the basis of the draft convention which several preliminary conferences labored over and never got completed. He would support "the establishment of a permanent disarmament commission," abolish gas and chemical warfare, and "press for the abolition of submarines." The Soviet delegation has reiterated its plea for complete abolition of all arms and armies, but if any other delegation is planning to support this proposal, the fact has not yet been made public.

Germany, of course, is in no position to lay down the law to the other Powers, to say that this or that plan will lead to actual disarmament. But the Germans have public law and, if there is such a thing, international morality on their side. The Allied and Associated Powers at Versailles twice promised Germany, once in a note to the German delegation and later in the League Covenant, that its own involuntary disarmament would be followed by a reduction of the military forces of other countries. Chancellor Brüning has now called upon the world to redeem this pledge. He told the Geneva conference that Germany wants "a general disarmament which would be put into effect for all nations according to the same principles and which would create an equal measure of security for all peoples." But beyond this generality the German Chancellor has had nothing specific to offer.

Ambassador Gibson, acting chairman of the American delegation, presented what was, next to the French proposal, the most definite and detailed program the disarmament conference has yet heard. The American program has nine points. It supports the British thesis that we already have sufficient peace machinery and that this machinery should now be made secure by reducing armaments. It denies the contention of André Tardieu and the French that world peace must first "be organized." But examined closely, what is there of real value in the American program? Nothing whatever. The first point suggests the willingness of the American delegation to discuss disarmament. The second expresses the hope that France and Italy will forget their differences and accept the London naval treaty. The third recommends indefinite further cuts in naval forces, if France and Italy can come to an agreement. The fourth, fifth, sixth, and eighth points would abolish submarines, protect civilians from aerial bombardments, abolish gas and bacteriological warfare, and place special restrictions on tanks and heavy mobile guns. The seventh, referring to something called "the computation of the number of armed forces on the basis of the effectives necessary for the maintenance of internal order plus some suitable contingent for defense," is unintelligible. The ninth point merely presents another excuse for postponing acceptance of budgetary limitation of armaments.

Where in this whole detailed program is there to be found the slightest hope of real disarmament? Naturally, great naval Powers like the United States and England want to abolish submarines, which are the only defense small countries have against the big fleets of their more fortunate neighbors. And how are civilians to be protected from aerial bombardments? Unhappily, Mr. Gibson does not say. Nor does he mention the fact that the United States has already signed two treaties looking toward the abolition of gas and chemical warfare, neither of which has been ratified by the Senate, though both have been before that body for from seven to ten years. In short, the American program, as the New York World-Telegram has pointed out, is "only another plan to make war pretty, which can't be done."

Starting with nothing, the Geneva conference will now proceed to discuss this nothing for several months. What it will wind up with cannot be foretold. Why has not some delegation besides the Soviet group, which will not be taken seriously, mustered up courage enough to come forward with a plan to slash all armaments 25 per cent, or 50 per cent, or to abolish them entirely? The question remains, Do the people gathered at Geneva today really want disarmament?

Mass Production

EDGAR WALLACE has just died of pneumonia in Hollywood. The news is news to far more people than would note the passing of almost any other contemporary author, and as one reads the obituary notices in the New York Times one is struck by the fact that the story of his life is interesting in much the same way as is one of his innumerable novels or plays. It is, to be sure, almost as improbable, but—and this is even more important—its values lie so close to the surface that there is nothing to say about them. Critics were not inclined to talk about his books because it is not necessary to explain why injured innocence or wily crime is exciting, and it would be the most gratuitous sort of lily-painting to attempt to point out the picturesqueness of his career for the simple and similar reason that it includes almost everything which could appeal to the popular imagination.

He was, to begin with, not only poor and an orphan but actually a waif, and when at the age of nine days he got himself adopted, he was careful to choose as foster-father a man who followed that most notorious of humble callings, fishmonging. Of course he sold papers; of course he enlisted for the Boer War; and then, by one of those sudden transitions which biographers never explain because only the inexplicable element of outstanding talent can account for them, he next appears earning $3,000 a year as a war correspondent. About twenty years ago he gave up active newspaper work for what another would have called "leisure to write," and became the most popular as well as the most prolific author of detective stories. He is said to have worked from twelve to twenty-one hours a day, and with the aid of a dictaphone he composed some 140 novels, besides innumerable plays and more newspaper articles than he could remember.

The legend of his prolificness pleased the popular imagination, but here again it was apparently impossible for the fiction to surpass the fact. He once did a 36,000-word article in a day, two plays in four days each, and on another occasion, which even he regarded as somewhat unusual, he found twenty-four hours sufficient in which to write two short stories and a racing article, attend a full rehearsal of a play, and make a speech at lunch. In three years he wrote twenty plays, six of which were enjoying successful runs at the same time in London; and another year's industry produced twenty books, eight plays, three hundred columns of theatrical criticism, three hundred columns of racing news, thirty magazine articles, and a few "odds and ends."

Apparently Wallace was amiable, modest, and unpretentious, but there is no use in attributing to him qualities which he did not possess, or of assuming that because King George admired his work it had any merits beyond fluency and a kind of gusto which routine did not seem to destroy. The very fact that he could turn out so much which was up to the required standard is enough to prove that the standard was not very high, and it would not be unjust to apply to him one of Dr. Johnson's most famous remarks. A tree, he said, might produce nothing but crabs; but if it produced a great many of them, then it was a very good crab tree.

If the Soviet Should Fall

By LOUIS FISCHER

Berlin, January 10

THE Soviet Union is making uninterrupted economic progress. The rate of its industrial construction, I believe, was unequaled either in the United States during the great expansion westward or by England during its industrial revolution. But both America and Britain have built quickly and well at various stages of their development. So have Germany and Japan. There have been times when these countries, like Russia today, had no unemployment. Rapid industrial growth is not peculiar to a Socialist state.

The Five-Year Plan, to be sure, has demonstrated that communism is capable of construction as well as destruction. Moreover, time is a decisive factor in all human events, and the fact that the period of tremendous Soviet economic up-building coincides with years of crisis, financial collapse, universal unemployment, and mass psychological depression in bourgeois states throws Russia's achievements into sharp relief. Before the Soviet Government can be credited with any unique distinction, it is necessary, however, to show that the idea and execution of the Five-Year Plan differ basically and qualitatively from industrialization processes which have preceded it in capitalist countries.

In the youth of capitalist countries—as in their adult life of course—individualism ran amuck. Victory was to the strong. The early history of many great American trusts is a record of crimes illustrated with the tombstones of those who fell that a few might succeed. This initial period has put its stamp on the national psychology. The powers that be in the economic world glory in individualism because it was the ladder by which they climbed to success. By that token, individualism is a weapon for the suppression of the weak.

Russia is being built up by collective effort, and human nature is shaping itself to conform to this concrete, irresistible circumstance. In its pioneering stage, when the character of its people is being molded, the political and economic system of the U. S. S. R. sternly represses any tendencies toward personal enrichment and property ownership. The men who find highest praise in Soviet society are those who do least for themselves and most for the masses. A generation is growing up which sets no store by individual wealth and even regards possessions as "bourgeois." Bolshevism permits of savings, of bond investments, of interest payments. One Russian may be richer than another. Money, however, can bring comfort or luxury in Soviet Russia, but never power. No citizen can use his funds to build factories or houses. The wealth of the individual, in other words, is not capital. (It is only an article of consumption.)

Some time ago in Moscow I attended a conference of the managers of all the gigantic construction projects which the Soviet Government had undertaken in accordance with the Five-Year Plan. The director of Magnitogorsk was there, the biggest steel town in the world; of Dnieperstroï, the biggest dam in the world; of the Nizhni Novgorod automobile works, and so on. After the proceedings they came up to introduce themselves to me. The Russian introduces himself by stating his name. But these directors, instead of extending their hands and saying "Dybets," or "Ivanov," or "Sidorov," said "Autostroi," "Dnieperstroï," "Magnitogorsk." They had merged and identified themselves with their jobs.

Does the collectivist, unindividualistic method of sovietism slacken the rate of economic progress? Are incentive and initiative eliminated? Stalin's compensation, of course, is not the salary of 300 rubles which he receives monthly. Nor do most prominent and rank-and-file Communists work endless hours for the miserable wage they earn. They are impelled to self-sacrifice and an enormous expenditure of energy by the will to succeed of the whole movement, by faith in the wisdom and advantages of their policies, and by the satisfaction of participating in the fulfilment of a life's ideal. In varying degree this same spirit filters down into millions of workers, but for the proletariat and the peasantry, as well as for the bulk of non-party government officials, the first incentive is financial reward. Yet over and beyond this, a social motive enters into play. An author in any country may write with an eye on royalties and fees. Nevertheless, public praise is an important element in his "pay." Applause does not increase the size of a musician's check, but it makes him happier. He plays more eagerly under the audience's approval. In this sense every laborer in Russia is in a position parallel to that of the artist. The nation owns the factories. The nation acclaims the most successful factory and the most efficient workers in each factory. Soviet newspapers follow the construction of a plant or the progress of an industry with the same richness of detail which foreign dailies devote to love tragedies and murder stories. The worker is in the limelight. He basks in it and reacts to it. The interest in his activities and welfare creates an enthusiasm that accelerates the pace of progress. It is all part of the collective spirit which sharply distinguishes the Soviet system.

Planning is another distinguishing and anti-individualist characteristic of Bolshevik economy. When bourgeois economists speak of applying a plan to capitalism they are, in fact, proposing a marriage between collectivism and individualism. They wish to add elephants and fountain pens. They want to graft oranges on to onions. Individualism and collectivism belong to unrelated species.

The plan makes Soviet socialism organically different from world capitalism. It is not only that planned economy enjoys obvious and now generally recognized advantages over the anarchy and waste of capitalist production, but that the organization and control of industry in the U. S. S. R. are altogether unlike that in other states. First, there is state ownership and management. (Then there is workers' participation in the direction of industry.) The class in a capitalist economy which earns without working—in contradistinction to the class which works without earning very much—has been eliminated. Competition does not wholly disappear. One trust strives to outbid another for available freight facilities, labor, and credits. A certain amount of rivalry remains. (Though the manager of one Soviet corporation does not earn a penny more if he increases output or shows a better profit, he tries hard to outwit his neighbor and put in the biggest possible stock of equipment and raw material. The plan, moreover, breaks down in places. Infallibility is not assumed, and numerous elements defy control or anticipation. These circumstances notwithstanding, planning does reduce waste and overlapping to a minimum, and wipes out direct losses due, for instance, to overproduction—in other words, to badly organized consumption.

It is often submitted that Stalin has adopted capitalist methods in industry. Is not the insistence that each trust or factory pay its own way a concession to capitalism? Unless a plant can prove that it has orders, it can no longer receive credits from the State Bank. Industries are now permitted to retain a greater share of their profits for reinvestment or for improvement in the living conditions of their workers. This, too, has been called a reversion to capitalism.

Now it is perfectly true that the Soviet Government applies many of the methods of private capitalism. It maintains large factories, for instance. It pays wages. It makes bread by baking dough, electricity by harnessing water power. It produces and sells goods for money. A tractor manufactured by Henry Ford may be an exact copy of one produced in Stalingrad. Yet the Detroit plant is private property and the factory on the Volga state property. The American tractor is usually sold to a private farmer; the Soviet tractor to a collective. With Ford, labor is a commodity like steel and glass. He buys it on the market. In the U. S. S. R., the worker is the hub of the universe. His interests come first.

Wool travels the same road from the sheep's back to the clothing store, whether it be in Moscow or Berlin or New York. The manufacturing processes coincide. The difference is in the formula that Socialist industry does not produce for profit. In Berlin and New York the clothing merchant asks himself how much he can get for a suit. In Moscow the cooperative or state store asks itself how little it can afford to take. I do not mean to indicate that prices are always lower in Russia than in America and Europe. For the moment, the U. S. S. R. is a technically backward country, and costs are excessive. But the Bolshevik principle of price determination is diametrically opposed to that which dominates in bourgeois lands. Similarly, wages are fixed as high as the state can pay and not as low as the workers will accept. Man was not made for industry, but industry for man. In a society which is anti-individualist, the individual may in the end gather richer fruits than under a system vociferously individualistic.

It has been said that "Stalinism" represents a compromise with capitalism. Actually, however, Soviet internal policy has never been as radical as it is today. Since 1929, since the emergence of what has been styled "Stalinism," a vigorous, uninterrupted, and loudly heralded campaign has been in progress to eradicate the last weak roots of private capitalism both in the Soviet city and the Soviet village. What remains is not viable. Moreover, there is no road back to capitalism. Zigzags to the right and left are possible. But no sharp deviation from the anti-capitalism of the Bolsheviks is conceivable in Russia—unless the Soviet Government is overthrown—and prophets of that eventuality have been very silent of late. The younger generation in the U. S. S. R. did not know capitalism but it hates it nevertheless. Certain obvious fruits of bolshevism will not readily be surrendered. Apart, however, from the social opposition to capitalism, objective facts and physical institutions would make the reestablishment of capitalism in Russia impossible or at least a costly adventure.

The fall of the Soviet regime is theoretically possible, but the rapid development of Socialist economic features makes it increasingly difficult to substitute other—capitalist—forms for those which exist today. Agrarian collectives are the outstanding example. If the Soviets had been driven from power prior to collectivization, capitalism might have stepped into their shoes in the villages without modifying the organization of production or the outward shell of economic life. (But 100,000 tractors are 100,000 obstructions to a new regime.) If the collectives fall apart under a new capitalistic state, who will own the tractors, the thousands of combines, the other large agricultural machines? Few Russian peasants are rich enough to own them individually. Some form of collectivism must remain. Yet a capitalist order would seek to destroy collectivism and, ipso facto, mechanization. If it succeeded in overcoming the communal organization of villages, agriculture would take a tremendous step backward to pre-war primitiveness. The giant government farms where the peasants are merely employees of the farmer-state constitute an even greater obstacle to non-Soviet methods of agrarian cultivation, for here the basis of work is mass production of grain, directed from central headquarters, under conditions of 100 per cent mechanization. If private initiative took over an ordinary state farm, the farm would be divided into perhaps 5,000 individual holdings. Then 5,000 private homes would be needed, 5,000 plows, 5,000 barns—and again the question would arise of the ownership and use of the mechanical equipment. The farther collectivization progresses, the greater the purely physical obstacles to discarding the economic features of bolshevism on the land.

In the city the collapse of the Soviets would be tantamount to industrial ruin. All Soviet factories, railroads, mines, oil fields, hydroelectric power stations, forests, newspapers, publishing houses, dwellings, stores, theaters, baths are owned by the state or by semi-state cooperatives. Suppose this state disappeared. There are no capitalists in Russia to take over all these economic institutions. Not only is there no private capital of any dimensions; there are no private capitalists. The presumption, then, is that the new capitalist regime would assume control of industry, transport, distribution, and entertainment—but it could do so only temporarily. Its individualistic, capitalistic nature would protest against government ownership and government management. Who would buy the industrial plants? Only foreigners would be in a financial position to do so. Russia would become a colony of the rest of the world. But the world bourgeoisie, suffering now from overproduction and interested at all times in new markets, must object to Russian industrialization. It would prefer to have Russia buy machines from Europe and America. The overthrow of bolshevism in the U. S. S. R., accordingly, would stop the country's economic growth. More, it would inevitably mean industrial and agrarian retrogression. It may very well be that a nation which has lived for even a limited period under socialism cannot return to capitalism any more than England or America could become a feudal state without inviting economic disaster.

Is France Backing Japan?

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, February 2

THE French reactions to the Japanese attack on Shanghai are very significant. During the session of the Council of the League of Nations in Paris in November and December most of those that closely followed the proceedings of the Council had a strong suspicion that there was a secret understanding between France and Japan. It was the hypothesis that best fitted the facts and best explained Briand's conduct. No doubt the thick-and-thin support given to Japan by the overwhelming majority of the French papers had the explanation usual in such cases in France. It must have cost the Japanese Government a lot of money. But the semi-official press could not have gone so far as it did in defending the action of Japan in Manchuria without the consent of the French Government. Most significant of all was the attitude of the papers immediately under Briand's influence. Some of them began by severely censuring Japan and demanding strong action by the League Council, but after a very short time they suddenly shut down and said nothing. And when the Council capitulated to Japan on every point and produced a resolution that was a monument of hypocrisy, those papers sang in chorus a hymn of praise to Aristide Briand, who had prevented war in Asia. Yet there was not a single person in Paris, either on the Council of the League or outside it, who did not know perfectly well that when the Council authorized the Japanese to continue military operations to repress "bandits," it was giving Japan a free hand in Manchuria and, ultimately, in China as a whole. It is a pity that the Government of the United States acquiesced in the attempt to humbug the opinion of the world.

Now that the capitulation of the League Council has had the consequences that it was bound to have and that some of us foretold, the attitude of the French press confirms the suspicion that there is a secret Franco-Japanese understanding. The Temps, organ of the Quai d'Orsay and the Comité des Forges, has not had a word of blame for the bombardment of an undefended town without a declaration of war and the massacre of hundreds or thousands of its innocent inhabitants. On the contrary the Temps declares that Japan is acting "within the strictly defined limits of the treaties and international agreements." When it was inaccurately reported that China had declared war on Japan, the Temps said that, if it were true, China had put herself entirely in the wrong, had designated herself as the "aggressor," and had violated the Kellogg Pact, which, it seems, is not violated by the attacks on Shanghai and Nanking. "Pertinax" has shown his contempt for the intelligence of the readers of the Echo de Paris by asserting that Japan has been goaded into taking extreme measures by the "provocations" of the League of Nations! The Temps, by the way, at first called on the League Council to refuse to act on the Chinese demand for the application of Articles 10 and 15 of the League Covenant, although such a refusal would have been itself a violation of the Covenant, as even Paul-Boncour was obliged to point out to the Japanese on the Council.

The theory of the French Government as expounded by its tied press is that Article 16 of the Covenant, concerning sanctions, cannot be applied because a state of war does not exist. Thus we have it laid down that a member of the League of Nations may make war with impunity so long as it does not formally declare it. And the nation attacked must not declare war to enable the Council to act on Article 16, for by so doing it would become the "aggressor." It is just to say that this theory was propounded during the session of the League Council in Paris by Sir John Simon, the British Foreign Minister, whose skilful interpretations of the Covenant reduced that document to a "scrap of paper." Among other things Simon held that the Council was powerless to declare one of its own members to be the "aggressor" under Article 10 without the consent of the member in question. Thus the article that Wilson described as "the heart of the Covenant" becomes inoperative in any dispute between Powers represented on the Council. If the governments of the great Powers of Europe had desired to destroy the League of Nations they could not have acted otherwise.

Most significant of all, perhaps, is the attitude of some of the "Briandist" papers here. The Volonté has hinted that Briand's "European Union" is much to be preferred to the League of Nations. This throws light on the real motives of Briand's proposal. Herriot, in an article in the Ere Nouvelle, has suggested that France has been too scrupulous in fulfilling her international obligations, while other nations neglect them, and that the time has come for her to pursue a "national" policy. It seems to most outsiders that that is what she has been doing for the last thirteen years. The Ere Nouvelle has followed Herriot's line in a leader, on the excuse that England and the United States have reduced the League of Nations to impotence. As for the République, which has hitherto been looked upon as an organ of the left-wing Radicals, it throws to the winds French obligations under the Covenant—which, be it remembered, is part of the Treaty of Versailles—declares that France has no interest in the Sino-Japanese conflict provided that the safety of Indo-China is secured, and that, as America will no doubt be much occupied in Asia, now is the time to blackmail the Government of the United States to obtain the cancellation of the war debts. It is just to say that the Œuvre, which has hitherto been silent about the Shanghai affair, has a leader this morning insisting on the suicidal folly of holding aloof and pointing out that the whole problem of the Pacific is involved. This increases the number of Parisian papers that have protested against the action of Japan to six, the others being the Populaire and the Soir (Socialist), the Humanité (Communist), the Peuple (trade unionist), and a Conservative nationalist paper, the Journal des Débats.

The view of the man in the street seems to be that a war between China and Japan would be good for business, as France could supply both belligerents with war material and other supplies. There are, however, signs that the very full and objective accounts of Japanese savagery at Shanghai telegraphed to the Parisian newspapers are having an effect on public opinion and causing an anti-Japanese reaction.

The French official attitude as reflected in the press seems to me incomprehensible and, indeed, almost insane except on the hypothesis of a Franco-Japanese understanding. Apart from the danger of Japanese militarism to the French Asiatic colonies and to French prestige in Asia—for of what value are any guaranties that Japan may have given in regard to Indo-China?—by their attitude in this matter the French are undermining their whole thesis of guaranties of “security.” They are going to say at the disarmament conference that they will consent to no reduction of armaments without an organized system of mutual guaranties and a strengthening of “sanctions,” either by a revival of the Geneva Protocol of 1924 or by drastic amendment of Articles 15 and 16 of the League Covenant, or both. Of what use will further “sanctions” be if, as in the present case, the great Powers have not the courage to apply those that already exist or even to go to the length of breaking off diplomatic relations with an “aggressor”? How dangerous a precedent has been set by the theories that war is not war until it is formally declared and that the League Council can take no effective action against one of its own members! Have the French reflected on the possible applications of these theories to Europe? They are a direct encouragement to the Hitlerites, if ever they come into power in Germany and have the necessary military strength (as is doubtful), to walk into the Polish Corridor without declaring war. And if the Hitlerites did this, it is doubtful whether France could invade Germany to go to the aid of Poland without violating the Treaty of Locarno.

Without the hypothesis of a Franco-Japanese understanding, the French attitude is, as I have said, incomprehensible. But what would be the motive from the French point of view of such an understanding? It has been suggested that the consideration is Japanese support for French policy at the disarmament conference, but that seems to me insufficient. Japan would in any case have refused to reduce her armaments. The Japanese Government declares them to be already inadequate and claims the right to increase them.

It is much more probable that France wishes China to come under Japanese domination so as to exclude the influence of Russia. And if the Japanese enterprise led, as it almost certainly would if allowed to go on, to war between Japan and Russia and the consequent interruption of the Five-Year Plan, that would not perhaps be profoundly regretted in Paris. Briand’s “European Union” scheme was in its intention anti-Russian and no doubt also anti-American. Briand fought hard to keep Russia out of it and yielded only when he was obliged to yield. Another scheme, closely connected with that of Briand and strongly supported in France—Count Coudenhove-Kalergi’s “Pan-Europe”—was quite definitely aimed, in the intention of its author, against Russia on the one hand and England and America on the other. Count Coudenhove-Kalergi has recently published a pamphlet with the title “Stalin & Co.,” which leaves no doubt about his aims. He calls on all the other European countries and on all Europeans, whether Socialists or capitalists, nationalists or internationalists, democrats or fascists, to unite against Soviet Russia. They are to suppress the Communist Party and all Communist propaganda in every country, to organize a joint economic boycott of Russia, and to form a “Council of European Defense” for the purpose of organizing an “army of the European alliance” to make war on Russia and put an end to bolshevism and the Five-Year Plan. Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, who has been staying in Paris, was received yesterday (February 1) by M. Roustan, Minister of Public Instruction, in the company of the Rumanian ex-Minister, John Petrovici. One would have thought that he would have gone to the Ministry of War—perhaps he did.

It is also probable that, as the République hinted in the article already mentioned, official France would see without regret complications between Japan and the United States. In any case it is clear that, whether there is a formal understanding or not, France is backing Japan. As I write comes the news of the announcement at the Council meeting at Geneva this afternoon of the joint intervention of America and England to stop hostilities. May it be the beginning of a wiser policy!

The Workers Demand—

By FELIX MORROW

FEBRUARY 4 was National Unemployment Insurance Day. In a hundred cities and towns there were organized demonstrations against the starvation decrees of government and employing class. All-day rains in New York and Philadelphia, blizzards in Boston, Chicago, and Detroit, and snow in the Middle West cut into the size of the demonstrations, but they were impressive enough. The New York Times said: “Veteran police officials who have handled many such demonstrations commented that yesterday’s seemed better organized and more vociferous than previous rallies. They expected that the rain would cut the demonstration down considerably and were astonished at the large numbers who marched in it for hours.” There were the usual police clubbings and arrests, particularly in Pittsburgh, Newcastle, Philadelphia, and McKeesport, an old strike town, where 10,000 townfolk battled against the police. In Minneapolis the Farmer-Labor mayor smashed the demonstration. The most significant fact about the demonstrations was the spread of the unemployed movement to the smaller cities and towns, particularly in the South and the far West.

The nation-wide demonstrations and the earlier National Hunger March to Washington, not to speak of more than a score of State and city marches and demonstrations, were organized by the National Committee of Unemployed Councils and supported by the Communist Party, which also initiated the organization of the Unemployed Councils. But the unemployed movement is not a Communist movement, though led by Communists. It is designed to be a broad united-front organization, based on the central issue of unemployment insurance—an issue with revolutionary implications, it is true, for victory will require the building of a powerful mass movement for a terrific struggle, and fulfilment of its demands will require fundamental concessions from capitalism; but an issue, nevertheless, for which non-Communists will fight. To the Unemployed Councils are rallying Simon-pure trade unionists as well as class-conscious radicals, the aristocracy of labor as well as the lowest stratum of marginal laborers; and, for the first time in America, a militant working-class demand is meeting with the sympathy of the intellectual and lower middle classes.

Committees affiliated with the Unemployed Councils fight for acceptance of its program in trade unions, fraternal organizations, workers' clubs. But the main work of the councils is to gain the support of employed and unemployed by leading them in struggles for even more immediate needs. Committees are organized in flophouses and bread lines to fight for better food and treatment. Housewives' committees uncover the worst cases of destitution, and demonstrations are staged before local charity agencies to force them to act. This part of the work has been so efficient that some relief agencies, among them the New York Home Relief bureaus, have offered to give preference to cases sent by the Unemployed Councils. I have seen a letter from the local Home Relief Bureau to the lower Harlem Unemployed Council to this effect; the letter assumed, with typical bureaucratic stupidity, that the council was a closed craft union catering to its own membership.

Free hot meals and shoes for poor school children are demanded from the local school authorities, and are being granted; though usually, as in New York, at the expense of the school teachers, who are levied on for this purpose. Evictions for non-payment of rent are fought by returning the furniture to the vacated rooms and then banding the other tenants together to strike if the landlord persists in evicting the destitute tenant. (On the face of it, this method may not seem very effective, but it has worked beautifully in Detroit, Chicago, and New York.) Perhaps the most promising activity of the Unemployed Councils is to organize and conduct rent strikes. The recent newspaper reports of successful rent strikes only presage a widespread use of this weapon.

How large the mass movement led by the Unemployed Councils promises to be may be realized if one considers that unemployment benefits are as vitally necessary to the employed as to the unemployed. The army of the destitute is a menace to the living standards of the employed. The A. F. of L. locals and central bodies who have repudiated the stand against unemployment insurance of the Vancouver convention have not suddenly turned radical. The nineteen New York locals which on January 27 declared for the insurance demands and for participation in the unemployment demonstrations are probably the same bona fide trade unionists that they were before the depression. But today trade unionism itself is at stake.

The radical trade unions of the Trade Union Unity League are less hurt by strike-breaking, since their strike demands are always tied up with the demands of the unemployed—relief, insurance, no overtime, seven-hour day, and five-day week to provide work for the unemployed. In radical strikes large numbers of unemployed are always to be found on the picket lines. But even the Trade Union Unity League cannot prevent starving men from strike-breaking. The conservative unions are infinitely worse off.

The old business unionism has no basis on which to appeal for cooperation from the unemployed. It is for this reason, not to speak of the pressure of the one-third of their members that are unemployed, that some of the most reactionary sections of labor, such as the typographical workers of New York, have supported the unemployment-insurance bill. How strongly many conservative workers feel about it was evidenced during the hunger march, when in many towns they fought off the suppressive measures of the police.

But it is not only the whole working class of America which needs the bill. The lower middle classes, those who make their living directly from the workers—small shopkeepers, small landlords—are discovering that it is also necessary for their welfare. The swift contraction of the living standards of the working class has ruined many shopkeepers and landlords and will ruin many more. Workers simply do not buy, not even foodstuffs. Nor, to an amazing extent, are they paying rent; and the policy of local officials of discouraging evictions for non-payment of rent, plus the activities of the Unemployed Councils in fighting evictions and calling rent strikes, is driving many landlords to the wall. Their only hope lies in the workers receiving unemployment benefits.

There is another class which, I think, is being drawn into the fight for insurance, and this class, though small, is highly vocal. A large part of the professional class—doctors, dentists, pharmacists, lawyers, musicians—is badly hit by the contraction of working-class standards. But they, it is too often forgotten, have other reasons, besides those immediately economic, for hating capitalism and supporting the working class. In a world where conspicuous consumption is the ruling-class standard, the professional class is the lackey of ignoramuses; the learned professions and the arts seem particularly irrelevant when a large part of the population suffers poverty and starvation. With a kind of bitter reluctance men like Edmund Wilson are showing the way to their generation. The larger part of the professional class is not likely to go Communist, but it may be depended upon to support the establishment, through unemployment benefits, of a minimum standard of living.

The unemployment-benefit program of the Unemployed Councils differs from other suggested plans in many ways. European systems of unemployment insurance have shown that institution of insurance by industries has meant the barring from benefits of large sections of the working class—agricultural laborers, fishery workers, those employed in many seasonal industries, railroad workers in England, and so on. Consequently the plan of the Unemployed Councils is designed to apply to all wage-earners without exception. The plan must also be on a national basis, for to stop at State lines would mean, for instance, that Michigan would be unable to levy on New York and Chicago capitalists who have waxed fat over many years on Detroit automobile workers. It is also demanded that the government and the employing class together shoulder the costs of unemployment benefits; for to elicit contributions from workers means to cut down the actual unemployment benefits, to pass on a large part of the burden to the skimpy wages of those still employed, and to bar from the benefits those young people who have been unable to begin working. The system of benefits is also to be under the control of workers' committees, a demand given point by recent happenings in England. As in Tammany's distribution of relief jobs, the English bureaucracy put on the lists many who did not need the dole, and workers ignorant of their rights or awed by the machinery of appeal were dropped. After which, in the drive to contract the insurance fund, the unworthy cases were used as a front to cover up the merciless slashing from the list of thousands of deserving workers.

The demand of the Unemployed Councils for insurance at full wages is the one most likely to seem unreasonable. It does seem a great deal if one thinks only of the small aristocracy of labor. It must be remembered, however, that the average wage of the mass of workers—33,000,000 of them—even during the halcyon years before the depression, was less than $25 weekly. Compare this sum with the minimum annual family budget prepared by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, computed for 1930, which would require at the lowest $2,024 in Schenectady and $2,468 in San Francisco. On these figures it is a mystery how most American families manage to live at all. Even the Charity Organization Society of New York recently computed that $25 weekly is the minimum required to maintain in health and decency dependent families. Add to this that no thinking person believes any longer that unemployment is a temporary phenomenon. Even in the most favorable year of 1927 over two million persons were unemployed. It is undeniable that the dynamics of American economics is slowing up. A considerable percentage of the ten to twelve million persons at present unemployed will perhaps never again find work. A whole generation must be kept alive. On the evidence of these facts the demand for unemployment insurance at full wages is the minimum basis for a self-respecting working-class movement.

Court Reform—A Job for Laymen

By I. MAURICE WORMSER

THE various highly touted law-reform movements, led by judges and lawyers, which have been descending "from Dan to Beersheba" in the last few years, reached the nethermost suburbs of the latter place the other day when a former bar-association president admitted: "Our courts as at present constituted are entirely inadequate to cope with modern conditions—they function and operate through legal machinery which was outmoded and obsolete many years ago"; and when an appellate justice warned a federation of lawyers' associations that "unless something were done about the administration of justice the public would revolt."

Apart from the moderation of their language, it cannot honestly be denied that there has been an increasing sense of disgust among business people with the juridical process; that the delays are shocking; that the scandals are unsavory; that the various and abundant technicalities and red tape result frequently in a complete denial of justice; that there has been no really substantial improvement in court procedure, in New York at least, in over a generation; that the community feels that our legal machinery is out of step with the needs of twentieth-century developments; and that too often the law itself, instead of being a part of life, is apart from life.

The Merchants' Association of New York stated in December, 1931, that "the calendars of many of our trial courts are so long as to make it impossible in some sections of the State for a case to be reached for trial within a period of from sixteen months to more than two years from the time that the cause is brought to issue." Of course it is usually several weeks before issue is joined. A lawyers' service bureau in New York City reports that it takes about a year and a half to reach a case at jury trial term of the Supreme Court, New York County; three years in Kings County; two years and nine months in Bronx County; and three years in Queens County. That in the City Court, New York County, the delay on the general trial calendar is three years; three years eleven months in Kings County; two years eleven months in Bronx County; and three years in Queens County. That in the Municipal Court of New York—the poor man's court, where surely, if anywhere, justice should not lag—one jury part in Manhattan is a year and a half in arrears, and another a year and two months. But in Brooklyn the situation is even more serious; there some of the jury parts are as much as two years five months, and two years eight months, in arrears. And in Bronx County, to cap the climax, the jury part in one district is three years six months behind. Such shameful delays are of course a denial of justice.

The second fundamental evil is the lack of an efficient and business-like supervision and control of the administration of justice. There is nothing to prevent a judge from declaring a recess at any time, perhaps for only a day or two, possibly for a week or more, without assigning any reason or being held amenable to any authority. Instances are not lacking of judges who have gone away to summer climes during the busiest weeks of the winter, though they have long summer vacations; and in the meantime, of course, the people must and do pay their large salaries. This is unbusiness-like and uneconomical, to say the least. Courts should run continuously to get cases out of the way. They should be held to render the same degree of efficiency as an up-to-date public-utility corporation. The methods of check-up on diligence, attendance, and output employed by a business executive should be adopted and unflinchingly enforced.

The third grave evil is that too many judges, however honest or learned, suffer from a social astigmatism in regard to procedural reform. Mr. Elihu Root has said: "Everybody knows that the vast network of highly technical rules of evidence and procedure which prevails in this country serves to tangle justice in the name of form. It is a disgrace to our profession. It is a disgrace to our law, and a disgrace to our institutions." To this emphatic language from a conservative source nothing can be added, except to quote from the English humorist, A. P. Herbert, to whose little volume, "Misleading Cases in the Common Law," Lord Hewart, then Chief Justice of England, wrote an introduction. Herbert refers to Chapter 29 of Magna Carta, "To no man will we sell, to no man deny, to no man delay, justice or right," and appends this comment: "But we in this court are well aware that these undertakings have very little relation to the harsh facts of experience. It is the whole business of the honorable profession of the law to sell, delay, and deny justice—to sell it to those who can afford it, to delay it if the client has money, and deny it if he has not; and many of us wish that we could sell more justice than we do."

Nowadays public criticism of the legal process is assuming a far more serious aspect than in the Pollyanna era. La crise is making its reverberations felt on all sides, and the field of the law is no longer immune. The necessity for reform has reached such a high point that nobody can ignore it. The feeling of disrespect for law and the courts seems to be growing steadily.

The bench and bar have had ample opportunity to reform their creaking machinery, anachronistic trial survivals, outdated practice, and general policy of drift. It is amazing that in the year 1931 a committee of lawyers, in referring to the scandalous delays in the lower courts, should merely report that "some plan to expedite the trial of jury cases, and thereby to relieve the congestion due to crowded calendars, is sure to be found." The stock "remedy" of course was advanced—"increasing the number of judges." Can the public be blamed if it feels nausea? Yet our legal Neros continue to fiddle—and even their fiddling isn't done any too well. Every comprehensive plan of law reform has been scuttled or disregarded by the legal fraternity, with the consequence that the man in the street, who is more observant than lawyers think he is, has become justly cynical. He has noted that a "clubby" spirit pervades the lawyers' associations; that they are operated on the line of guilds; that they hold back when they should step forward bravely; and that the bar and bench, altogether complacent with a very few outstanding exceptions, look upon legal reform as involving a "sacrifice."

In England many years ago it came to be seen that law reform could not safely be left to lawyers and judges, that their reports were mere pretenses, that their suggestions were futilities; and thereupon the laymen stepped in and turned the matter of remedies over to public, not professional, control. In this country our lawyers and judges, who have been dominating the attempts at law reform for the past generation, seem to accomplish practically nothing except to please themselves. The laity is in a state of despair. It is now high time, therefore, to give the layman his chance, since it has become apparent that real judicial reform must come elsewhere than from the bench and bar, which have tried again and again and have failed. Indeed, it is not certain that they really desire to succeed, for their seed may not be designed to be truly fruitful. The laity must point out the curatives—not mere palliatives—for the defects and failures of our existing system, must seek their adoption, and insist upon their enforcement in good faith. True reform must come from the outside—preferably from a committee composed of leaders of the business community, including representatives of labor as well as of capital, aided by lawyers on purely technical matters. They will make suggestions which will put our law and procedure on a business-like basis. This will insure the community a chance at least to see the horses run. In a contest between justice and outworn nonsense, justice should be given a sporting chance.

The layman can bring about law reform: first, by insisting upon the enactment of legislation which will unify the entire judicial system of each State and place it under the control of a centralized tribunal—the Council of Justice—charged with the duty to supervise and control, in all respects, the administration of justice. To insure its freedom from the dogmatism and narrowness of legalistic authoritarians, this council should consist of five representatives, one from each of the following classes: invested capital; labor unions; the sociological and economic thought of the hour; business men familiar with the customs of commerce and trade arbitration; and the bar. This council would be obligated to make thorough investigations, at periodic intervals, of all courts in the State, with a view to making them run more efficiently, more honestly, and on a more business-like basis. The council also should be vested with authority to supervise the work of judges and recommend to the legislature or other appropriate body the removal of judges wanting in capacity, honor, or both. It is commonly asserted that instances are not lacking where grave injustice has been done to litigants because of the use of "fixers," "influence," and ulterior considerations. For the first time in the history of this State the Council of Justice would present an official organization to which the man in the street could take his just grievances.

Secondly, the layman can make it his business to see that the selection of the judiciary shall be dug out by the roots from the realm of machine politics. To attain this reform would require constitutional amendments in most States. Judges should not be voted for at the regular elections, but at special times fixed for that purpose. They should be nominated by petition and appear on the ballot without party designation of any nature, and in every instance, before the name shall appear upon the ballot, the antecedent written approval of the integrity and capacity of the nominee by the Council of Justice must be made mandatory. This proviso would compel the candidate to submit to a complete "show-down" of his record and attainments. Provision must be made for publishing in all newspapers exceeding a given circulation, during a stated period of weeks, the name and address of every proposed nominee, so that the public may become acquainted with the aspirants and communicate with the council and inform it fully. The somewhat perfunctory approval or disapproval by bar-association groups after the nominations have been made, under the present system, amounts to little or nothing, and the public very shrewdly does not even take it seriously. So also, where there occurs an unexpired term, no appointment should be filled without the antecedent written approval of the designee, as to both ability and character, by the Council of Justice.

Of one thing I am sure—that the lawyer or judge alone cannot reform the process. He is as a rule too bedeviled by the withering blight of the remote past, of antiquated procedural precedents, and of moth-eaten technicalities. Like Lavinia, haunted by the dead Mannons, he says: "I'll have the shutters nailed close so no sunlight can ever come in. I'll live alone with the dead, and keep their secrets, and let them hound me."

It therefore must be the task of intelligent laymen to let the "sunlight" in, and it is to them that a bewildered and perplexed generation must come for guidance out of the catacombs of legal obscurities, procedural technicalities, expense, anachronisms, and delays.

Government by Ordinance in India

By A. FENNER BROCKWAY

London, January 20

ONE of the strongest arguments against the rule of India by Britain is that, in the very nature of things, the British people are ignorant of what that rule consists in. The population of Britain has enough problems of its own. The working class are wondering how they are going to live on reduced wages and unemployment benefits. The middle class are wondering how they are going to pay their income tax. It is not to be expected that they should show much concern about the problems of a people 7,000 miles distant.

The average British citizen has little or no sense of responsibility toward India. The traditional British view has been to leave such matters to the "man on the spot." Occasionally the newspapers report something startling. Then one man in the railway carriage will remark to his neighbor, "I see that silly old man, Gandhi, is making trouble again," and conversation will turn to his loin cloth. There are only two sections of the British people who have any real interest in India—the keen Socialists and the keen imperialists, both of whom are, of course, except at election times, insignificant minorities. Perhaps there is a third section—the Lancashire population engaged in the cotton industry. They are concerned about their loss of trade. During the past few weeks the newspapers have given exceptional space to India, though still much less than the American newspapers give. But British public opinion is still quite hazy as to what is occurring. The average man knows that some Indians have been in London at some kind of conference and that as soon as Gandhi got back to India trouble began again. He knows that there is some difficulty about what kind of government India should have, but little more. He reads of ordinances being promulgated, but if one asked him what an ordinance is he would not know, and as to what promulgation is—!

But there is some excuse for the average man. There are not three newspaper editors in London who at this moment know the terms of the new Indian ordinances. The latest Bengal ordinance was published in Calcutta last October. Three weeks ago there was not a copy in England outside the walls of the India Office! My friend Reginald Reynolds, the young Quaker who delivered Gandhi's final message to Lord Irwin, before the civil-disobedience campaign of 1930, scoured London for a copy in vain. Finally, he succeeded in securing a loan of a copy from the Secretary of State. Yet this ordinance, issued in the name of the British people, embodies principles against which all the honored pioneers of British democracy have fought!

The Bengal ordinance is political terrorism beyond anything which the Fascists are imposing in Italy or the Bolsheviks in Russia. Here are a few of the provisions of the first chapter of the ordinance:

1. The Government assumes power to commandeer any property, movable or immovable, for its use—land, houses, furniture, vehicles, etc.
2. The District Official may award such compensation as he thinks reasonable. There is no obligation to award any compensation.

3. Various specified classes in the community, including teachers, may be conscripted to assist the Government in the maintenance of "law and order" or in the protection of government property.

4. Collective fines may be imposed on the inhabitants of areas concerned in the commission of a scheduled list of offenses.

5. No civil or criminal proceedings are allowed against any action taken under the ordinance or "in good faith intended to be done" under the ordinance.

The second chapter of the ordinance sets up tribunals for the trial of political offenses. These are the main characteristics of the tribunals:

1. The special tribunals are to consist of three persons.
2. A majority verdict is to prevail.
3. The tribunals may meet in camera.
4. Sentences of transportation for life and of death may be given.
5. Accused persons may be tried in their absence.
6. No appeal is allowed.

The avowed object of this ordinance was to suppress a "terrorist" movement in Bengal. It was promulgated before the Round Table Conference in London had dispersed. I was with Mr. Gandhi when he received news of the ordinance, and he feared immediately that it meant the end of the truce between the British Government and the National Congress. Then came news of repressive ordinances to suppress the discontent in the Northwest Frontier Province and the rent strike in the United Provinces. They had a most depressing effect upon Mr. Gandhi. Despite the disappointments of the Round Table Conference, he still had hope. He trusted the honesty of purpose of Sir Samuel Hoare, the Conservative Secretary of State, though he recognized the distance which separated their views. While there was sincerity on each side he felt that the door to cooperation was still open.

The Bengal ordinance has been extended to Bombay, and the Northwest Frontier Province ordinances have been extended to a large part of India. Before describing them, reference should be made to the Rent Strike Ordinance, which at the moment of writing is limited to the United Provinces, though its extension to Gujerat, in the Bombay Province, is anticipated.

The rent strike has both a political and an economic motive. It has a political motive because the British Government in India is, in the last resort, the possessor of all land. In certain parts of India the peasants pay direct to the revenue-collectors; in other parts they pay to the "zemindars" (large landholders), who transfer approximately 50 per cent of their takings to the government. The latter system is particularly hard on the peasants, because the zemindars have the power to increase their land charges, irrespective of what they pass on to the authorities. But during the last year, owing to the fall in the prices of grain, the peasants have found the demands of both the zemindars and the revenue-collectors intolerable, and an economic motive for refusal of land payments has been added to the political.

The rent strike spread like a prairie fire over the United Provinces. The government agreed to reduce rents to the level of 1901, when prices were similar to those of this year, but the rent strike continued. A special ordinance was therefore issued on December 14, enabling the authorities to arrest anyone withholding rent or inciting others to withhold rent, and to sentence them to two years of rigorous imprisonment. It was under this ordinance that Jawaharlal Nehru, the most influential of the younger leaders of the Congress cause, was arrested for attempting to leave Ahmedabad, when this had been prohibited. He had been a prominent advocate of the rent strike. He was sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment and fined 500 rupees. This ordinance will undoubtedly be used extensively by the Government if the refusal of land payments spreads to other parts of India.

The Northwest Frontier ordinances were promulgated on December 14 and were known as the Unlawful Instigation Ordinance and the Unlawful Associations Ordinances. They were originally issued to meet the activities of the "Red Shirts," a formidable, though avowedly non-violent, organization, loosely associated with the Indian National Congress and whole-heartedly supporting its aims, but largely uninfluenced by its discipline, owing to distance and racial and religious independence. To the Red Shirts the spirit of the truce meant little; they carried on their agitation for independence and strengthened their organization, in readiness for the renewed struggle. Accordingly the British authorities assumed power to suppress their organization, to arrest their leaders, and to arrest anyone instigating resistance to British rule.

This Unlawful Instigation Ordinance has since been extended to Madras, Bombay, the Punjab, and Bihar and Orissa; the Unlawful Associations Ordinances, to Madras, Bengal, Bombay, the United Provinces, and Bihar and Orissa. It is under the latter ordinance that the Congress has been declared an illegal organization. During the civil-disobedience campaign of 1930 Congress was an illegal organization in some parts of India but legal in others. The head office of the Congress at Allahabad remained open during the whole of the campaign; for instance, the Working Committee met there unmolested. In Bombay, however, where the Congress was outlawed, the premises were seized and the members of the Congress Committee were arrested almost as soon as they were appointed. It is characteristic of the greater thoroughness with which the Government is now attempting to suppress the Congress movement that it has applied this ordinance to practically every part of British India. The members of the All-India Working Committee, as well as of the district and local committees, are being arrested en bloc.

A third ordinance—the Prevention of Molestation and Boycotting Ordinance—applies to the whole of British India. The ordinance which was in operation in Bombay during the 1930 campaign has been extended to include peaceful picketing, as well as actual molestation. Congress supporters have even been arrested for sitting outside shops selling British goods, though they have remained silent and motionless. Their presence is regarded as an offense!

The most inclusive of the ordinances is the Emergency Powers Ordinance of January 3. It is being applied steadily to all parts of India. It gives the British authorities virtual power to conscript both property and persons. It provides for the commandeering of transport, the restriction of communications and movements; it gives rights of search, the right to arrest suspected persons and to restrict them to certain areas; it enables the authorities to take possession of buildings for government service or for the accommodation of troops or police; it applies compulsion to certain persons, such as the headmen of villages, to maintain "law and order"; it authorizes the collection of "collective fines"; and it gives power to suppress newspapers and to confiscate their printing plant. It is the kind of measure which an invading military commander applies to an occupied territory during war.

This is how Britain is ruling India. What do the British people think of it? The extreme Conservatives are jubilant. At last they see the "strong hand" which they have been demanding. The moderate Conservatives, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, and the governmental Liberals are more restrained. They argue that the ordinances are necessary to crush an "unconstitutional movement"—as though any democratic movement can be "constitutional" when self-government does not exist!—and they emphasize that the Round Table Conference policy is to be continued—as though it can be anything but a farce with Mr. Gandhi in prison! The Liberal press is cautiously disturbed, not daring to say much in criticism, though pointing out that "force is no solution." The Labor Party is indignant—forgetting that a Labor Government authorized the imprisonment of Mr. Gandhi and 60,000 of his followers in 1930! The I. L. P. supplements its indignation by whole-heartedly supporting India's claim to independence and by urging the Indian people to persist until social and economic freedom is won, as well as political freedom.

In the Driftway

MARRIAGE is a subject on which the Drifter has no fixed judgments. Although he has considerable information on the matter, gleaned from various sources, the sum total of his actual knowledge is small. About slavery, also, he knows very little, though the orthodox opinions have been long familiar to him. The following item, however, which pertains to both marriage and slavery, is worth commenting on. It is a formula for slave marriage, devised by the Reverend Samuel Phillips of Andover, Massachusetts, in the middle of the eighteenth century.

You S. do now in the presence of God, and these witnesses, take R. to be your wife; promising that so far as shall be consistent with the relation which you now sustain, as a servant, you will perform the part of a husband towards her; and in particular you promise that you will love her; and that, as you shall have the opportunity and ability, you will take a proper care of her in sickness and health, in prosperity and adversity; and that you will be true and faithful to her, and will cleave to her only, so long as God in his Providence shall continue your and her abode in such place (or places) as that you can consistently come together.

THERE is a refreshing realism about this document which might very well be more often imitated. Whom God hath joined, say the Scriptures—let none but man put asunder. Let nothing but the exigencies of an unjust world, the hard, unyielding facts of economic necessity, poverty, the need of labor, the obligation to serve a master—let nothing but these impair this marriage duly contracted in the presence of God and of these witnesses. What, the Drifter asks, is wrong with this ceremony? Is it not better, the world being what it is, than the vow without exception which young men and women take to cleave one to the other until death do them part? The Reverend Samuel Phillips merely recognized the plain fact that many things might part man and wife besides death. And for his unfortunate slaves, therefore, he invented a better formula than the one he doubtless employed for his free white parishioners.

* * * * *

NOR is the Reverend Mr. Phillips the only marital realist. In Chihuahua, across the Texas border from El Paso, it is now possible to obtain a divorce by mutual consent with only one day's notice, and without either of the parties being compelled to appear. However, these divorces are not granted to persons who have been married less than a year. In other words, while the state of Chihuahua recognizes that divorce is often desirable and should be granted freely at the will of both parties, it is aware also that many a quarrel arising during the first months of marriage ends in the fondest of reconciliations in less than twenty-four hours. The first time a young husband comes home late for dinner, the first time a young wife leaves her husband's home for her father's, the first difference over money, the first sharp clash of taste and acrimonious exchange of mutual disrespect—these are not, in the opinion of the wise Chihuahuan judges, grounds for irrevocable rupture of the marriage vow. The Drifter, having observed a number of marriages in various stages of agreement, can only bow to this superior wisdom. One swallow does not make a summer—but beware the whole flock! After them is all too likely to come the winter of discontent.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

War—in India and Outside

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is difficult to understand in what way you imagine that your article entitled War in India, in the issue of January 13, is going to help the cause of world peace. You write of the present struggle in India as if it could terminate in only one way—"the end of British control in India." You produce no evidence for this assertion, nor does your article show appreciation of the fact that the British Government is assured of the support of liberal opinion in India in the furtherance of the constitutional changes proposed by the Round Table Conference. Are we to assume that The Nation is in favor of assassination of British officers as a legitimate political weapon in the cause of Indian nationalism? We have witnessed in the last few weeks the murder of an Englishman, Mr. Stevens, who was known to be sympathetic to Indian aspirations, by two high-school Indian girls. This is the first time in the Indian political movement that Indian women have indulged in terrorism of this nature.

You may say that Mr. Gandhi is not responsible for acts of terrorism, and, indeed, you quote his saying that the Congress method of winning India's freedom is "truth and non-violence." The fact remains, however, that nowhere has the Indian National Congress under its present administration spoken decisively against terrorism. There has been from time to time grudging disapproval of specific acts; but notwithstanding lip service to the creed of non-violence, in more than one instance Congress has publicly expressed its admiration of what it is pleased to call the "martyr spirit" that has led misguided young Indian men and women to indulge in assassination of individuals.

What civilized government in the world, even including the enlightened administration of the United States of America, would tolerate for a single moment a parallel authority to its own in the sphere of general law and order? The following extract from the statement issued by the Government of India on January 5, 1932, would be subscribed to by all those who have not allowed their love of pacifism to overrule their regard for constitutional progress:

The peaceful progress of India depends on the maintenance of the authority of government, whatever that government may be, and of respect for the law, and the present Government of India would fail lamentably in their obligations to their successors if, during the period of transition, they allowed this fundamental principle to go by default, or were content to permit the usurpation of their functions by any political organization. An issue of hardly less importance is whether a political organization is to be allowed by lawless means to impose its will on the public, large sections of which deny its authority and oppose its pretensions. Government would fail in their duty were they to countenance the claims of Congress to control and domination, or permit them in effect to assume the position of a parallel government.

Mr. Gandhi is a publicity expert of the first order, and no doubt it is for this reason, more than any other, that foreign observers seem to labor under the impression that he is the sole exponent of India's legitimate claims. He may certainly be considered, as a religious teacher, to hold a unique position in the modern world, but his political aptitude has been questioned by more than one competent Indian authority. You mention his declaration: "We are prepared to sacrifice all." What exactly has he sacrificed? His ascetic life may be admired, but that is a personal matter. A real sacrifice would be if he responded to Mr. Sastri's appeal at the conclusion of the second session of the Round Table Conference, and harnessed his great gifts to the constructive work of the nation. Some of us think that his teaching of non-violence is an emasculating factor in the building up of a true national life in India.

London, January 21

BASIL P. HOWELL

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Lord Willingdon is reported to have said that "no self-respecting government could afford to ignore Gandhi's challenge." No one expects the British Government in India to ignore the present situation, but there are different ways of responding to it. So far, the response to civil disobedience, which has remained amazingly non-violent in view of the intensity of the feelings involved, has been the establishment of a "legal" reign of terror. Life pensions have been announced as available for informers. Political prisoners are given hard labor or deported. A man can be indefinitely imprisoned without charge preferred, or condemned to death in absentia on the basis of a police report alone; and while, in Britain, the slogan "Buy British" is everywhere proclaimed, in India children have been condemned to years of imprisonment or to the lash for peaceful picketing. These are not the acts of a self-respecting government, but of one driven by blind rage and fear. One does not know how many English officials are still living only as a consequence of Indian reluctance to take life; one does feel that the British are hoping to break down this patience so that they may have an excuse to use their rifles and bombs on unarmed crowds. English diehards have repeatedly admitted that England cannot "afford" to lose India; at the same time they have made it impossible that anything else should happen.

What, if anything, can be done here? We cannot expect the American government to interfere in British "domestic affairs," however scandalous. But would it not be helpful to publish and distribute here some of the recent ordinances, together with a few examples of ferocious penalties inflicted on children, and then to prepare an open letter of protest, such as one cannot doubt that a few hundred of the most distinguished Americans would be glad to sign in their individual capacity?

Boston, January 29

ANANDA K. COOMARASWAMY

A Note from Pineville, Kentucky

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In my article on the Kentucky mine strike on February 3 there are two errors: (1) I stated that Allan Taub was "released on the second day" after his arrest, when actually he was held a prisoner for eight days, from January 6 to January 14. (2) Through my own lack of exact information I made it seem, in the article, that Taub merely refused to answer the question "Do you believe in God?" for personal reasons, whereas his objection to the question, which concerned not only one but all the defendants involved, was that according to the Kentucky law of evidence such a question could not be asked.

In a letter to me calling attention to these inaccuracies, Mr. Taub adds:

You may also be interested to know that on January 24, when I tried to return to Pineville, I was stopped on the highway outside of the town by about seven deputies armed with high-powered shotguns. After I protested, a telephone call was made to the mayor by one of the deputies. In a few minutes two carloads of officers and deputies—about fourteen of them—arrived, armed with sub-machine-guns and high-powered shotguns, and headed by the mayor and chief of police. I was ordered to leave, and was informed that if I ever wished to return I would first have to get permission from the mayor.

However, I did return a few days later (without asking anyone's permission to do so), and have been here for the past six days.

New York, February 9

OAKLEY JOHNSON

The Madness of Moderation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The radicals of this country are lucky! If they controlled a party like the British Labor Party, history would repeat itself—victory followed by total smash-up. Treacherous leadership merely contributed to the British radical collapse. The fundamental cause was lack of audacity.

This madness of moderation runs all through your recent dictatorship symposium. Not one of the contributors seemed to have the faintest realization of what a desperate situation a radical government would face. Ten million men, we are told, are unemployed. Can anyone doubt that the shock of a radical triumph at the polls would double this number? How are all these men to be given work? The only idea I have been able to glean from your symposium is that the government should finance public works by means of bond issues. Bond issues, to the extent of many billions, by a government that is already going bankrupt!

East Jordan, Mich., January 28

F. H. FOOTE

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, is the author of "Why Recognize Russia?"

ROBERT DELL has for many years been the Paris correspondent of The Nation and the Manchester Guardian.

FELIX MORROW has contributed articles to the New Republic, Symposium, and Menorah Journal.

I. MAURICE WORMSER is editor of the New York Law Journal and author of "Frankenstein Incorporated."

A. FENNER BROCKWAY is author of "The Government of India" and "A Week in India," and editor of the New Leader.

EDA LOU WALTON is author of "Jane Matthew and Other Poems."

HENRY BAMFORD PARKES is an English writer now living in the United States.

JOHN MACY is the editor of the recently published symposium, "American Writers on American Literature."

AMOS PINCHOT is a New York lawyer and publicist.

ARTHUR WARNER, a contributing editor of The Nation, is author of "A Landlubber's Log."

ROBERT REINHART is the secretary of the International Committee for Political Prisoners.

Jewish Social Work a Career and Challenge

Do your criteria of a successful career include also the intangible values of inherent interest, stimulating contacts and social usefulness?

If so, then you should study the advantages of

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

Scholarships and Fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each academic year are available for especially qualified students.

For full information, address

M. J. KARPf, Director

The Training School

For Jewish Social Work

(A graduate school)

71 W. 47th St., New York City

RUSSIAN TRAVEL MADE EASY

In visiting Russia, you want to travel as widely as you can, gain as many first hand impressions as you can, and know what your expenses will be. The Open Road has devoted five years to perfecting its organization in the U. S. S. R. Open Road representatives in Moscow and Leningrad know the travel facilities of the country, and the things worth seeing. They save you time and money. They help you to see what interests you most.

When inquiring for rates, please indicate whether you prefer to travel alone or in one of many specially constituted Open Road groups. Also, state what phase of Russian life interests you most. Round trip rates as low as $238.

The OPEN ROAD

Salmon Tower, 11 West 42nd Street, New York City

● Cooperating in U. S. S. R. with INTOURIST

VARIETY of TOURS TO U. S. S. R.

at

REASONABLE COST

1. $198.50 Round trip including visas, 5 day tour in Russia, hotels, meals, guide, interpreter, etc.
2. $242.50—Dnieprostroi Tour—Leningrad, Moscow, Kharkoff, Dnieprostroi, Kiew—11 Days in Russia.
3. $598.00—Specially conducted tour through Constantinople, Odessa, Dnieprostroi, by steamer on the Dniepr, Kiew, Moscow, Leningrad—Starting in New York under the leadership of Dr. P. T. Swanish, linguist and expert tour leader.

Ask for our tours New York to Leningrad direct by steamer
With cooperation of CUNARD LINE and INTOURIST

CHICAGO'S LABOR BANK

Amalgamated Trust and Savings Bank

111 W. Jackson Boulevard

Chicago, Ill.

Finance

Why Commodity Prices Slump

THE depression is entering a new phase, characterized by a resumption of the decline in commodity prices. Last autumn the index number of the Bureau of Labor Statistics seemed to be in a stable condition; in November there was a decline of only a fraction of 1 per cent. During December, however, there was a drop of 3 per cent, followed by another of nearly 2½ per cent in January. A startling number of commodities, including raw sugar, copper, cocoa, zinc, hides, rubber, and several grains, have sold at the lowest prices on record. Rubber, which changed hands at 24 cents a pound in 1929, and at $1.12½ in 1913, went substantially below 4 cents. Copper is offered at 6¼ cents a pound, compared with approximately three times that figure within the last two years, and Rio coffee has almost exactly duplicated the performance of copper. Raw sugar has fallen from 3 cents in 1927 to less than 1 cent, while cocoa sells at 3¾ cents as against 20 cents in 1927.

Figures such as these furnish an ironic commentary on the statement, which in the early days of the depression attained the vogue of a slogan, that "business is fundamentally sound." The price record shows that business was unsound to the core, and that the mighty slump of 1920-21 was only the first step in the post-war process of deflation. Never before in the history of the country was an eight-year interval of stability after a collapse, such as that extending from 1921 to 1929, followed by a renewed slump. In previous boom periods, credit inflation was expressed in a rise in commodity prices; on this occasion it contented itself with holding prices steady through an enormous increase and diffusion of popular purchasing power—founded on borrowed money and stock-market profits. The tremors of the common-stock debacle are now reaching down to the roots of the rubber trees and coffee plants and to the deepest workings of the copper mines. The full force of the shock has been a long time in arriving at these obscure points; there is some reason to believe that it will exhaust itself here.

It seems fairly evident that this latest price slump traces directly back to the credit collapse in Europe of last summer and autumn. Raw products and foodstuffs have felt, in their turn, the paralyzing hand which monetary troubles have laid upon Europe's industry. But in addition, these commodities are especially sensitive to irregularities and instabilities in the foreign-exchange markets. They weigh heavily in international trade, hence their free movement depends upon a safe medium of international payments. But with one country after another abandoning gold, things may happen between the drawing and the paying of a ninety-day bill against which commercial bankers cannot protect themselves.

Disturbing as this belated price movement is, it carries with it a sort of grim encouragement. If low prices are "sound" prices, we are moving toward a point where the soundness will be unquestioned. If prices must attain equilibrium, one with another, before business can revive, certainly the wild irregularity of the downward movement represents a headlong sweep toward equilibrium. And if business men and consumers can be persuaded to resume operations only when "bargains" are available, the recognition of bargains can hardly be delayed much longer. This is not to say that at some nearby point business activity will suddenly begin to climb toward the old levels. Some of the most orderly, if unspectacular, periods of prosperity in the past have been associated with a commodity price level which was merely stable, or even gently declining.

S. PALMER HARMAN

Books, Art, Drama

So Long It Has for Echoing

By EDA LOU WALTON

One might—one might—
Dear darkness of the heart
Wherein the pale moon rises and the slight
Flame in the wrist starts suddenly into light!
Yes, love again—come hate, come unconcern,
Still must the tired palm turn
Against the palm,
And the calm moon rise till round it burn
Another hole in heaven.
When day come slanting down the barren hill
Is long, and white, and still,
Yet will the heart not understand, not know
Its prophecy of snow;
Even a broken vessel struck will ring,
So long it has for echoing,
For dying, so long—

A Philosophy for Carnivores

Man and Technics. A Contribution to a Philosophy of Life.
By Oswald Spengler. Translated by Charles Francis
Atkinson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THE present slim volume, Spengler tells us, sets forth a few thoughts taken from a larger work on which he has been engaged for years. Most of the book is given over to a discussion of man's prehistoric origins and alleged inherent nature; the final chapter deals with the present economic crisis and the approaching doom of our civilization, though the precise logical connection between the early chapters and the last is not altogether clear.

Man, Spengler tells us in italics, is a "beast of prey. . . . Ideals are cowardice. . . . The animal of prey is the highest form of mobile life." Such an animal "can hold its own only by fighting and winning and destroying. It imparts a high dignity to Man, as a type, that he is a beast of prey." The opposite of the soul of a lion is the soul of a cow. "For strength of individual soul the herbivores substitute numbers, the herd, the common feeling and doing of masses. But the less one needs others, the more powerful one is. A beast of prey is every one's foe. Never does he tolerate an equal in his den. Here we are at the root of the truly royal idea of property. Property is the domain in which one exercises unlimited power, the power that one has gained in battling, defended against one's peers, victoriously upheld. It is not a right to mere having, but the sovereign right to do as one will with one's own." Nothing here of "the toothless feeling of sympathy and reconciliation and yearning for quiet." Spengler then proceeds to dilate on the difference between carnivore and herbivore ethics. Herbivore ethics depress, make mean and cowardly, while carnivore ethics elevate "through power and victory, pride and hate." Spengler is proud that the tactics of Man's living "are those of a splendid beast of prey, brave, crafty, and cruel," and that his natural soul "knows the intoxication of feeling when the knife pierces the hostile body, and the smell of blood and the sense of amazement strike together upon the exultant soul."

It would be pointless to "answer" a passage like this.

One can only admire such a writer for his courage in making assertions which to a decadent age like ours will seem merely ludicrous. This distinction between "carnivore" and "herbivore" ethics, of course, is merely a biological twist given to Nietzsche's "master morality" and "slave morality," and Spengler's speculations on the original nature of man are no more scientific than Rousseau's. Rousseau was wrong chiefly through the ignorance of the age in which he lived; Spengler is wrong because of a personal determination to be so. This is evident from the high-handed manner in which he deals with the conclusions of science. He contemptuously dismisses in a footnote "the enraged demon of classification that haunts the pure anatomists which brought man close to the apes." His motive in doing this is patent: we know the apes to be herbivorous; if they were carnivorous, Spengler would cite our kinship with them triumphantly. But there is no absurdity that Spengler will shrink from to make his point. He not only rejects Darwinian evolution; he solemnly assures us that man's hands and the tools he has fashioned with them came into existence together. "The unarmed hand is in itself useless. It requires a weapon to become itself a weapon. As the implements took form from the shape of the hand, so also the hand from the shape of the tool." The italics are Spengler's. His formula seems to be that if a statement is particularly incredible it may be made to seem convincing if it is shouted. He offers no explanation of—indeed, he makes not a single reference to—the weaponless hand of the ape. It is one thing to deny our kinship with the apes; it is quite another to forget their existence.

One would think his analysis would lead Spengler to conclude that the most desirable state of affairs would be one of absolute individualistic anarchy, with men living exclusively on meat, and goods changing hands only through the medium of the club and the knife. This conclusion, for some reason, is not drawn. Spengler turns out, apparently, to be a fascist—though fascism at least implies "law and order"; and why should the lion-souled, the proud carnivores, have any respect for either?

But let us waive these questions, and come to Spengler's final forecast. The machine age is rapidly hastening to an end. The multiplication of machines is beginning to defeat their own economic purpose; in countries where large-scale industry is of old standing the leaders of thought begin to be sick of machines; the workers themselves are revolting against the role for which the machine ("not, as they imagine, its possessors") earmarks most of them. The doom of the industrial white countries began when they ceased using their colonies and backward countries for opening up new markets and new sources of raw material, and stupidly began to export, not finished products exclusively, but "secrets, processes, methods, engineers, and organizers." "The unassailable privileges of the white races have been thrown away, squandered, betrayed. . . . The accustomed luxury of the white workman, in comparison with the coolie, will be his doom. The labor of the white is itself coming to be unwanted. . . . This is the real final basis of the unemployment that prevails in the white countries. It is no mere crisis, but the beginning of a catastrophe. . . . The machine-technics will end with the Faustian civilization and one day will lie in fragments, forgotten—our railways and steamships as dead as the Roman roads and the Chinese wall, our giant cities and skyscrapers in ruins like old Memphis and Babylon."

Purely as economics, this is vividly imaginative but entirely unsound. When a country that has hitherto been chiefly agricultural throws up a tariff wall to develop its own industries, it shuts off a market from countries with industries expanded to supply that market, and hence produces in those countries a sometimes severe but essentially temporary depression. In the long run the newly industrialized country will probably develop a higher purchasing power for the older countries' products; at all events a new equilibrium is finally established. To the problem of "unwanted" white labor there are at least three solutions: (a) the production of a wider range of commodities; (b) the production of a much higher quality of the same commodities—for example, housing; and (c) the reduction of the number of working hours to permit more leisure or more "shifts."

As we are doomed, Spengler urges us to meet our doom courageously, gloriously, like thoroughbreds. But this recommendation is illogical in a thoroughly fatalistic philosophy, particularly one which, like his own, holds that civilizations die because of changes that occur within man's "soul." A man who writes elsewhere: "The place of . . . 'it ought to be so' is taken by the inexorable 'it is so,' 'it will be so,'" should not be so inconsistent as to tell us how we ought to meet our fate.

None of such criticisms individually, however, or even all of them together, can "dispose" of Spengler. "The Decline of the West," for all its defects and even absurdities, remains, with its staggering erudition, its ringing prose, and its imaginative sweep, one of the few great works of the twentieth century. Even the present slim volume is extremely impressive. I have quoted much that is absurd; I have failed to quote much that is admirable. Spengler must be judged, in the end, not by his individual statements but by his total effect. His thought is to be appraised for its seminal value rather than for its logical rigor. Indeed, perhaps he is not to be classed as a "thinker," in the narrow sense, at all. He is, rather, a great dramatist, a prophet, a poet. His prophecies of doom may rest, at bottom, on nothing better than dubious analogies; but they remain an admirable antidote to what he calls progress-optimism and progress-philistinism. And there is always the suspicion that they may be right.

HENRY HAZLITT

Travel Disappoints

They Were Still Dancing. By Evelyn Waugh. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

IN that forgotten era when the waves were ruled by Britannia and Britannia by Lancashire cotton manufacturers, seriousness was the hallmark of the Englishman. His traditional beef and beer, translated into spiritual terms, became obedience to duty, stern morality, solid self-assurance; the responsibility of guiding less favored nations toward the haven of Protestant religion and parliamentary government made him a trifle suspicious of art that was not obviously moral, a trifle obtuse toward more subtle varieties of humor. The war has changed all that. The modern Englishman, relieved of the responsibilities of world rule, despairing of salvation from his own insoluble economic problems, prefers to find life amusing. If he has ideals he submits himself to the protective hands of the Catholic church; he is liable to regard the Byzantine Empire, with its thousand years of unprogressive stability, as the highest society achieved by man. Of this new species of Englishman no one is more typical than Evelyn Waugh, Catholic and cynic.

Mr. Waugh's first novel, "Decline and Fall," was perhaps the most amusing book published in England since the war. The English public school, English high society—so drearily portrayed by pompous autobiographers and would-be Juvenals—became the scene of the most extravagant adventures, related with that mock-serious understatement which is the method of sophisticated humor. In "Vile Bodies," two years later, the method was repeated, but the humor had grown savage; a tortured individual became visible behind the mask of the clown. The adventures were as absurd, but the total impression was too gloomy to be amusing. How Mr. Waugh will develop cannot be foretold; he is still under thirty. In "They Were Still Dancing" he is marking time. He describes a visit to the coronation of the king of Abyssinia, followed by a tour of East Africa and southern Arabia. As a travel book—that very minor genre—it is perfect. The style is lucid and simple, and information is attractively sandwiched between adventures and character sketches. There is an American professor, expecting to be enormously impressed by Abyssinian religion and invariably disappointed by its realities, who might have walked out of "Decline and Fall"; he is at once an epitome of all professors and a very concrete individual. This is avowedly a potboiler; Mr. Waugh saw nothing remarkable—his main theme is that what he saw was always far more ordinary than what he expected to see. But from this unpromising material he has concocted a couple of hours' excellent light entertainment.

HENRY BAMFORD PARKES

Cabell New and Old

These Restless Heads. By Branch Cabell. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

AN author should be allowed sometimes to review his own book. But as the more scrupulous journals do not permit such a self-judgment, the next best thing is for the book to be reviewed by the fortunate person to whom it is dedicated. To prevent misunderstanding, I will say at once that the gracious acrostic which makes me in a sense part owner of "These Restless Heads" has not violently prejudiced me against the pages that follow it.

Mr. Cabell has decapitated himself. James Branch Cabell is a gentleman still living in Richmond and likely to live far beyond his earthly years in a certain completed opus, to which nothing can be added by him or by anybody else, except fraudulently. Whatever in the future the gentleman in Richmond may choose to write will be, like the present volume, by an author who has two, not three, words in his name. The introductory quotation from "The Mikado" indicates that this lopping of James off the Branch may be a merry prank. Yet it has an earnest meaning (Cabell has always passed easily from fooling to seriousness); it is a practical confirmation of what he has announced before, that the biographer of Manuel has closed his career. The king is dead. Long live the king!

But the new king so resembles his predecessor as to be rather like a twin brother than a son, and the similarities will rejoice the subjects of James I. The virtues are familiar; much of the substance is new; some of what is new reminds you happily of the elder romancer and critic. The Prologue fancies what happens to Prospero after Shakespeare's curtain falls upon the magic island and the Duke returns to Milan, to the world of pomp and authority, of statesmanly duties, which he completely discharges. But Ariel is now his secret master. It is the contest between common sense and beautiful nonsense. And when at his death Prospero passes from the world of folly back to the wisdom of the magic island, the reader may guess for himself who is the protagonist of this super-Shakespearean fable.

From fantasy we pass abruptly to daylight comedy. Mr. Cabell's morning mail reminds him of many things; of the various kinds of correspondents who pester authors of repute; of visitors to Richmond, not his private friends, who come to see him; of the assumption that writers and artists (especially if, like Mr. Cabell, they have dealt with amatory subjects) must lead wild lives and cannot be just ordinary citizens attending to their business at their typewriters, or at church, or at a meeting of the Board of Trade; of the egotism, strained broad-mindedness, and artificial immorality of authors; of what girls really were like in his youth, when he was dreaming of the girls he afterward wrote about, girls who never existed but had the only real existence.

Near a Flag in Summer is, prosaically, a satire on patriotism; it is more than that, a gorgeous description of the country, and, still more, an evocation of the country beyond the State in which we happen to live, the limitless ungeographical land of romance. The two countries are in conflict, and the poet lives in both, in one with his body, in the other with his imagination. The conflict is developed in the section called Before Æsred in Autumn. Æsred is the goddess of compromise and conformity whom Cabell discovered, or created, on Mispec Moor, and whom, as he contemplates her bust in his comfortable library, he sees as the wise ruler of the world. Round that world he puts a girdle of golden writing, which embraces history, mythology, literature, and the cosmic significance of a safety match. At the end Æsred is transformed by a simple change of the mechanics of vision to Ettarre the Witch Woman—which is such a sleight-of-hand, or of eye, as we may sometimes find in the works of the late James Branch Cabell.

In a section called On a Journey in Winter the present Mr. Cabell is still in his library among his toys of metal and china and his other toys, the earthly caskets which hold the recorded wisdom of the world. Among the many library essays in which writers have been most happy discoursing of their only true possessors and possessions, this is one of the richest and finest. It is in the spirit of "Beyond Life," but only in a fresh and glowing sense a repetition of that. Some of the sentences have a rhythm of the seventeenth century, of Jeremy Taylor, and of Thomas Browne, who is summoned in an introductory quotation to set the tone. But the tone is Cabell's and it is not maintained at an intolerable level of eloquence; it is varied by modern matters and colloquial self-banter. (We recall a perished writer of considerable talent who had a strange habit of laughing at his own highest solemnities and of not being deluded by his saddest disillusionments.) The gist of the essay is that all the great tales of romance and adventure recount that some man for some reason went on a journey. And life is a journey. And so is the Epilogue of True Thomas by Moonlight, which concludes this book. There is diversified matter in "These Restless Heads," but it has, as its author maintains in the Introduction, "one single main theme"; and the component parts are, in words adjacent to those quoted on the title-page, "all combined in beauty's worthiness."

JOHN MACY

How Utilities "Educate"

The Public Pays: A Study of Power Propaganda. By Ernest Gruening. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

THIS is an important book. To anyone curious to know how public opinion is steered and for what purposes, it is a fascinating one. It is an authoritative account of the stupendous propaganda machine which the public-utility people have built in order to hide and protect a system of almost incredible illicit profit. In the interest of "education" and "public information," they have divided the country into geographic regions, each in charge of committees and numberless subcommittees which bring pressure to bear upon practically every agency that spreads information and shapes opinion in this country.

High schools, colleges, universities, business schools, technical schools, and their principals, deans, presidents, and faculties; the press, the screen, politics, textbook publishers, men's and women's clubs, chambers of commerce, lecture bureaus, boards of education, and even kindergarten children and their teachers, have, in amazing numbers and by the power of very hard cash, been herded into the cast of a huge drama of praise and celebration. Here they sing their songs and do their steps under the skilled choreography of the National Electric Light Association and the Joint Committee, themselves the propaganda and political instruments of the utility hierarchy headed by Morgan, Mellon, the Insulls, Sloan, Owen Young, Byllesby, Carlisle, Sidney Mitchell, and the rest. It is a staggering picture of the power of money and organization, which gains force through the objective way in which Dr. Gruening paints it.

Of all the generalissimi of the utility companies Mr. Merlin H. Aylesworth, former managing director of the National Electric Light Association, seems to have been the most tireless in injecting propaganda into our educational system. And for his good deeds Mr. Owen D. Young promoted him to the presidency of the National Broadcasting Company, at the same time praising him to the skies in a Saturday Evening Post interview for his "intuitive sense about relations with the public." Dr. Gruening reveals Mr. Aylesworth advising local utility executives to get economics professors on the pay roll. "For how in heaven's name can we do anything in the schools of this country with the young people growing up, if we have not first sold the idea of education to the college professor?" Incidentally, in looking through the N. E. L. A. minutes seized by the Federal Trade Commission, one runs across Mr. Young solemnly counseling the utility people to write their own economics courses and have them introduced into the colleges, a recommendation which has unfortunately been carried out on a very large scale.

The utility companies maintain their own schools and bureaus for public speakers and have provided for the delivery of as many as 30,000 propaganda speeches a year. High schools are flooded with utility propaganda, and use utility-made "catechisms" in the classroom. In Missouri 659 out of 790 high schools took the utilities' so-called "school service." Literature of this kind abounds with false statements, such as that the utilities are not profit-making organizations. Meanwhile, under the influence of generous subsidies and the hope of more to come, our technical schools and business colleges are turning out tainted textbooks on utility problems under their own dignified imprimata.

Some of Dr. Gruening's disclosures are rather diverting. We find, for instance, Mr. E. C. Deal, of the Electric Bond and Share Company, telling with sincere pride of the benefits obtained by having his local executives identify themselves with Girl- and Boy-Scout movements and become Scout masters. Dr. Hugh Blain, head of the Louisiana-Mississippi committee on schools, reports that in vacation time "we cooperate with the playground workers and thus keep in touch with the school children." One likes to think of Dr. Blain rolling his hoop with his little playmates, meanwhile enlarging on the glories of the power companies and the moderateness of the family light bills.

Like Mr. Aylesworth and Mr. Young, Mr. Matthew S. Sloan, also until very recently on the high command of the utility companies, believes in catching them at an early age. He tells of the work of his committee in providing kindergarten children with fairy tales illustrated in color which recount the adventures of "The Ohm Queen" and describe the wonders of electrical service in the home.

With Dr. Gruening's conclusion that public ownership and operation of utilities have in reality proved as much a success as private ownership and operation have been a failure, all who know the facts and discount the propaganda will agree. But it is hard, for me at least, to share even in his rather faint hope that under private ownership effective regulation may yet grow out of the present wretched system. Regulation in the public interest is, I think, an impossibility for the simple reason that the profits which the utility people make by defeating regulation are so vast as to form an irresistible incentive for corrupting the government and capturing the regulating machinery.

If you are keen about education or politics, you should read Dr. Gruening's book. It is not only an illuminated bird's-eye view of the invisible and sordid empire created by the Kilowatt Klan, but a revelation of the fact that the utilities now stand in the position and relation to the public formerly occupied by the railroads in the halcyon piratical days of Gould, Fiske, and Huntington, so vividly described by James Bryce in his "American Commonwealth."

AMOS PINCHOT

Strange Interlude

Only Yesterday. By Frederick Lewis Allen. Harper and Brothers. $3.

TWO years ago last autumn 120,000,000 Americans fell out of bed. They hit the floor with a thud as stock prices crashed to earth, but so sound was the sleep and so captivating the dream that most of the sleepers were only partly roused. They still are hoping to slip back into dreamland "when business picks up." But though most Americans still cling drowsily to their dream, is it not probable that the autumn of 1929 not merely closed a "business cycle"—to be followed by depression, readjustment, and then another boom—but that it ended a civilization which never will, never can, come back?

There seems to be confirmation for this view in this volume by the associate editor of Harper's Magazine. Although "only yesterday," the period already looms as remote and unreal as that of the Crusades. Such a mad, preposterous, impossible decade—could it ever have been at all? The war years were extraordinary, but for the most part they were only an intensification of experiences men had known before. The epoch in the United States from the Armistice to the Wall Street crash—the subject of Mr. Allen—was so unusual that one is almost persuaded not only that men never had such experiences before, but that they did not have them even in the nineteen-twenties. The decade seems to belong to mythology, not history, to be an undated fairy story out of a nameless never-never land. We have had books on the Mauve Decade and the Brown Decades. Mr. Allen might have called his epoch the Incredible Decade.

One picks up "Only Yesterday" with some misgivings that it may be simply a medley from the front pages of the newspapers of the past decade, a photograph album of recent years. The author himself, afraid apparently that the book might fail to sell if regarded as too serious or substantial, calls it "an informal history," while the publishers insist that "it is anything but academic." Actually the volume is far from a mere compendium of headlines. It is a sound piece of historical writing, constructed with care, written with verve, and so convincing in its interpretation as to suggest that Mr. Allen—unlike most of the rest of us—either slept through the decade with one eye open or woke with an unusually lucid recollection and understanding of the dream.

All the significant details of the decade are in the volume: the retreat of Wilsonian idealism into the Harding political scandals, the burgeoning of the automobile—there were 6,771,000 passenger cars in 1919 and 23,121,000 in 1929—the career from birth to gianthood of the radio, the exaggerations of advertising, the indecencies of salesmanship, a previously inconceivable use of credit which led thousands of individuals so to conduct their finances that, to borrow a phrase which Max Winkler applied to the Hoover bull market, they discounted "not only the future but the hereafter."

Two words which enjoyed special popularity in the nineteen-twenties were "bunk" and "ballyhoo," suggesting that even in an age of somnambulism people were not quite oblivious to its absurdities, though skepticism never was strong enough to provoke effective opposition. Supreme in the ballyhoo of the day were the words of a supposedly scientific man, a certain Great Engineer, who in accepting the Republican nomination for the Presidency in 1928 said that "we shall soon, with the help of God, be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished from this nation." As one surveys the bread lines and soup kitchens of 1932, the conviction is inevitable that God did not hold up his end.

Mr. Allen is not occupied unduly with politics and industry. He realizes that the revolution in manners and morals, the thoughts and aspirations of the decade, were even more consequential. He recalls the revolt of the Younger Generation (and older ones too) against previously accepted standards. Supposedly the god of the decade was science, but actually old Dr. Darwin was less potent than old Dr. Freud in molding the thought of the epoch, though the fundamentalists lacked the wit to discern it. Before the decade ended, the obsession of sex had waned, and, as Mr. Allen puts it, "the wages of sin had become stabilized at a lower level."

Mr. Allen picks on disillusion as the dominating spirit of a decade in which—amazing paradox—braying advertisers and ballyhooing mountebanks seemed to drown all other voices. This, in turn, led to a surprising preoccupation with trifles, culminating in the adoration of Lindbergh for a feat accurately described by Mr. Allen as simply "a daring stunt flight." In the hullabaloo the newspapers failed to remind their readers—a majority do not know it even today—that a non-stop flight had been made across the Atlantic eight years earlier. Mr. Allen bases the adulation of Lindbergh partly on the young man's subsequent modesty and good taste. But though these augmented and made more lasting his idolization, the fact is that in the subtle workings of mass psychology this "stunt flier" had become the hero of the decade by the time he stepped out of his plane in Paris.

What a mad, bizarre, unbelievable era it was! How exciting to live through if not rich in enduring legacies! Poor Mr. Harding, thinking to give us "normalcy," ushered in the most abnormal decade in the history of this, perhaps of any, country. Reaching back to 1918, we can grasp the firm foundations of the ghastly war years, while since the autumn of 1929 America has been at grips with the even ghastlier realities of an unhealing peace. But stretching between was a gorgeous, giddy, gargantuan pageant which we now apprehend vaguely only as a strange interlude.

ARTHUR WARNER

Books in Brief

History of Palestine and Syria to the Macedonian Conquest.

By A. T. Olmstead. Charles Scribner's Sons. $7.50.

To the fine series of histories of ancient civilizations—Breasted's "Egypt," the present author's "Assyria," and Means's "Ancient Civilization of the Andes" (Rogers's "Persia," regrettably, is not up to the standard of the others)—Mr. Olmstead adds a comprehensive, authoritative, and well-written history of the lands that bordered the great highway of ancient civilization in the Near East. Dr. Olmstead turns to other sources than the Bible for his material, reveals again how relatively short and sporadic was Hebrew national life in Palestine and how deeply it was influenced by predecessors and neighbors, and puts it into its proper niche in history. If this niche is a small one, it must be remembered that Judaism and its offshoot, Christianity, became historically more important to Western Europe than they ever were to the ancient Near East.

Except for a tendency to describe buildings and archaeological sites in detail (pardonable perhaps since excavations have furnished the most important data for the modern historian) Dr. Olmstead's volume is continuously readable.

The Psychology of a Primitive People. By S. D. Porteus. Longmans, Green and Company. $6.

Dr. Porteus went to Australia to apply intelligence tests to the fast-dwindling aborigines. The tests demonstrated little that his own general observations had not already covered. Dr. Porteus believes, and quite persuades us, that the Australian aborigine is not, intellectually, as low as was formerly supposed. The poverty of his culture is part of the poverty of the land, for Australia is not only mainly a desert, but contained no large animals, until white settlers introduced them, which could be domesticated. Dr. Porteus has a genuine literary talent, and the many pages he gives to his vindication of the aborigines and his description of their subtle social adaptation to desert life make very interesting reading.

The Flower of Life. By Thomas Burke. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

Thomas Burke's brief tale of progress to the poorhouse is neither a nouvelle nor a short story: it is in effect the synopsis of a long, realistic novel with a story which has been told too often to be very moving. The heroine works and loses her positions through accidents; she marries, and her husband leaves her with her infant daughter, who grows up to die in disgrace. These events are related, rather than dramatized, and with a refinement of sentimentality Jane Cameron is sent at last to the workhouse, mainly, it seems, because it is the one fate she has most feared. Life is "an unconstructed blur of pain and joy and inertia," the author says in his moral, and "Life is a novel dreamed by God in a garden."

Zodiak. By Walter Eidlitz. Translated from the German by Eric Sutton. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Gambo is an Anatolian peasant boy. An "exchange of population," under the terms of the Versailles peace treaty, moves him and his fellow-Greeks from Turkish soil to Athens. In Athens this naive product of "Asiatic earth" comes in contact with the modern world and, above all, with the machine. He learns to be a car-washer, a chauffeur, and an aviator. In Egypt he manages to board the Zodiak, a giant Communist plane which is spreading propaganda for the world revolution. The Zodiak crosses the Mediterranean and then the Atlantic. While dropping leaflets over New York it explodes. The Russian members of the crew are all killed, but Gambo wakes up to find himself, miraculously alive, in the Medical Center, Convalescent, his leg in a plaster cast, he is permitted to take a few symbolic steps on "American earth" before the story ends. Throughout, of course, Gambo is simply an instrument of the fancy of Herr Eidlitz, who is a young Viennese playwright and novelist. The book is prefaced by a sentence from the pen of Henry Ford: "Shall we not some day reach a point where the machine becomes all powerful and the man of no consequence?" At the end Gambo comes to the conclusion that "we men will have to evolve quite another kind of consciousness. . . . We shall have to strengthen our consciousness so as to remain master of the machines that are to come." He represents the oldest continent, and has come to the newest to face the problems of our day. Herr Eidlitz's knowledge of these problems is as remarkable as his knowledge of New York. He talks of the Medical Center with the same sure facility that he shows in talking of the machine age. He is a European journalist who can shake headlines and history together into a cocktail for intellectuals. There is a distinctive dash of idealism. The cocktail tastes good if drunk quickly.

BONIBOOKS

$1.

AMERICAN OXFORD
DICTIONARY

Compiled by F. G. and
H. W. Fowler

EDUCATION AND THE
GOOD LIFE

Bertrand Russell

GREAT SHORT STORIES OF
THE WORLD

Edited by Barrett H. Clark
and Maxim Lieber

OXFORD BOOK OF
AMERICAN VERSE

Edited by Bliss Carman

ISRAEL

Ludwig Lewisohn

AGAINST THE GRAIN

J. K. Huysmans

OUR BUSINESS CIVILIZATION

James Truslow Adams

THE HIGH PLACE

James Branch Cabell

THIS EARTH OF OURS

Jean-Henri Fabre

WHAT IS WRONG WITH MARRIAGE

Hamilton & MacGowan

SOUTH WIND

Norman Douglas

MICHELANGELO

Romain Rolland

THE HISTORY OF MR. POLLY

H. G. Wells

TAR

Sherwood Anderson

ALBERT & CHARLES BONI

NEW YORK

CHAOS OR CONTROL

a series of five articles by

GEORGE SOULE

will be published in consecutive issues of The New Republic, beginning in the issue of March 9. The articles are an exposition of and argument for the idea of national economic planning; an effort to explain planning, to convince its opponents of the need for it, and to explore some of its conditions and its possibilities. Showing, first, the inability of the contemporary business man and his satellites—banker, technologist, consumer—to control their individual economic destinies, Mr. Soule bases the case for planning on the premise that the driving force of social evolution lies, not in the profit motive, but in the impulse and faculty of man to organize his work, his play and his group. From our experiences in 1917 and 1918 he deduces certain of the elements which are essential for successful national planning, and searches the Russian experiment for the useful suggestions which it offers. In the concluding article he proposes an objective for a national plan, and outlines the steps by which it might be achieved. The series will be published under the following subdivisions:

- I IMPOTENT BUSINESS
- II THE ORGANIZING MAN
- III WE LEARN FROM WAR
- IV RUSSIA'S ECONOMIC INVENTIONS
- V A CHALLENGE TO INACTION

SPECIAL OFFER:

13 weeks of The New Republic, including all the articles in the series "Chaos or Control"

$1

THE NEW REPUBLIC, 421 West 21st Street, New York, N. Y.

For the enclosed $1.00 (check or money order, if possible,) please send me The New Republic for the next 13 weeks, including all the articles in the series "Chaos or Control," by George Soule.

Name _____

City _____

Street _____

State _____

N-2-24

Art

Conversation with a Surréaliste

I T was after eleven when W— blew in. He had a bad cold; had been at home sick-a-bed; and "Come on and lunch!" he commanded.

"I've got to go to the Julien Levy gallery again," I temporized. "It's the final day of the surréaliste show, and I've still to get up my article on it. While I do not agree with those who find the movement as important as cubism (I don't think its achievements at all equal the cubists' in pictorial values) I can't help sympathizing with a romantic attempt like surréalisme's to reach new expression through new subject matter. Come on along! I'd imagine you would consider escorting me there a duty, you surréalistic poet."

He flung himself comfortably down. "I'm curious to know how you expect to focus an article on surréalisme through an exhibition which omits examples of at least three of the leaders of the movement," he challenged.

"Meaning whom?"

"Paul Klee, Giorgio De Chirico, and Joan Miro."

"I confess I missed Arp, and canvases by Max Ernst of the grandiosity of those I saw in an exhibition in Düsseldorf two summers ago; but then Levy's gallery is small: a bit of surréalisme in itself; and quite a lot of the paintings and 'montages' he has on exhibition amused me. I like Pierre Roy, I guess everyone does; and one or two of the Ernsts make me feel the fellow has a mighty delicate imagination. Besides—I'm in favor of these fantasies: they give me a sense of knowing what people are like, today, with their queer manias and phobias and obsessions. But perhaps you are right; the show may not be representative. I dare say the one held in the Wadsworth Atheneum in Hartford was broader. I have thought of confining myself to a restatement of the aims of the movement. What intimidates me from essaying such a formulation is the fact that a very concise little one already exists, in the shape of the release which young Levy sent out to the newspapers before the opening of his show. You saw it, did you not? Whether he derives his information from André Breton, who appears to be the logician of the movement, or whether it is the product of his own observations I do not know. In any case, he very succinctly explains the dependence of the movement upon Freud. The old thaumaturge's interpretations of dreams, the symbols of the fantasy world, and the entire realm of subconscious phenomena had fortified these artists in their conviction that as great an amount of reality is conveyed through these obscure, fantastic symbols—the queer indefinable feelings and images which pop into one's mind and haunt it and defy analysis and explanation—as through the more logical expressions. I think he says, 'The dream world has a continuity which our memory has been used to neglect. There are fancies of real validity in childhood which have been discontinued for the expediencies of adult life, and lying hidden in some corner of our mind, reach an unearthly maturity of their own. Mythology, superstition, magic, from the culture of childhood, may still live with accumulated sophistication as unrealized phantoms in our modern civilization.' Besides, who knows what has, and what has not, a good reason for existing? My one question, on reading these lines, was relative to the differentiation of surréalisme from expressionism. That, too, was an art of the indefinable; that, too, accepted the dream-symbol, the fantastic association, the haunting indefinite sensations, as a valid expression of reality. I spoke of this to Levy, and he explained that the surréalistes were differentiated from the expressionists by their conviction that the world contains an objective correspondence for every feeling, every fancy, and that it is their business to find and depict it—"

Angrily my surréaliste friend interrupted. "That's all got nothing to do with it!"

"The explanation is incorrect?"

"It's worse than incorrect! It's pedantic; and if surréalisme is anything at all, it's a protest against pedantry, against the mass of knowledge and technique which lies heavy on life and chokes the manifestations of the spirit. A protest against the habit of analyzing and rationalizing. If it's a product of Freudianism, it's also a protest against the kind of Freudian analysis which dissects every bit of spontaneity and lyricism in the interests of a search for causes. For me, surréalisme seems the last flickering manifestation of spirit in this rationalistic, regimented, practical-materialistic world, the last defiant appearance of the impulse which is its own justification and doesn't need to rationalize or formulate or justify itself, because it is its own satisfaction; because it is unquestioningly responsive, through handy means, and in utter fidelity to its lights, to a given stimulus. Its products are to be enjoyed or marveled at or laughed over—or thrust aside. But not to be codified, and explained, and rationalized. It either carries conviction, or it fails."

"I understand; but aren't you being too generous? Isn't surréalisme the essence of logicity, for all its protests against logic, for all its pretense to exploit the unconscious mind? Is not the deliberate exclusion of the conscious mind from participation in expression but a way of preventing the unconscious from manifesting itself? You know, it seems that the two minds reveal themselves only in conjunction, and that tricks like automatic writing and all similar attempts to free the subconscious from conscious control result in a mass of evasions and abortions. Hence, the elimination of the conscious mind from expression would seem to be but another triumph of the logical strait-jacket, another form of repressing the unconscious. Isn't surréalisme a characteristic product of those terrible rationalists, the French, and meaningless in Germanic and Anglo-Saxon countries, where mystical and anti-logical expressions are almost traditional? They are traditional in our poetry, certainly: Blake is in the great English tradition, and such contemporary surréalistes as yourself and Cummings and Cary Ross, in their way, too. I don't know whether Cummings is a surréaliste, but Ross surely is—I noticed the people who got up the show in Hartford headed their program with one of his little poems—"

"Ross is plainly a surréaliste poet; I think the best in America. But, pardon me if I find these literary analogies forced. What you say about logical illogicality may be true of Breton and his crowd, though I understand they abandoned automatic writing and all that years ago. But Klee and Miro and De Chirico certainly combine the two minds; they have certainly added to pictorial experience. So have Ernst, and Arp—"

"And Salvador Dali, the newcomer, the fellow who paints watches to look like saddles? From a distance, his things look like Patiniers or some other German primitives; don't you think?"

"That's exactly why I leave him out. Surréalisme is an expression of spirit, or nothing; and Dali's primitivism seems a bit of shrewdness; particularly in view of the recent craze for German primitives in the circle of the Vicomte de Noailles, the patron of surréalisme. Well, I suppose you are getting ready to go to Levy's gallery and get up your article on the movement there?"

"Not at all. Let's go to lunch. I've seen the surréaliste thing quite clearly, I think, or as brightly as I could see it anywhere. Thanks for the article, my dear W——!"

PAUL ROSENFELD

PLAYS

DEBATES

The Theatre Guild Presents
EUGENE O'NEILL'S TRILOGY
MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA

Composed of 3 plays
Homecoming, The Hunted, The Haunted
All 3 plays will be presented in 1 day, commencing at 5:30 sharp. Dinner intermission of one hour at 7 o'clock. No matinee performances.
GUILD THEATRE, 52d St., West of Broadway

THE THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS
REUNION IN VIENNA

a comedy by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD
MARTIN BECK THEA., 45 St. & 8 Ave. PENN. 6-6100
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

CIVIC LIGHT Opera Co. presents ROBIN HOOD LAST WEEK

Beg. Mon. Mat. (Washington's Birthday)—Two weeks only—Seats now
BEPIE de VRIES DONALD BRIAN

THE MERRY WIDOW

Thrift Prices: Eves. 50c to $2.50, Wed. Mat. 50c to $1.50.
Sat. and Hol. Mats. 50c to 2.
ERLANGER'S THEATRE, W. 44th St. PENN 6-7963. Eves. 8:30

GILBERT MILLER Presents
EDNA HERBERT
BEST and MARSHALL in THERE'S ALWAYS JULIET

A Comedy by John van Druten
EMPIRE THEATRE, BROADWAY AND 40th STREET
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30
EXTRA MATINEE WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY

HELEN HAYES

in MOLNAR'S New Comedy
THE GOOD FAIRY
HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Evenings 8:50 Mats. Thurs., Sat. 2:40
Extra Matinee Washington's Birthday

LESLIE HOWARD
in PHILIP BARRY'S New Comedy
THE ANIMAL KINGDOM

Staged by GILBERT MILLER
"The season's most gratifying adventure."
—Percy Hammond, Herald-Tribune.
BROADHURST THEA. 44th St., West of B'way. Eves. 8:40
Mats. Wednesday, Saturday, 2:30
Extra Matinee Washington's Birthday

A Clearing House Of Opinion THE GROUP Meets at Auditorium 150 West 85th St.
Tuesday evening, Feb. 23, at 8:30 P. M.

Symposium on
IS THE WORLD READY FOR DISARMAMENT?

Speakers
DR. JOHN H. LATHROP COL. M. SIMMONS
Y. T. CHANG IRMA KRAFT
THIS SUNDAY, (Feb. 21) at 4:30 p.m., Dr. S. BERLIN, on The New Morality

DEBATE

SUNDAY FEB. 21, 8:30 RESOLVED: "That religion cannot contribute to the economic and social regeneration of the world."

B. C. VLADECK vs. RABBI ALEX. LYONS

SPECIAL EVENT

Sunday, February 28th, 8:30 p.m.

"Should American Workers Form a Political Party of Their Own?"

MORRIS HILLQUIT MATTHEW WOLL

Says—YES! Says—NO!

BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC

44 Lafayette Avenue near Flatbush Avenue

Tickets: 25c, 50c, $1.00—at Box Office and at Rand Book Store, 7 E. 15 St., N.Y.

Auspices:—BROOKLYN FORUM—SOCIALIST PARTY

UNITY HOUSE REUNION

Dance & Oriental Buffet Dinner

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 28th, 2 P. M. at GRAND CENTRAL GARDENS, 46th St. and Lexington Ave.

Unity re-unites to perpetuate the memory of the good old summer time; to bring together the host of vacation friends. Hall Johnson and his group will be there. The Compinskys, too! Dora Boshoe, Lazar Freed and other favorites will recall a few of Unity's artistic events.

Tickets $1.00 (includes Oriental Buffet Dinner, Program and Dance). Music by NORWOOD and His Radio Artists.

Obtainable at UNITY HOUSE, New York Office:
2 West 16th Street. Telephone CHelsea 3-2148.

BOOKS

HUNGER AND LOVE

A novel by Lionel Britton

Introduction by Bertrand Russell

BERNARD SHAW, BERTRAND RUSSELL, ARNOLD BENNETT, LAURENCE STALLINGS and UPTON SINCLAIR are a few of those who have lavished extravagant praise on this novel.

BERTRAND RUSSELL declares: "I have not for a long time read a book so filled with the right kind of rage . . . I think it is a great book."

This volume, originally published by Harper and Brothers at $4.00, has been taken over by the Vanguard Press and is now reissued at $3.00. Its present publishers are convinced that this novel will take its place beside such masterpieces as JEAN CHRISTOPHE, WAR AND PEACE and GROWTH OF THE SOIL.

623 Pages

$3.00 at bookstores

THE VANGUARD PRESS 100 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

RESORTS

ENJOY WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY WEEKEND AT

SCHILDKRAUT'S ON THE HUDSON

Between Bear Mountain and West Point, Highland Falls, N. Y.

Tel. Highland Falls 340 or 930

Especially attractive rate, Feb. 19 to 22 (3 days), $14.00. By the day, $5 and $6. All winter sports. Free auto trips to and from Bear Mountain Park, ice skating sunshine or rain. Special features: The famous Max Peters Orchestra for musical entertainment and dancing, and other high class talent.

TOURS

TOURS TO THE SOVIET UNION

Soviet Visa Free '145 up All Expenses Included

Special Attractive Offer for the May 1
Celebration Groups

TRAVEL BARGAINS
TO ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD

For particulars apply

GUSTAVE EISNER

1133 BROADWAY

NEW YORK CITY

Chelsea 3-5080

Drama

Cleopatra's Nose

IN "If Booth Had Missed" (Maxine Elliott Theater) Mr. Arthur Goodman undertakes to imagine what the course of American history would have been if Lincoln had escaped the bullet of his assassin. He begins at the logical beginning with a scene outside the Presidential box, and though he ends lamely enough with a very conventional tableau, the whole is a fairly well-written play which manages to hold a certain level of interest even if it nowhere rises to anything remotely suggesting greatness. As Lincoln, Daniel Poole is unusually satisfactory, and the general atmosphere is more convincing than the atmosphere of such plays usually is.

Perhaps, however, the explanation of its rather tepid quality lies simply in the fact that the story works itself out to a conclusion too nearly the same as the conclusion of actual history, and that one accordingly ends with the feeling that there has been rather more to do about a hypothetical case than events will justify. In Mr. Goodman's imagination, Thaddeus Stevens and General Butler play essentially the roles which history has actually assigned them. With the cooperation of Secretary Stanton and the passive acquiescence of General Grant, they pursue their policy of revenge until they finally succeed in bringing Lincoln—instead of Johnson—to an impeachment before the Senate, and then, when he is finally acquitted by a single vote, another assassin arises to succeed where Booth had failed. Two years have passed since the incident in Ford's Theater, but the situation has not really changed, and it is hard to imagine how this postponement of the assassination could have had any very significant effect upon the course of events. If Booth had missed, someone else would have hit. Johnson would still have become President, and it would still have been the Butlers and the Stevenses who would have managed the business of reconstruction. One may easily grant the reasonableness of the supposition, but it seems hardly worth while to change history at all if one is merely going to change it into something so much like its original self.

Like most historical dramas, Mr. Goodman's assumes the "great-man theory" of history. Such speculations as the one with which he begins are interesting only on the assumption that Lincoln's character was a determining factor, and that the drama which ended in his death was a drama played out between two unique personalities which happened to be significant to a nation. But to sustain that thesis it would be necessary to show how a changed fate for the individuals would have involved a changed fate for the nation, and it is just that which Mr. Goodman fails to do. The appearance of the second assassin implies that the first was the product of a force, and to say that is to incline toward a theory of history which makes obviously futile all questions like the one which this drama raises. If Mr. Goodman actually meant to contend that, in any event, someone would have shot Lincoln and someone would have been impeached because conditions made inevitable the actual history of the reconstruction, then his contention is a subject less suitable for a drama than for a treatise upon the determination of history. I suspect, however, that one need not go so far for an explanation of the essential weakness of the play. Mr. Goodman, having started with a bold idea, was finally faced with the fact that he could not really imagine a satisfactory original conclusion to the hypothetical statement which his title begins.

"The Marriage of Cana" (Provincetown Theater) is an occasionally amusing but amateurish comedy of Negro life acted by an all-Negro cast.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Liberty in the Irish Free State

By ROBERT REINHART

WHATEVER traces of civil liberty were left in the Irish Free State after the Public Safety Act of 1927 have now been destroyed by the constitutional amendment which was forced through the Dail last October in three days.* The Free State now stands before the world as a country with a weapon of tyranny unparalleled in any other country that has not an out-and-out dictatorship. Already twelve organizations have been declared illegal. Four newspapers have been suppressed. One man is alleged to have been severely beaten while in custody. At least fifty persons have been brought before a military tribunal which meets in secret and has the power of imposing the death penalty. Southern Ireland is again under martial law.

When the Free State constitution was adopted in 1922, it was hailed by students of government as a remarkable document, and by lovers of liberty for its very adequate bill of rights. By virtue of this new law, which is no ordinary act of parliament but a constitutional amendment, all the articles which guaranteed those civil liberties common in democratic states, and which were already abrogated in part by previous acts, were rendered for practical purposes null and void.

The title of this amendment is "An Act to Amend the Constitution by Inserting Therein an Article Making Better Provision for Safeguarding the Rights of the People and Containing Provisions for Meeting a Prevalence of Disorder." It establishes a tribunal of five members, all of whom shall be officers of the defense forces not below the rank of commandant. No more than three members are to sit at any trial and they are to have "full and absolute power to punish in such manner as they think proper all persons whom the tribunal finds guilty of contempt of the tribunal or any member thereof, whether such contempt is or is not committed in the presence of the tribunal."

Important extracts from this amendment, which has in all thirty-four clauses, follow:

No appeal shall lie from any order, conviction, sentence, or other act of the tribunal, and the tribunal shall not be restrained or interfered with . . . by any court. . . .

Whenever the tribunal finds any person guilty of an offense . . . the tribunal may, in lieu of the punishment provided by law for such offense, sentence such person to suffer any greater punishment (including the penalty of death) if in the opinion of the tribunal such greater punishment is necessary or expedient.

No coroner's inquest shall be held in relation to a death occasioned by the execution of a sentence of death pronounced by the tribunal [a sinister clause probably inserted to prevent evidence of torture].

Whenever any member of the Garda Siochana or of the defense forces . . . observes a person whom he suspects of having committed or being about to commit . . . an offense mentioned in the appendix to this article or having knowledge of the commission or intended commission of any such offense, such member . . . may stop such person and search and interrogate him and may there and then apprehend such person without warrant, and may use . . . such force as may be necessary.

Should an arrested citizen be released and seek redress for his arrest, then a soldier or civic guard states on oath in any court of justice that he suspected the citizen of being implicated in offenses under the new act. And such statement "shall be conclusive evidence, incapable of being rebutted or questioned by cross-examination, rebutting evidence, or otherwise. . . ." These extracts could be duplicated by others equally severe, but will suffice to show the tone of this extraordinary document.

Specifically, the list of offenses to be dealt with by the tribunal includes violations of the Treasonable Offenses Act of 1925, the Juries Act of 1929, the Firearms Act of 1925, and seditious libel. Such offenses may be tried by the military committee whether committed before or after the passage of the act. Hence this law operates in a very real sense as would an ex post facto statute. Briefly put, it means that the rights and privileges originally written into the constitution, which deal with such fundamental principles as habeas corpus, inviolability of a man's dwelling, the right of assemblage, and the right to a trial by jury, have been abolished for Republican sympathizers.

The tribunal was set up immediately after the act was passed. The twelve organizations suppressed are the Irish Republican Army, officered by veterans of the 1916-23 phases of the armed struggle and composed of a younger generation of Republicans; Saor Eire (Free Ireland), an organization of workers and working farmers, based upon the common ownership of the means of production, industry and agriculture, distribution and exchange; Fianna Eireann (Republican Boy Scouts); Cumann na mBan, the Republican women's organization which supports the Republican army in its recruiting and publicity campaign; Friends of Soviet Russia; Irish Labor Defense League; Workers' Defense Corps; Women's Prisoners' Defense League; Irish Tribute League; Irish Working Farmers' Committee; Workers' Research Bureau; and the Workers' Revolutionary Party, the Communist Party of Ireland. No differentiation is made between political and non-political organizations. Hence no distinction is made between such an obviously constitutional body as the Women's Prisoners' Defense League, an organization which sends relief to political prisoners, and such avowed revolutionary groups as the Republican Army or the Workers' Revolutionary Party.

Three newspapers, the Irish Worker, the Worker's Voice, and An Phoblacht (the Republic), were suppressed at once as seditious—and sedition, according to Mr. Fitzgerald-Kenney, Minister of Justice, is "anything which disturbs public order." Another paper suppressed is the Irish World, a Republican newspaper published in New York City, also declared to be seditious. Following the suppression of these papers, the Republican File made its appearance for three brief weeks in December. As the second week's issue was about to go to press, the Criminal Investigation Department raided the offices and forbade publication until proof sheets had been examined. Publication of this issue was delayed twenty-four hours. Several of the later issues were suppressed. Its editor, Frank Ryan, who had been the editor of An Phoblacht, was arrested and charged with sedition. He was jailed by the tribunal for "contempt" when he refused to recognize its authority. At the end of his three months' sentence, he will be tried for sedition, an offense which the tribunal has the power to punish by death.

* Ordinarily it takes several months to pass a constitutional amendment. Perhaps a month's discussion ensues on each reading. This bill was forced through under a closure—the bill being given the three required readings in three successive days.

The reason for these new acts of suppression, which in all probability will renew with increased severity the seven-hundred-year-old Irish question, is that Republican sympathizers never accepted the Free State compromise but continued to demand complete disassociation from England. From the nature of this bill it would appear that the movement is growing stronger, and that a resurgence of national feeling has occurred.

Republican propagandists have made great capital of the treatment accorded political prisoners, none of whom are recognized as such but are treated as ordinary criminals. According to statements issued by the Women's Prisoners' Defense League, "none of the prison reforms adopted in other countries have penetrated the Free State . . . which took over the English prisons at their worst. . . . In one year thirteen prisoners had to be transferred to an insane asylum."

Perhaps one reason for the new infusion of enthusiasm which has been injected into the Republican movement is that a large number of the younger men have come to feel that British imperialism is not the only enemy, but that Irish capitalism, its ally, must also be fought; which signifies that the Irish will now have two causes on their hands, the second being one which might easily split the purely Republican movement still further. How much of a class movement has developed cannot really be estimated, but it may be asserted that over 90 per cent of the I. R. A. members belong to Saor Eire. Should the Republican movement change from a mere movement for independence to a real left-wing movement, it would hardly find much sympathy in tory America.

Eamon de Valera continues as the leader of the conservative Republicans. He occupies a position analogous to that of Gandhi in India, his sole concern being independence, for which he agitates only within the limits which he considers legal. In the opinion of members of the left-wing groups in both Ireland and India, De Valera and Gandhi have bourgeois minds.

Although it has been charged that the Republican movement is affiliated with Moscow, this has been vehemently denied by the suppressed groups, excepting, of course, avowed Communists. Examination of the constitution of Saor Eire does, however, reveal a trend toward the left. Its objects are to "achieve an independent and revolutionary leadership for the working class and working farmers toward the overthrow in Ireland of British imperialism and its ally, Irish capitalism," and "to organize and consolidate the Republic of Ireland on the basis of the possession and administration by the workers and working farmers of the land and the instruments of production, distribution, and exchange." The tactics to be employed are described in language reminiscent of that of Marx and Lenin. "The task before Saor Eire falls into two phases . . . a phase of intensive organizational and propagandist activity . . . [until such time as] power will pass from the imperialists into the hands of the masses of the Irish people. The second phase will be the consolidation of that power by the organization of the economy of the workers' and working farmers' republic."

The first man to be tried by the tribunal was John Mulgrew, an American citizen who was charged with being a member of Saor Eire. Although he had joined this organization before it was proscribed, he was sentenced to six months' hard labor and subsequent deportation. Reliable reports from Ireland state that he was brutally beaten by the police for refusing to reveal the names of his fellow-members. In reply to an inquiry made on his behalf by American citizens in this country, it was declared by the American Department of State that although Mulgrew was an American citizen he "was sentenced for being a member of a Communist organization." "Additional information" has been requested by the State Department from the American Minister in Dublin, but it is hardly to be expected that any action will be taken by a government which prosecutes Communists at home.

An estimate received from Ireland last month places the number of political prisoners arrested since the passage of the act at about forty, but information received from the same source declares that "the number of prisoners is increasing daily and the greatest secrecy is maintained" by the officers arresting them.

A recent statement made by an Irish refugee newly arrived in this country announces that prisoners, both tried and untried, receive "appalling treatment. No letters, parcels, papers, visits by relatives are allowed untried men. Arbour Hill, one of the jails where politicals have been confined, has no heating of any kind. Prisoners lie upon a plank bed with a mattress and the rule of 'absolute silence' has been imposed. Convict garb is forced upon the sentenced political prisoners, whose heads are shaved and who are compelled to work thirteen hours a day." Proof that prisoners are beaten before trial is alleged to have been provided by the death on Christmas day of James Vaugh, from whom the police tried to extract information while he was in custody. Since Vaugh had not been sentenced by the tribunal, an inquest was ordered but it has been postponed four times. The medical examiner's report declared that he had died of meningitis, following repeated beatings. This is the first death arising out of the enforcement of the Public Safety Act. Vaugh is said to have been a commandant in the illegal Republican Army. To what extent the authorities are carrying out these repressive measures is shown also by the fact that a Catholic priest was recently refused admission to Mountjoy Prison to administer to the spiritual needs of three women prisoners held under the act.

What such repression will lead to cannot be forecast. It is clear, however, that the Irish question, once thought settled by the establishment of the Free State, is still with us. Whether these new measures of oppression which seem to be a confession of weakness and fear on the part of the government will not strengthen the Republicans is a point which may be seriously considered. Ireland nearly won her freedom after the war. Measures such as these may help her to achieve complete independence.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1932

No. 3478

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	241
EDITORIALS:
"Let Them Starve!" Says the Senate.....	244
No War with Japan	245
Short Selling Again	246
The Art of Acting.....	246
PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITIES: I. BORAH—NOW OR NEVER.
By William C. Murphy, Jr.....	247
ECONOMIC INSECURITY IN JAPAN. By Joseph Barnes.....	249
DEMOCRACY AT WORK. By Paul Y. Anderson.....	251
POWER AND POLITICS IN SEATTLE. By Robert L. Hill.....	253
GERMANY SEEKS A PRESIDENT. By John Elliott.....	255
IS THERE HOPE FOR DISARMAMENT? By M. Farmer Murphy	257
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	258
CORRESPONDENCE.....	259
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.....	260
FINANCE: RESERVE BANKS' NEW POWERS. By S. Palmer
Harman	260
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Windherd. By Isidor Schneider.....	261
Clarence Darrow. By Benjamin Stolberg.....	261
The Kaleidoscope of Russia. By Joshua Kunitz.....	262
Grover Cleveland. By John Chamberlain.....	263
Ibsen. By A. E. Zucker.....	263
The Poetic Method of H. D. By Eda Lou Walton.....	264
A Revolutionist's Handbook. By William L. Nunn.....	264
Books in Brief.....	265
Drama: The Shepherd's Saw of Might. By Joseph Wood Krutch..	266
Films: A Chinese Episode. By Margaret Marshall.....	267

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN FRED A. KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

"I AM GLAD TO REPORT," Mr. Hoover told the newspapermen on February 16, "that since February 4, when I took action on hoarding, there has been an entire turn in the tide. Up to a few days previous to that time hoarding was greatly on the increase. Since that time it has not only stopped, but it is estimated that $34,000,000 has been returned to circulation from hoarding." There is a discrepancy of some importance between this statement and that made by Mr. Hoover on February 3. In that earlier statement he did not say that hoarding was still greatly on the increase; on the contrary, he told how gratified he already was because of "the dissipation of fear and the restoration of public confidence, as indicated by the fact that recently we have had on balance no increasing in hoarding of currency in the country." When this earlier statement was made, The Nation pointed out that the Federal Reserve note figures at the time did not support it; they showed, in fact, an increase in the note issue of $51,000,000 since the beginning of the year, compared with a decrease of $187,000,000 and $226,000,000, respectively, in the two preceding years. No support is found, either, for the President's latest statement that $34,000,000 has been returned to circulation. The official figures, as of February 17, show total money in circulation to be only $17,000,000 lower than the week before, and this reduction compares with declines of $34,000,000, $21,000,000, and $53,000,000 in the corresponding weeks of 1931, 1930, and 1929, respectively. When statements are made by Mr. Hoover that contradict both the official figures and each other, we have one possible clue to the lack of confidence in the country.

MANCHURIA HAS BEEN brought safely within the Japanese fold. The Three Eastern Provinces, to which the Mongolian province of Jehol has now been added, have constituted themselves an "independent" state. To give an appearance of reality to this action, the Japanese have announced that they will not recognize the new state, which has been named Ankuo, until "it shows all the attributes of an independent political entity." But this deceives no one. Manchuria is today as securely in Japanese hands as are Korea, Formosa, and the Pescadores. Ankuo's "declaration of independence" was made public at a dinner held in a Mukden hotel. "There were 108 persons at the dinner," says the Associated Press. "Of these, 25 were Chinese and the rest Japanese, including Count Uchida, president of the South Manchuria Railway, and a number of military and naval officials of Japan who are acting as advisers of the new federated government." Chang Ching-hui, governor of Harbin, later received the foreign correspondents to explain the declaration to them. But, says the New York Times, he was attended by a Japanese adviser, who "several times answered questions addressed to Chang Ching-hui without giving the Manchurian leader time for a translation or a reply." Tokio has many times publicly promised that it would respect the territorial integrity of China. The United States, Great Britain, and other parties to the Nine-Power Treaty are formally on record as holding Manchuria to be an integral part of China. But their own solemn pledges and the opinion of the Western Powers mean nothing to the Japanese.

THE FALL OF THE LAVAL GOVERNMENT and the return to the premiership of André Tardieu presages no outward or immediate change in French policy. Both Laval and Tardieu are of the right and hold essentially the same political views. Tardieu is likely to meet the same difficulties in his relations with the senate as those that upset Laval. However, the change is interesting as a maneuver preliminary to the national elections in April or May. The senate is under the control of the parties of the center and left; the chamber has a right majority. Laval was defeated in the senate not because he refused to allow a debate on the Government's policy, which was the immediate occasion for the vote of no confidence, and not because the left or center was anxious to come into the Government or to change Laval's policies, but solely because the left parties wished to use that opportunity to strengthen their position in preparation for the elections. That the left is fighting so determinedly, though it has no real hope or desire of bringing the right majority of the present Chamber of Deputies around to its way of thinking, indicates clearly its confidence that it will make important gains at the polls. This confidence is not without foundation. The increasing intensity of the economic depression and the growing belief that the Laval policies are tending to isolate France in world politics are having their effect upon the French electorate.

THAT ANOMALY, the lame-duck session of Congress, has at last been driven out by that august body itself and sent on its way to ratification, as a constitutional amendment, to the several States. Six times the eminent House of Representatives defeated Senator Norris's bill to end the Congressional short session. When at last the bill passed the House on February 16, there were still 56 noble dissidents to protest it, but 335 favorable votes assured its passage. When a few minor differences with the Senate have been smoothed out, the bill will be sent by the Secretary of State to the various State legislatures, a Presidential signature not being required on a proposed constitutional amendment. The measure must, within a period of seven years, be ratified by three-fourths of the State legislatures. When it is a law, Congress will begin its sessions on January 4 following the November elections, and the President and Vice-President will be inaugurated on January 15 after they are elected. Thus the old days of the stagecoach, of riding to Washington on horseback over almost impassable roads, will become in the national legislature the cherished memory they have long since been in every other walk of life. Senator Norris, who led the lame-duck bill in and out of Congress so often, must be heartily tired of it by now, but it will be a source of satisfaction to him to know that he need lead it no more.

WE AGREE WITH MR. HOOVER that it is necessary to bring about "more effective organization of the executive branch of the government." Many of our bureaus could be consolidated; a number of others could be eliminated. Thorough and intelligent reorganization would surely enhance the efficiency and, what is more important, reduce the costs of government. Mr. Hoover's coordination plan may or may not be the most sensible plan yet proposed. In any case we shall not quarrel over the details. But in one extremely important particular we feel that he is more than overreaching himself. Mr. Hoover has recommended that Congress provide for ... authority under proper safeguards to be lodged in the President to effect these transfers and consolidations and authority to redistribute executive groups in the ten executive departments of the government or in the independent establishments, as the President may determine, by executive order, such executive order to lie before the Congress for sixty days during sessions thereof before becoming effective at the end of such period unless the Congress shall request suspension of action.

This proposal is dangerous for more reasons than one. It certainly disregards the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. It just as certainly increases the power of the Presidency. In recent years the authority of the Chief Executive has been growing tremendously, and in like proportion the power of Congress has been decreasing. That way lies executive dictatorship.

THE CHARGE of Georges Léger, son of J. N. Léger, former Haitian Minister to the United States, before the Senate Finance Committee that our State Department had forced the Republic of Haiti to float an unnecessary foreign loan of $16,000,000 in order to perpetuate United States control of Haiti is, unfortunately for the good name of our country, wholly true. Following the treaty of 1915 imposed on the helpless Haitians "by military pressure," to cite the exact words of Admiral Caperton, the United States officer in charge, a protocol was similarly imposed in 1919 to permit American concessionnaires—who had been largely instrumental in securing intervention—to "clean up" on their speculations. Against the unanimous protest of the Haitian people the loan was imposed, National City Bank officials in the United States "negotiating" with National City Bank officials in Haiti. When the signature necessary for the validation of the loan was refused by Sudre Dartiguenave, then President of Haiti, the United States financial adviser, Mr. John A. McIlhenny, withheld—quite illegally of course—the salaries of Haitian officials, to bring them to terms. This course, he testified before a Select Senate Committee, had the approval of his immediate superior in the State Department, Dr. Leo S. Rowe, then Chief of the Latin American Division and for many years the presiding genius of the Pan-American Union. Although the "pressure treaty," even with a dubious legal extension of ten years, was to expire in 1936, the loan extended United States financial control until 1952—the life of the loan.

SECRETARY OF STATE STIMSON has denied the charges made by Mr. Léger. This was, of course, to be expected. Nevertheless, Mr. Stimson's sweeping denial was just that and nothing more. His letter to Reed Smoot, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, contained no convincing or documentary proof of his contention that the charges were false. The letter challenged Léger's competence as a witness; asserted that the American High Commissioner, Brigadier General John H. Russell, could not have prevented the reelection of President Dartiguenave because Russell had nothing to do with the 1922 election; and declared that Russell did not use improper influence over President Borno. It may be true that Léger had no direct connection or direct knowledge of the loan negotiations in question, but this has no bearing whatever on the truth or falsity of the facts he presented. Again, in face of the overwhelming evidence to the contrary it is absurd to suppose that the officials of the American Occupation, of whom General Russell was one, did not use all the power at their command to keep friendly governments in office and unfriendly governments out of office. This has been the whole history of the American Occupation. Lastly, it is of no importance whether Russell did or did not hold a club over Borno's head. With no support from his own people, Borno, who wanted before all else to remain in office, was exceedingly anxious to keep in the good graces of the American officials. He was ever ready to do their bidding. Mr. Stimson has evaded the real issue.

WHEN GERMANY in the final months of last year was achieving a record export surplus, it was pointed out by commentators that this surplus was not the result of an increase in exports but of a drastic decline in imports, and hence not to be depended upon. The figures of German foreign trade in January are much more discouraging than these analyses implied. The export surplus has declined by more than 46 per cent compared with December and more than 70 per cent compared with October, and the decline is not caused by a rise of imports to more normal levels, but in spite of a further decline in imports to the lowest figure for any month in the present century. Even our own foreign-trade figures in January show the lowest figure for exports since 1914 and the lowest for imports since 1915. Dr. Julius Klein himself thinks this "disquieting," and ascribes it to "currency depreciation abroad." If this were the sole influence, however, our imports would have increased to the same extent as our exports fell. But you will never catch Dr. Klein, as a member in good standing of the Administration, mentioning the relentless tariff war in which all the great nations are so unshakably engaged.

EAMON DE VALERA, thought by most observers to have definitely passed out of the picture ten years ago when the Irish republicans were outmaneuvered by the moderates and the Irish Free State was formed, has finally risen to power. The Government of William Cosgrave, which had endured for a decade, lost control by a narrow margin in the recent elections. In a way Cosgrave defeated himself. His ruthless attempt to suppress all opposition by means of the constitutional amendment that was jammed through the Dail last fall, which was discussed by Robert Reinhart in The Nation of February 24, cost him many moderate votes, for it is clear that the bitter-end republicans are far from being in a majority in the Free State. Even De Valera is no longer a bitter-ender. Although when the news of his victory became known, some apprehension was expressed in official circles in England, it is fairly certain that De Valera will not carry out his oft-repeated threat to denounce the 1922 treaty and proclaim a republic. But his group will undoubtedly move to restore the civil liberties that Cosgrave out of his fear of losing office had succeeded in suppressing, and De Valera may be expected to lift the state of martial law under which Southern Ireland has lived for several months. Ironically enough, just as the voters were going to the polls to put De Valera in power, one of the military tribunals set up by the Cosgrave regime was finding the editor and publisher of De Valera's newspaper, the Irish Press, guilty of seditious libel. This will give the new President all the more incentive for wiping out the tyrannical laws of the Cosgrave Government.

REVOLUTIONS OCCUR when government ceases to govern. It can hardly be argued that Chicago is on the verge of a revolution, or that, if there should be an outbreak of revolutionary violence in the near future, such an outbreak would greatly affect the rest of the country. Nevertheless, government in Chicago is ceasing to function. The municipality has been unable to collect taxes, largely through its own shortcomings, and thus has no income. Its school teachers and many other employees are unpaid and in need. The State legislature has refused to help. The political boss who rules the city as mayor has decided that many departments of the city must be closed down. If the situation remains unrelieved, it will not be long before the city government stops altogether. But that does not tell the whole story. Chicago has, in addition, more than a half-million unemployed. Relief funds are pitifully inadequate. Unrest is spreading. There have already been numerous demonstrations and disorders. So serious is the situation that the Illinois National Guard has been given emergency training orders, has been told to shoot to kill when called upon to suppress further riots. Chicago's case is by no means isolated or peculiar. The factors that have brought that city to its present predicament are at work elsewhere. When governments go bankrupt and their people go hungry, there is certain to be trouble.

THE SPIRIT OF KENTUCKY is not to be shaken by publicity. When a group of New York writers, among them Waldo Frank, Edmund Wilson, and Mary Heaton Vorse, took food by the truckload to hungry miners, the Kentucky authorities replied by sending the food out of Pineville, by declaring the miners were not really hungry at all, and by marching the writers out of the State in double-quick time, one of them, indeed, with a bloody head. The Harlan (Kentucky) Daily Enterprise rises to the occasion even more gallantly. On its front page it declares:

If Congress wants to investigate anything and is clothed with such authority and powers, let it investigate these sweet-scented geraniums that parade about the country, especially into the industrial centers of States, fomenting trouble, creating discord among laboring people who want to work on behalf of their families, by making their incendiary speeches and thrusts upon God, and deport these canines back to where they belong—Russia—or some kindred place. The Enterprise wants to congratulate the citizens of Pineville in EXTERMINATING these so-called meddlers from their midst, just as it surely would have done had these marplots made Harlan County that intended visit, so much heralded by their sympathetic press.

This, as anyone can see, puts the situation in a nutshell. But unfortunately for the peace of mind of the Enterprise, these marplots and so-called meddlers seem to be bringing the noble State of Kentucky much unpleasant publicity.

FLORENCE KELLEY was a pioneer all her life. Daughter of a Philadelphia Irish Congressman, she grew up with a passion for the under-dog. She started a Social Science Club at Cornell in the late 1870's; her graduating thesis was, characteristically, upon "The Law and the Child"; she was one of the first women students in Switzerland, and there came in contact with every form of European radicalism. For a time she was an ardent Marxist; but she had a sturdy Yankee background that made her want to "do some good" in the here and now. She was with Jane Addams at Hull House in the 1890's, and became the first Chief Inspector of Factories in Illinois. She knew from experience that good laws, backed by public opinion, could be enforced; and she set herself to the threefold task of rousing public opinion, getting the laws on the statute books, and compelling their enforcement. The task required a legal training; she took time off to study law and join the bar. The child-labor, factory-inspection, hours-of-labor, and minimum-wage laws of most of the industrial States of the Union bear the marks of Florence Kelley's brave, fun-loving, persistent struggle. She had the Irish gift to win friends with a quick gesture or a witty word, and to fight to the bitter end when fighting was called for. She saw the reality of the class struggle and was an avowed Socialist for decades; she also believed in the power of bourgeois sentiment in present-day America, and thirty years of the National Consumers' League work was the fruit of her leadership. Much of the "socialism" for which she was attacked in pre-war days is now accepted doctrine, even by big manufacturers, but Florence Kelley went on fighting for new causes to the end.

"Let Them Starve!" Says the Senate

THE Senate has decided that the unemployed workers and their families must not look to the government in Washington for aid. These unfortunate Americans must get along as best they can, starve if need be, but they must not expect the federal government to feed them and clothe them. That would violate one of the principles upon which our state is founded, one of the principles closest to Mr. Hoover's heart. But do not Mr. Hoover and the Senate know that no government can long survive that deliberately allows millions of its people to go unclothed and unsheltered, hungry and uncared-for? Or is there some magic in the formula of "self-help" that will save the hides of these eminent gentlemen when empty bellies and shivering backs decide to carry to its logical conclusion this oft-repeated advice that Americans should learn to help themselves? Apart from any consideration of their personal or political safety, are these men so hard of heart that they can look with equanimity upon the privation to be seen in every corner of the country?

That there is great and widespread suffering in the United States today cannot possibly be denied. It is in evidence wherever one may look. This evidence, all too briefly, and yet in overwhelming measure, is spread over the pages of the Congressional Record itself, where the President and every Senator may read it. Dozens of expert witnesses, social workers, public officials, industrialists, have testified at length before a Senate committee as to the existence of misery and great need throughout the country. The chairman of that committee, Senator La Follette, has presented to the Senate hundreds of statements from municipal authorities saying clearly and frankly that the local communities cannot meet the tremendous need. Yet Senator Fess, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, has the temerity to reply to those Senators who do favor direct relief that the government must not "support the people" because it "is the duty of the people, instead, to support the government."

It was not to be expected of the tory Republicans that they would favor the Costigan-La Follette bill, which would have provided "for cooperation by the federal government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment." Like the Bourbons of old, these reactionary Republicans learn nothing and forget nothing. In every case in history in which the people out of their misery have turned upon the authorities, there has always been a small group of petty conservatives who until the very last have clung desperately to their empty principles. But while the tory Republicans were remaining true to their natural avarice and selfishness, the Democrats were covering themselves with shame. It is not enough to say that many of the Democrats, who only a year ago were bawling lustily for similar government relief for the farmers of the drought-stricken but Democratic South, voted against the Costigan-La Follette bill because they knew that a large portion of the projected $350,000,000 relief fund would go to the industrial workers of the Republican North. It is not enough to charge the Democrats merely with political favoritism, for every politician plays that game. The Democrats want to win the next Presidential election. It appears that they are prepared to go to almost any length to achieve that end. They are constantly currying favor with big business and entrenched wealth. They will do nothing to offend Wall Street. And now, because they know that it is what the financial and industrial bosses of the country want, they have turned against direct relief for the jobless. In the words of the Washington correspondent of the Federated Press, the Democrats are "buying the next election with the lives of the children of the unemployed."

Mr. Hoover's formula of "self-help" is not only inhumane, and not only downright dangerous to our present political institutions. It is a libel upon our theory of government. Either the organized state has certain duties and responsibilities or it has not. If we agree that it has, then government is not only within its rights, but is morally and legally obligated to extend protection and relief to those of the individual members of the state who are suffering or in distress because of the faulty functioning or the unavoidable misfortunes of society as a whole. A laboring man loses his job; he is willing to work; but because of economic circumstances beyond his control there is no work for him to do. Must he choose, then, between starvation and the occasional and illogical charity of private persons? Does the state, to whose rules and limitations he has submitted by keeping the peace, by paying taxes, and by yielding his body in time of war, owe him nothing whatever when he falls upon evil times? If we contend, as does Senator Fess, that the government has no duties and responsibilities to the people, that the government exists only for its own sake, then we are in effect saying that government is nothing but the private racket of the politicians, of the owners and managers of the dominant political parties. That is precisely what the Senate has said to the unemployed. But let these men take heed of Senator Costigan's warning that if this attitude is adhered to, "the future, never doubt, will pay the price."

"Let them starve!" the Senate has said, to the unuttered applause of the Fesses and the Jim Watsons and the Joe Robinsons. If the unemployed cannot persuade their communities or their State governments to assist them, they need not look to Washington for help. Human decency is less important to the Republicans than their devotion to their "principles." Ordinary human sympathy has far less attraction for the Democrats than has the potential glory—and the profits—of a Presidential victory. One thing Washington should remember is that the depression, at least so far as the unemployed are concerned, is by no means over. The hardships they are undergoing, and the consequences thereof, have a cumulative effect. Again and again will the demand for government relief be pressed, and this demand will increase in volume. A situation that might possibly have been saved by the expenditure of $350,000,000 at this time, a year from now will conceivably require billions, or may, indeed, be beyond saving. Probably the Democrats will act when and if they come into power in March, 1933. But then it may be too late.

No War with Japan

IT seems necessary to remind Washington once more that the American people do not want war with Japan. The college professors, amateur diplomats, and munitions-makers who are advocating an economic boycott, or are spreading rumors of secret war preparations, do not speak for the majority of the people. Thus far, to be sure, the government has proceeded with tact and caution in dealing with the Shanghai crisis, and there is every reason to believe that the Administration is sincerely anxious to avoid complications in the Far East that might involve us in armed conflict. But there is no guaranty that this discreet and careful attitude can or will be maintained, and many forces are at work that might quickly compel the United States into a position where war would be unavoidable. One of these factors, and perhaps the most dangerous, is the growing demand for a boycott of Japan, a hostile measure in itself and one likely to lead to war. An unknown factor, but one laden with dynamite, has to do with Japanese aims in China.

We cannot be certain as to the real Japanese objectives on the Asiatic mainland. Japan has for years been bent on keeping China divided and weak, knowing that a united and strong China would probably threaten its national existence. The Chinese revolutionists of two decades ago were aided and comforted by the Japanese militarists, their leaders even finding refuge at various times in the home of Tsuyoshi Inukai, head of the conservative Seiyukai Party, and now Prime Minister of Japan. The infamous Twenty-one Demands and the seizure of Shantung in 1915 were clearly intended to divide China and reduce it to a state of perpetual vassalage. Throughout the civil war from 1922 to 1928 the Japanese were active behind the scenes—though occasionally they came boldly out into the open—in endeavoring to check any tendency toward Chinese unity. More than once they sent troops into Shantung, Manchuria, and other sections to embarrass the victorious Nationalist armies whenever the latter appeared about to bring the whole of China under Nationalist rule.

There is other evidence at hand to suggest that the Japanese are interested in something more in China than the mineral resources of Manchuria. For example, what was the real meaning of the proposal to "internationalize" the five principal commercial cities of China which the Foreign Office in Tokio advanced some weeks ago? This was surely no hopeless shot in the dark, no mere trial balloon. The Japanese mind does not work that way. The Japanese knew that the proposal was certain to be rejected by Washington and London. What, then, was its purpose? Opinion is growing that it was intended to provide an excuse in advance to cover Japanese aggression elsewhere in China. When, let us say, the Japanese are "provoked" into intervening in other sections, they can readily say that they foresaw the necessity for such intervention and had, indeed, warned the Powers to join with them in preventing incidents that would make intervention unavoidable. And we already know how easily provocative acts can occur. We have seen more than enough of this in the last few months at Mukden, Tientsin, Shanghai, Nanking, Swatow, and in other cities. That the Japanese are prepared for hostile action extending far beyond the Shanghai area is all too evident. Every important Chinese port has more than its normal complement of Japanese war vessels. In Shanghai harbor are concentrated forty of these men-of-war, and in the fight against the Chinese army near Shanghai are three entire divisions of Japanese troops, with more on the way. In other sections of China Japanese military units are gathered awaiting action, the largest concentration, numbering more than 11,000 soldiers, being in the Tientsin area, which from a strategic standpoint controls the province of Shantung and most of North China.

Their pride stung to the quick by the unexpected resistance of the Chinese in the Shanghai sector, the Japanese are now planning to send a large army into China. How far they intend to go in "punishing" the Chinese for their determined defense of the homeland is open to question. Nevertheless, there is already talk of a "national" government being set up in Tokio for the "period of the emergency." This can only mean that the Japanese are planning war on a grand scale, for a national government, which would amount to an open dictatorship, could have no other purpose. Again there is little doubt that the militarists are interpreting the results of the February 20 elections—in which they and their ultra-conservative colleagues won a sweeping victory—as giving them fullest authority to go ahead with whatever plans they may have. A war involving the whole of China is bound to affect the interests of other Powers. Modern wars have a way of dragging supposedly neutral and disinterested nations into conflict. If the Japanese really mean to take over and "neutralize" the important commercial centers of China, they will thereby clash with the American principle of the "Open Door." It is hardly to be supposed that Washington would sit idly by while the Japanese were thus treading upon this sacred principle.

But perhaps greater danger lies closer to home. There are, for example, the many rumors to the effect that the government arsenals, navy yards, and munitions depots are secretly but feverishly preparing our war machine for any eventuality. There are the diplomatic and military "experts," who, having convinced themselves that war with Japan is inevitable, are now urging that we jump into the present conflict and have it over with. Finally, the demand for an economic boycott is spreading. From that quarter comes the most serious threat of all. The boycott is a hostile weapon; it constitutes the use of force against a presumably friendly Power. Such an application of force would be a measure of war. To be effective it would have to be supported by a war psychology, and this can only be whipped up by means of an officially conducted propaganda campaign. The boycott is too explosive a device to be trifled with. Even a private boycott, one not supported by the government, might readily stir up dangerous, uncontrollable hatred of the Japanese. Then it would be too late to remember that it was intended only to force Japan to make peace with China.

Short Selling Again

ACTING under the spur of outside criticism, the New York Stock Exchange has been taking successive steps to limit both the effects and the extent of short selling. It has made public the day-to-day record of short sales. It has adopted the ingenuous ruling which prevents any short sale from being made at a price lower than the preceding sale—a ruling that acts to prevent short selling from exercising any direct depressing effect on the course of prices. But as Congress and public sentiment have apparently been satisfied by neither of these measures, the exchange has now adopted a new ruling that after April 1 no broker may lend stock held for the account of any customer without having obtained that customer's express consent in writing to do so. Up to the present a broker has been permitted to lend stock held on margin without obtaining the separate consent of the customer holding the stock, because that consent has been included in the general agreement signed by the customer when he opens his account. As to the effect of the new ruling, much depends, of course, upon the attitude of the holders of long stock. But the decrease in the volume of lendable stock will at least make the process of short selling more expensive and more hazardous, if not impossible.

For several reasons The Nation has little sympathy with the present demand for the abolition of short selling. There is no reason to suppose, to begin with, that the present level of security prices would be any higher than it now is if the institution of short selling did not exist. Short selling apparently accounts for only 5 per cent of the total Stock Exchange transactions. Moreover, every short sale, it cannot be repeated too often, must eventually be completed by a repurchase, and that repurchase acts as much to raise prices as the previous sale did to lower them. If the practice is occasionally harmful, it is also occasionally beneficial. However ineffective it may have proved in 1929, it remains a potential restraining force in boom markets.

The real evil is not short selling, but the overdevelopment of margin speculation itself. In a profit economy, stock speculation within certain limits performs a useful service. A broad and liquid market for securities makes it easier for corporations or bankers to float securities, and hence easier for industry to secure new investment capital. It helps the security-holder himself by providing the means by which he may turn his holdings into cash, often within a few minutes; and the liquidity of his investment enables him to borrow a large percentage of its value if he presents it as collateral. But it is evident that these advantages are being bought at too heavy a social price. It often happens, for example, that the entire capitalization of large companies is turned over scores of times in the course of a year. Cases are on record in which the commissions alone on the turnover of a single security have amounted in the course of one or two years to the total market value of the stock. One of the most effective means of restricting such speculation, as well as helping a needy Treasury, would be a stock-transfer tax on both purchases and sales, designed, like the internal-revenue taxes on tobacco and formerly on liquor, to produce the maximum possible revenue. Such a tax might be determined experimentally by a gradually ascending rate over a series of years.

The Art of Acting

WHEN Mrs. Fiske died on February 15 she was described by her contemporaries as one of the first actresses of her time. It is true that some years ago she played with great success Nora, Tess, and Becky Sharpe, and these three parts rendered convincingly provide a sufficient variety for their creator to claim the highest laurels. But it is equally true that for the last dozen years or so, Mrs. Fiske was merely triumphantly Mrs. Fiske. Many persons were amply satisfied thereby. They greeted the familiar toss of the head and lift of the arm, the crisp turn of speech and biting rush of words with unflagging delight. Here was a personality, sharp and clear, and on the stage as everywhere else in life personality is rare enough to make its ineradicable mark. But whether it is acting is an entirely different question.

Indeed, in the highest sense of the term, we have almost no actors on the American stage today. We have a number of amusing, charming, and intelligent men, and a number, probably greater, of beautiful, delightful, amusing, and even highly affecting women. And in each successive part we see them in they are merely engagingly themselves. The self they act has rarely the edge that Mrs. Fiske's self had, and in that sense she was far superior; but although they appear on the stage with great naturalness, they never present the personality of any character but their own.

We have rather grown to expect this naturalness, and to forget what first-rate acting really is like. Thus when we see an actor who, as the Englishman Charles Laughton this season has done, presents in turn two characters entirely different from each other—the one a broken-down English clerk with a crime on his conscience, the other a volatile French detective, accent and all—our erudite dramatic critics rise almost to a man and salute him as a splendid "character actor." In other words, a limitation, a derogation in contrast to Mr. Soandso, who as Hamlet or Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford is always unmistakably Mr. Soandso, or rather, who could not play Hamlet at all because he is of the Wallingford type and hence is never cast in any other way. To this extent the fault lies with our producers. They see Miss Pauline Lord play with great convincingness the part of a possessed woman, one who is not quite of the earth earthy, and they never think of her except when such a part appears. Miss Lord herself, meanwhile, longs to play comedy parts, without result.

We had an example in the Moscow Art Theater of acting in its highest sense. The company played its repertory, and their clown today was the tragic hero of tomorrow night; or the comedy heroine was in the next play her own grandmother. While this sort of thing was received with considerable popular acclaim, partly because it was the fashion, it is doubtful if the American public would like to see its favorites carry on in that way. When it goes to see Miss Katharine Cornell, it wants to see her with only enough make-up on to make her own features clearly distinguishable; Elizabeth Barrett was frankly an ugly woman; Miss Cornell is far from that. But in the play, Elizabeth must look like Katharine. Never vice versa, if the actress wishes to retain her tremendous popular following.

Presidential Possibilities

I. Borah—Now or Never*

By WILLIAM C. MURPHY, JR.

THE career of William Edgar Borah has been one long series of brilliant heavy-artillery barrages almost entirely unsupported by infantry. Time after time he has reduced the enemy trenches to a shambles which a few platoons of sturdy foot soldiers could have occupied and held with ease. But somehow the infantry never arrived.

Borah, if he so desires, can force the Republican Party this year to choose between nominating him for the Presidency and inevitable and disastrous defeat next November. Whether or not Borah really elected Hoover in 1928, as many believe, it is quite certain that Borah can defeat Hoover in 1932.

As this is written, it is doubtful if Borah himself knows what he will do. Certainly his most intimate friends do not. Many times in the past it has seemed that he was about to cast aside permanently the shackles of his regular Republicanism, but always heretofore he has contented himself with a three-year parole between elections and a docile return to the party in Presidential years. Why he has done so is one of the many unexplained quirks in his exceedingly interesting and complex character.

The Borah penchant for wetting the soles of his feet in the political Rubicon and then drawing back was first dramatized in 1912. At the Republican convention in Chicago Borah was Roosevelt's right-hand man. Up to the very moment when Roosevelt bolted, Borah was with the Colonel. They were together when a group of Progressives came to escort Roosevelt to the rump convention that made the breach irrevocable.

"We have come to the parting of the ways, Colonel," Borah is reputed to have said. "This far I have gone with you. I can go no farther."

So they parted. What may have been the reason for his decision on that occasion only the Senator himself can say. His friends incline to the belief that he thought the Republican Party should be purged from within rather than shattered by disaffection and attack from without. His critics recall that he was a candidate for reelection to the Senate during the following winter and that the Idaho legislature was Republican—this was before the popular election of Senators.

The suggestion of political cowardice implied in the latter explanation may have served his critics in 1912 but it has never satisfied those who have known Borah intimately in later years. Moreover, assuming that there may have been some element of self-interest in his 1912 decision, that is no explanation of his refusal to support his fellow-Progressive, the late Senator La Follette, when the latter headed the independent Progressive ticket in 1924. In the twelve-year interim Borah had grown to such stature in Idaho that he could have been elected as a candidate of the I. W. W.—or even of Tammany Hall.

But most amazing of all was the heroic crusade Borah staged for Hoover in 1928. In 1912 and 1924 he was passively regular; in 1928 he was militant. Moreover, his militancy took the form of support for a candidate with whom, both before and since, he has disagreed more violently and frequently than he ever did with Taft or Coolidge.

The Borah record of campaign-year regularity and interim insurgency is important in any honest effort to analyze his character and motives. It points to an underlying conservatism all too frequently obscured by the thick incrustation of liberalism which he shows to the general public. Those who fear—or hope—that the election of Borah to the Presidency would mean pulling down the pillars of the Constitution should go back and read the speech he made in the Senate many years ago when other liberals were advocating the recall of the federal judiciary. It was such a speech as John Marshall might have made had the great Federalist Chief Justice possessed Borah's powers of oratory. Also in point is his more recent refusal to support the McNary-Haugen farm-relief bill—backed unanimously by the other Progressives—because he questioned the constitutionality of its equalization-fee provision.

Something of that same reverence which he displays for the Constitution characterizes his attitude toward his own party. He often differs with the Republican organization leaders, largely because he feels the party has fallen into evil hands and he resents what he considers a besmirching of its traditions. Sometimes this reverence leads him into positions that are close to the ridiculous. There was his effort to raise a "conscience fund" to repay Harry F. Sinclair for the Continental Trading Company bonds which the saintly Elder Hays "borrowed" to make up the 1920 Republican deficit.

It is this Republican fundamentalist streak in Borah which leads some of his acquaintances to believe that he did not give active support to Taft in 1912 because he realized it was useless; that he did not bestir himself for Coolidge in 1924 because he realized a Republican victory was assured; and that he campaigned mightily for Hoover in 1928 under the impression that the outcome was in grave doubt. That may not be a very satisfactory explanation but it has the merit that, in retrospect, it squares with the facts.

At all events there must be some explanation for the support he gave Hoover—some explanation considerably more convincing than those then publicly assigned by the Senator. It will be recalled that in October, 1928, Borah swept over the country pleading for the election of Hoover, the Senator's great oratory blinding his audiences to the fact that he was urging them to vote for a man with whom he himself disagreed radically on many fundamental issues—water power, the World Court, farm relief, tariff, to mention a few. Then Borah returned to Washington. There a group of newspapermen who had known him intimately for years had been watching his gyrations with growing amazement. They were interested in such pronunciamientos as he made at Dallas on October 23, 1928, in answer to Smith's barbed observation that Borah was supporting a man he had previously denounced.

* The first of a series of articles on the leading Presidential candidates. The second will appear in next week's issue.—EDITOR THE NATION.

"That simply shows," Borah told his Dallas audience, "that Mr. Hoover improves with acquaintance and the longer you know him the more deeply you respect and trust him. That perhaps accounts for the fact that he has been the most thoroughly trusted man by those who know him best, in many respects, of this generation."

In Washington the reporters put Borah on the grill. Paul Y. Anderson of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch was armed with a copy of a speech Borah made in the Senate in January, 1919, when Hoover, who had been war-time Food Administrator, was seeking $100,000,000 for European relief. Anderson pointed to Borah's accusation that Hoover had permitted packing interests to dictate governmental policy to such an extent that they were practically dealing with themselves. Borah admitted he had made the accusation and added he had no apologies to make. The interview went on as follows:

ANDERSON: Further on in the speech, charging that Hoover had selected his subordinates from among packing-company officials and they had used their official powers to ruin independent packing companies, you said: "No man who has such perverted views of decency ought to be intrusted with unlimited power to deal with $100,000,000." The context is not entirely clear, and Governor Smith, in his speech at Chicago, asked you to whom you referred when you made that statement?

BORAH: I suppose I referred to Hoover—he was the man who was asking for the power to handle the money.

ANDERSON: Do you think this viewpoint has changed sufficiently since 1919 to warrant you in intrusting the office of President to him?

BORAH: Well, let's be frank. How many men can stand to have the test of absolute consistency applied to their words over a period of nine years? Men and newspapers who were praising Hoover in 1919 are attacking him now, and many of those who were attacking him in 1919 are supporting him now—including myself. Men's opinions change. Few of us can stand to have a rigid test of consistency applied to our words over so long a period.

So much for Borah's own explanation of the Borah of 1928. What is more important is the Borah of 1932, after three years of openly confessed disillusionment. For three years the Senator has disagreed with Mr. Hoover on every one of the issues of the 1928 campaign, including prohibition enforcement. There have been even more vigorous divergences on some of the issues which arose later—such as relief for the millions of unemployed who have supplanted those happy denizens of a dream world where poorhouses were abolished, where there were two cars in every garage, a chicken in every pot, and an overwhelming abundance of sanitary plumbing.

The question now to be considered is this: Realizing that he can prevent the reelection of Mr. Hoover, is Senator Borah willing to exercise his veto power, knowing as he does that to do so may carry him into an open break with his party? Stated baldly, that is the problem with which the Senator from Idaho is wrestling. He knows, as does nearly everyone else, that his power rests on the implied threat that he will bolt if he does not have his way. But he has come close to bolting so frequently in the past, and then refrained, that he must realize the Old Guard leaders may believe he is bluffing this time. Once he can convince them he is not bluffing, he is in command of the situation. But first he must convince himself.

Borah realizes, of course, that a permanent realignment of parties, both parties, is long overdue. He has a theory, however, that new parties partake of the nature of the celebrated Topsy, that they are not born or formed but just grow. As Borah expresses it, they must grow "from the grass roots." So far he has shown no great interest in the suggestion that perhaps the sentiment out of which a new party could be formed is already in existence and only awaiting some real leader to transform it into action.

This year, in all human probability, offers Borah his last chance for the Presidency. He will be sixty-seven years old in June. In 1936 he will be seventy-one, and with the tradition of picking candidates with a reasonable expectancy of eight vigorous years in the White House if elected, no major party would consider a man who would be eighty years old at the end of that period. In addition, 1932 is the ideal time for Borah to break loose if he ever intends to do so. He need not risk sacrificing his seat in the Senate, for his present term runs until March 4, 1937. The signs of political revolt against the long-dominant conservative wing of the Republican Party are more manifest than they have been since 1912—fundamentally the revolt is more acute today because it does not depend so much upon the personality of one man. In the Republican Progressive group Borah has the nucleus of an excellent campaign organization. His fellow-Progressives are willing to back him with their voices and influence, and there is reason to believe that sufficient financial support is in sight if he chooses to run.

It would be a gay and diverting campaign should Borah throw his hat into the ring. By all odds he is the champion page-one Senator of his times. No other man in public life approaches him in ability to capture newspaper headlines. He proved that recently during the famous Hoover-Laval conferences when he "stole the show" from the President of the United States and the French Premier. Borah, by request, received the visiting French correspondents and told them that he favored cancelation of all reparations and inter-governmental war debts, that there must be a revision of the Versailles treaty "either by peace or by force," and that he was opposed to the cherished French dream of a security or consultative treaty in return for reduction of armaments. Laval, piqued by this unscheduled interruption, made a sneering remark to the effect that Borah represented no one but himself, and within a few hours the Borah interview had become an international incident. Next morning Laval sent diplomatic emissaries to smooth things over with Borah, and that night the Premier and the Senator hobnobbed over coffee cups at Secretary Stimson's home and the incident blew over. The point is that Borah crowded both Hoover and Laval into subordinate positions on the front pages.

Incidentally, the Borah view that the United States should "pull out of Europe" until Europe sets its own house in order by cleaning up the war-time debris of continuing injustices and impediments is one that has considerable popular appeal just now. Paradoxically, in view of his liberal reputation, Borah may be the beneficiary of the current wave of ultra-nationalism, one of the important by-products of the economic depression. For all his advocacy of such things as recognition of Soviet Russia and cancellation of debts and reparations, Borah is an intense nationalist. That is the basis of his irreconcilable stand against the League of Nations and the World Court. In recent years he has shown a more liberal attitude toward world economic problems, but he draws a sharp distinction between economic and political internationalism. The one he regards as more or less inevitable under modern conditions; the other, he is convinced, can and must be avoided.

Perhaps the most glaring incongruity in Borah's public performance has been his attitude toward prohibition. In 1928 his principal assigned reason for supporting Hoover was that enforcement was the paramount issue of the campaign. The Senator said repeatedly he had assurances there would be drastic improvement in enforcement if Hoover were elected. Borah took the position that the campaign was a kind of holy war to preserve the sanctity of the dry law. To those who know him well, however, Borah as a prohibition crusader is as bizarre as Bishop Cannon would be proclaiming papal infallibility. The role simply does not fit him, abstemious though he may be in his personal habits. The concept of prohibition does not harmonize with the political philosophy which he exemplifies in so many other fields. Nor has he the excuse which serves so many of his colleagues who assert they must mirror the sentiment of their constituents. Assuming that Idaho is really dry, which is doubtful, it is certainly not dry enough to defeat Borah if he should take an anti-prohibition stand. He is not under the domination of the Anti-Saloon League and kindred groups; he regards them as clerical racketeers and has no hesitancy about saying so.

It is perhaps significant that in all his discussions of prohibition he emphasizes the importance of enforcing a constitutional provision rather than any alleged merits of the law itself. Always he gives the impression that he would be far more comfortable, mentally, if he were advocating repeal or—if that were chronologically possible—opposing adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment.

Whatever happens politically during the next few months, Borah should not and will not be ignored. This year, as quadrennially for the past two decades, he appears again as a great black cloud from the West, causing timid Old Guard Republicans to think of cyclone cellars, while their more hardened colleagues console themselves with the recollection that the cloud has threatened frequently before and has never burst yet. But there is a first time in all human events.

Economic Insecurity in Japan

By JOSEPH BARNES

"RUSSIA," declared Plehve at the end of 1903 when his country was in the throes of depression and reaction, "is on the verge of revolution. The one way to avert it is a small, victorious war." Four months later, Russian soldiers were fighting in Manchuria.

Japanese statesmen have not the blunt frankness of the leaders of imperial Russia, and Japan in the summer of 1931 was far from the verge of revolution. The situation of the country was, however, extremely bad. Agriculture, in which more than half the Japanese people are still engaged, was practically bankrupt, supported only by direct government subsidy. Industry was depressed, and trade was crippled by the fall in world prices, high tariff walls, and the Chinese boycott. The gold standard, perilously achieved in the beginning of 1930, was wavering before a flight from the yen which had already started. A small group of army officers was indignant at heavy cuts in military appropriations which seemed inevitable if the budget was to be saved, and substantial business interests in Japan were openly interested in their plans. On the night of September 18, an alleged explosion on the South Manchuria Railroad line shook loose the wheels of war, and for five months the Japanese public has had something besides the depression to read about in the newspapers.

In Japan the world crisis found an economy in which things were far from serene. A population which has doubled in a little more than sixty years and which grows at present by 900,000 persons a year, settled in a small, rocky land with iron, coal, and arable-land reserves far smaller than those of the world's great industrial nations, presents problems to which only Malthus had an easy answer. Since 1868, when the Meiji statesmen started the search for some other answer than plague and war, Japan has tried industrialization. That no final answer has yet been found is witnessed by Japan's economic history since the war, and by the intensity of the crisis in which the country now finds itself.

Whether an adverse trade balance is the inevitable result of Japan's poverty in industrial raw materials, or whether it is simply a phase in her young development, is a point on which neither Japanese nor Western economists have been able to agree. From the turn of the century, however, it has been a pressing problem, and its implications dominate the present situation. Huge credit balances, at one time amounting to $2,000,000,000, were piled up in the war, when Japan found the great markets of Asia defaulted to her and a feverish demand for manufactured goods from countries more directly involved in actual fighting. Except for the war years, however, Japan has had to face a deficit in international payments in all but exceptional years, and the war-time credits were soon exhausted. Through stimulation of shipping and other items of her invisible export, she has covered the trade deficit, but with every year her dependence on the markets of North America and Asia to cover her import of deficit industrial materials has become more and more apparent.

The process of recovery from war-time inflation was delayed in Japan, in part by the earthquake of 1923. Reconstruction after the disaster was financed in large part by government credits, which have never since been wholly liquidated, and which have frozen banking assets within the country to a dangerous degree. In 1927 the situation became impossible. A moratorium was imperative and thirty-seven banks were forced to default completely. It was not until the end of 1929 that the Minseito Government was in a position to propose removal of the gold embargo, and when in January of 1930 Japan once more resumed the gold standard, the stock-exchange crash in New York and the beginning of the world economic depression had intervened to complicate the task of stabilizing the national economy.

Finance Minister Inouye, who removed the gold embargo, had been subjected to bitter criticism in Japan before his recent assassination because of his "no-loan" policy, the drastic fall in prices, and the general recession in business activity which were the inevitable results of deflation. The coincidence of the general world depression brought further hardships to the Japanese people. Raw-silk exports to the United States, which are the principal item in the 42 per cent of Japanese exports which this country takes, declined in 1930 by 18 per cent in quantity and 47 per cent in value. The price of silk fell to the lowest level in the history of the Yokohama Silk Exchange, and the attempt of the government to peg the price by making special loans against silk in warehouses produced a further catastrophic fall. Trade with China, which ordinarily is second only to trade with the United States, fell in 1930 by more than a quarter, owing to the fall in silver, the political unrest in China, and the gradually strengthening momentum of the boycott.

The manufacturing industries were peculiarly exposed. They involve the purchase of raw materials from abroad—cotton, wool, sugar, iron and steel—the production of finished goods, and their sale again to foreign countries. This process of exchange is open to the widest fluctuations in price, particularly in a time of falling price levels. Largely as a result of this, Japanese industry has been established on a relatively large base of brokerage, which serves to stabilize price movements in normal times. The credit which lubricates this is coordinated neither by a strong central bank nor by an established national tradition, and as a consequence, in times of crisis, any profound disturbance of trade strikes directly at the financial system. Wholesale prices in Tokio showed a steady decline from the beginning of 1930, the Bank of Japan index reaching 120.7 in August, 1931, as compared with 160.1 in January, 1930, and 212.2 in 1925. Banks which had discounted commodity notes could only add them to the real-estate paper which had been frozen by the earthquake.

Heavy industry, which at best in Japan is a relatively uneconomic venture encouraged for national and strategic reasons and supported by large direct subsidies and a high tariff wall, reacted perhaps less quickly to the depression, but no less definitely. No branch of national economy was immune from it. Preliminary figures indicate that the government railways face a deficit for 1931 of over ten million yen. Nature conspired with the New York Stock Exchange in producing in 1930 the largest rice crop in history. Rice was selling for 17 yen a koku (about 5 bushels) while the government was issuing bulletins estimating the minimum production costs on the best land at 21.50 yen a koku. Practically all agricultural products were selling throughout 1931 at less than production costs, and the farmers, over two-thirds of whom in Japan are tenants, were staring bankruptcy in the face. Government finance was equally affected, and the budget, 26.8 per cent of which—or more than in France, Great Britain, or the United States—was ticketed to military and naval expenditures, faced a certain deficit.

It is small wonder, then, that the military leaders of Japan, whether they provoked the incident of September 18 or not, greeted it with enthusiasm, as a diversion of public interest from the trying situation at home and as the spark of ignition to set the wheels of industry going again. On the long view, and based on the same curious economic principles, they saw and described in public the continental hinterland of Manchuria as the salvation of Japan. The blunt truths that Manchuria can never provide a population outlet for Japan, that her iron reserves are inadequate for her own needs and can be explored only at prices far above the world market, that as a source of other raw materials her future is most uncertain, and that whatever value Manchuria may have for Japan could be secured far more cheaply than through military occupation have found no preacher and no audience in Japan in the last six months. The course of events since September 18, however, has only emphasized their reality.

Two days after General Honjo's forces had filtered into their strategic positions in Manchuria, Great Britain imposed an embargo on gold. Japan's position in the markets of the East as low-cost producer of manufactured goods was lost overnight. The purchasing power of India and Australia was adversely affected through the fall in sterling, and large contracts for Japanese goods and shipping were canceled. Even more serious was the immediate need for gold shipments to cover dollar purchases. The bulk of Japan's foreign credit balances was carried in London, and to avoid taking serious losses on sterling sales, the Yokohama Specie Bank was forced to ship gold, drawing down the domestic reserve, accentuating the tendency toward higher money rates at home, and adding impetus to the flight from the yen which had already begun.

On December 13 President Inukai of the Seiyukai Party formed a new Cabinet, and within twenty-four hours suspended the free movement of gold. This step had been preceded by a regulation of the government-controlled Yokohama Specie Bank, limiting foreign-exchange transactions to those absolutely necessary for commercial purposes, but considerable sums of capital had leaked through such a partial embargo. Japanese newspapers have directly charged leading business interests with speculation on the yen through capital export just before the embargo. The former Finance Minister, before his death, openly accused members of the Seiyukai Party of such speculations.

From a financial point of view, the results of the gold embargo and of the Manchurian expedition which preceded it have been anything but happy. The total gold shipments for 1931 amounted to 421,000,000 yen, more than twice the sum anticipated even after the British embargo. In November the commercial discount rate of the Bank of Japan was raised to 6.57 per cent and the cost of money to Japanese business is well in excess of this figure. At the close of the year it was reported that 193 banks must be merged or discontinue business because of capital requirements before the close of 1932. Finally, the spur to exports which was expected to follow the suspension of the gold standard has failed to materialize. The New York quotation on silk, instead of rising with the fall of the yen, as had been predicted by the Seiyukai, quietly dropped another 40 cents per pound. The world depression and high tariffs were factors which the inflationists had not considered.

The direct cost of the military operations has been shrouded in secrecy. It has been estimated that the government must borrow 500,000,000 yen in order to weather the current year. With foreign money markets at least temporarily closed, domestic sources will have to be tapped, and if the present situation continues, this will mean the sale of bonds to the Bank of Japan and further inflation. Heavy government borrowings, necessarily at high interest rates, divert capital from industry and business or compel these to pay still higher interest for their working capital. The indirect cost of the Manchurian and Shanghai expeditions cannot be exactly measured and is mounting every day. Its dimensions already indicate the economic sagacity of the military party in Japan.

Japanese trade was hard hit by the fall in sterling, but the Chinese boycott has caused something more resembling paralysis. Whether it is spontaneous or inspired, it has undoubtedly been by far the most effective of the boycotts which China has learned to use against her neighbor. What had been a gradual drop in exports through the first part of 1931 became an almost complete cessation after September 18. In November Japanese official sources reported sales to China of 10,000,000 yen compared to 32,000,000 yen in November, 1930. Of this 10,000,000 yen, over half was to Hongkong and Kwantung, where the boycott is not so operative.

The full effect of the boycott is not confined to export figures. On December 1, 1931, 414,000 tons, or 10 per cent of Japan's total mercantile marine, was reported to have been laid up for three months, and this strikes the Achilles' heel of Japan's invisible exports. The smokestacks of Osaka, home of Japan's textile industry, are still belching smoke, but the warehouses of Kobe, from which cotton shirts are shipped to China and India, are reported to be overflowing. The sugar and flour industries in Japan, which depend directly on the China market, are practically at a standstill. In agriculture, the price of rice went up by 20 per cent as a result of the embargo, it is true, but the farmers had already sold their crops, and fertilizer for the coming year, because of falling exchange and a rise in silver, has increased in price by more than 40 per cent.

Japan is a nation where protest is doubly inarticulate. A severe regime of police repression, if it has not uprooted communism, has effectively driven it underground, and the unemployed intelligentsia, among whom radicalism is said to flourish, are at present ineffective social agents. On the other hand, a closely knit tradition unites the country, especially in times of foreign crisis, in seeming unanimity. The labor-union movement, which boasted less than 350,000 members in 1929, has been helpless so far against the powerful financial aggregations which dominate Japanese economy. The feudal relationship between employer and employee and the strong family system which absorbs workers back on to the land in times of depression have combined to keep unemployment figures low. So far, the domestic protest against the military party in Japan has been negligible.

The country faces, however, problems which admit of no such easy solution as that proposed by the Japanese General Staff. National prosperity in Japan depends more directly perhaps than in any other country on international factors, and no student of Japan has failed to see the exploitation of Asiatic markets and raw materials as the basis of a stable economy. To attempt such exploitation by military means is an international characteristic of the military mind. For a certain time, and while the Japanese public remains quiescent, the experiment may not be fatal. Another Russian remark might be pondered to advantage by Japan's leaders. When Plehve had started his "short, victorious war" to avert the threatened revolution, a Russian liberal wrote: "The Japanese will not enter the Kremlin, but the Russians will."

Democracy at Work

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, February 20

FOR the finest and most popular act of his Administration, President Hoover can thank William Edgar Borah. It was Borah who virtually dragooned him into naming Justice Cardozo to the Supreme Court. Borah persuaded him that in the presence of such a rare opportunity, geographical and religious considerations should be ignored. Borah allayed all his fantastic apprehensions. Borah made him realize that he was not filling an ordinary vacancy, but one created by the retirement of the immortal Holmes. Borah put the fear of God in his heart by intimating what might happen in the Senate if he attempted to drop another Parker into Holmes's shoes. Hoover deserves gratitude for the appointment, although it is weakened by knowledge of the circumstances. It seems incredible, but I am reliably informed that the first three names on Hoover's original list were a man named James, of California, a man named Phillips, of New Mexico, and Associate Justice D. Lawrence Groner of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. I cannot supply the given names of James and Phillips, never having heard of them before; Justice Groner, of course, lives here, and his name and title occasionally appear in the local newspapers. Among others seriously considered were Senator Walsh of Montana, whose character and ability are above question but who is two years over the age of retirement; and genial Joe Robinson, the Arkansas pugilist and thinker, who lately has been helpful to Hoover in divers ways. Incidentally, the facts behind Cardozo's appointment might provoke reflection among those who while liking and admiring Borah, continually complain of the diluted character of his insurgency. They always know where Norris and La Follette will be found; they can never be certain about Borah. But Republican Presidents suffer even more because of that uncertainty; it was the very factor which enabled Borah to add a profound intellect and a great heart to the bench where they are so vitally needed.

IF Arkansas Joe's Southern blood boiled at being passed over in favor of a Jew, and a New York Jew at that, he gave no sign during the successful stand which the Hapsburg Republicans and the Bourbon Democrats made in the Senate against the La Follette-Costigan proposal to aid the jobless and destitute. Shoulder to shoulder with Reed Smoot, Dave Reed, and Fussy Fess, he battled gallantly to save starving Americans from the humiliation of being fed by their government—and to protect the payers of large income taxes from annoying increases in rates. Black of Alabama, one of the more promising younger men in the Senate, who has struck some resounding blows for good causes, became hysterical over the prospect of a federal relief plan which might feed Negroes as well as whites, and gave an exhibition which brought a blush to the face of Tom Heflin, lurking in the rear of the chamber. The game of the Democratic leaders is perfectly transparent. They aim at an outcome which will enable them during the coming campaign to tell hungry voters that "we did our best for you, but the Republicans had the votes," while in simultaneous whispers they remind the big campaign contributors that it was Democratic action which blocked further surtax increases. Men of the Baruch and Raskob class have convinced them they can win next November if they demonstrate during this session that they are just as safe for big business as the Republicans are. It is such a shabby game, and so deserving of frustration, that in moments of despair I can see myself beating a drum with Bob Lucas in the Hoover parade.

* * * * *

THAT prospect has elements of nightmare which are not relieved by Bob's latest stunt—his original and stimulating plan to sell Hoover to the public as "a second Lincoln." This ingenious idea, attributed jointly to Lucas and Simeon Fess, was put in practice on the evening of Lincoln's birthday, when a score of orators employing curiously similar phrases likened the problems and characteristics of the "most-maligned President since Lincoln" to those of Lincoln himself. The Quivering Chameleon contributed his own bit by broadcasting over a nation-wide network from the Lincoln study in the White House an address teeming with modest allusions to the striking resemblance between his situation and Lincoln's. By an interesting coincidence this touching performance was staged immediately after the publication in Collier's Weekly of an exhaustive article portraying Mr. Hoover as a "maligned" President. You may be edified to learn that proofs of this article were mailed in advance to all Washington newspaper correspondents, and that former employees of Hoover's American Relief Association received letters inquiring how many copies they would require for distribution. The author, Mr. Arthur Train, in addition to being a writer of charm and distinction is also a former prosecuting attorney, but his article seemed somewhat injudicious in spots. Although there was no mention of White House cooperation in its preparation, it disclosed an intimate acquaintance with Hoover's private history, and was profusely illustrated with photographs, including one autographed by King Albert of Belgium, which hangs in the White House. As one reporter to another I salute Mr. Train. In years gone by I have had some tough picture assignments, but I never got one off the wall of the President's den.

IT will be a marvel if the career of the new Reconstruction Finance Corporation does not end with an explosion of scandal. Certainly every precaution has been taken to insure such a conclusion. At the insistence of President Hoover and the new Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, the corporation is not required to disclose, even to Congress, the identity of the persons and corporations to which it extends loans, or the amounts loaned. With no example before us, it still should be easy to perceive the danger of empowering a federal board to dispose secretly of $2,000,000,000 in public funds, especially when the board is headed by a man whose willingness to aid his personal friends with other people's money is so well established as was that of General Dawes in the Lorimer case. But we have an example in the Farm Board—and we have seen the consequences. The pretext given for failing to require reports to Congress aptly illustrates the reasoning of Republicans and Democratic leaders in Washington. Disclosure that a bank or corporation had borrowed from the Finance Corporation might result, they feared, in provoking injurious suspicions concerning the solvency of the borrower. What could cause the corporation to lend public funds to an institution about whose solvency there could be any doubt has not been explained. I should have thought that willingness of the corporation to finance an institution would tend to allay any possible suspicion of its stability. At any rate, the reasoning and the result epitomize the Washington attitude toward handling the public's money—everything to safeguard the private beneficiary and nothing to protect the public. General, who is getting this money?

* * * * *

IT was reasonable to suppose that the executive officers of the government had exhausted their ingenuity in contriving means for bamboozling the public through the newspapers, but Secretary Stimson has added some new wrinkles. Under his administration of the State Department the news derived from regular press conferences has degenerated more and more into "background stuff"—meaning that it could be printed anonymously, but not as coming from the department. Moreover, the Secretary conceived the neat idea of inviting selected correspondents to his Woodley mansion at various intervals, where, under the inhibitions which honor imposes on guests, they were imbued with further "background"—meaning stuff which the Secretary desired to have published but for which he was unwilling to stand responsible. He has now gone to the extraordinary extreme of proposing that the selective process be applied also to the correspondents who attend the formal press conferences. In other words, he would like to transfer the cozy personal atmosphere of Woodley to the public offices of the State Department, thus making certain that he was surrounded only by men whom he considered friendly to him. I fear the plan is too naive to succeed. "Wrong Horse Harry" has been told that his conferences will be open to any accredited correspondent of a newspaper, or they will cease to exist. If there remains any further doubt about the level of official sanity prevailing here, it should be settled by the knowledge that the War Department is seriously proposing to withdraw army units from the Mexican border posts and to station them nearer Chicago in anticipation of the expected "red uprising"!

Power and Politics in Seattle

By ROBERT L. HILL

TO the casual eye all appears quiet on the Western front between the Seattle municipal power system and its private competitor, the Puget Sound Power and Light Company. The recall election, which marked the latest outbreak of hostilities, is off the front page and public interest has veered to other matters. But it is merely a between-rounds lull. The municipal organization has given its competitor a solid left hook and is eager to follow up with a knockout, while the Stone and Webster concern is definitely on the defensive and retrenching.

The success of Seattle's City Light Company has caused bad dreams among gentlemen of the power racket for a number of years. They fear, with cause, that defection may spread to the ranks of other major cities and put an end to their lucrative traffic. Tacoma has already established a municipal power monopoly next door to Seattle, and farther down the coast the Los Angeles municipal power company threatens to drive out private competition. These three cities have the lowest power rates in the United States today.

The Seattle system furnishes a concrete example of a highly successful municipal enterprise which has faced bitter competition and constant political intrigue for about twenty-five years. The success of the organization has been due largely to J. D. Ross, who has been its superintendent almost from the beginning. On March 10 last, on the eve of the regular spring election, Ross was suddenly dismissed from the lighting department by Mayor Frank Edwards on vague charges of extravagance and professional incompetence. For nearly two months after the dismissal the City Council refused to confirm a successor to Ross, rejecting one appointee after another and urging the Mayor to retract. When Edwards remained adamant, recall charges were brought by Marion Zioncheck, liberal young attorney, and signatures obtained to force a recall election. Edwards had been twice elected mayor by the largest majorities ever recorded in Seattle for that office. When heads were counted at the recall in July, however, he was returned to the oblivion whence he came by a majority of 13,603 votes.

"It is City Light's victory," commented Superintendent Ross. "The success of the recall serves notice on friends and foes of public ownership that Seattle is definitely committed to protection and progress for its city-owned utility."

The first official act of Robert Harlin, president of the City Council and acting mayor upon Edwards's recall, was to reinstate Ross as head of City Light. The second official act of the new mayor was to request the resignation of every other city department head who had served under Edwards.

Although Ross modestly referred to the recall as a "City Light victory," it is also a great tribute to the man affectionately known as the "father of City Light." Governor Roosevelt, Gifford Pinchot, Senator Norris, and other men interested in the gyrations of the power octopus followed the local affair closely and showered Ross with congratulations upon his reinstatement to office. Ross was made superintendent of the light department in 1911, and previously had been engineer in charge of design and construction of the Cedar Falls plant, completed in 1904 as the first municipal hydroelectric plant in America. During his recent brief vacation at the behest of Mayor Edwards he served as consulting engineer for the State of New York on the great St. Lawrence hydroelectric development.

Before the city plant was started in 1902, consumers paid 20 cents per kilowatt hour for current. When it became certain that a municipal plant was to be built, the private companies reduced rates to 12 cents per kilowatt hour. In 1905 the city began taking contracts for residence service at rates varying from a maximum of 8½ cents for the first 20 kilowatt hours to a minimum of 4½ cents for all over 60 kilowatt hours. Some weeks later the private corporations came down to 10 cents for the first 20 kilowatt hours and a minimum of 5 cents for all over 60 kilowatt hours, with a 10 per cent discount for prompt payment.

Rates have been reduced upon many occasions since that time, but every reduction has been made first by the municipal system and then by its competitor. Dump power for commercial use now runs to as low as 3.42 mills per kilowatt hour. Effective since June, 1923, residence rates have been: 5½ cents for the first 40 kilowatt hours; 2 cents for the next 200 kilowatt hours; 1 cent for all over 240 kilowatt hours.

The annual statistical number of the Electrical World, January 4, 1930, shows the average rate for lighting current in the United States as 5.96 cents per kilowatt hour in 1929. The average lighting rate for the Seattle municipal plant for the same year was 2.52 cents per kilowatt hour, or 41.4 per cent of the nation's average. In 1929 the average Seattle home used 1,027 kilowatt hours of electricity, about twice the national average, and the city was equipped with 21,389 electric ranges, believed to be the largest number in any city. The total revenue from current in 1929, for both municipal and private plants, was $8,900,000. The same current sold at the average price throughout the nation would have cost over $21,000,000, or $12,100,000 more. This is more than a million dollars above the total city budget, and makes the $75,000 taxes paid by the private concern in the city seem insignificant. Moreover, not one cent of money from taxation has ever gone into financing of City Light. It has financed its own way from earnings since the beginning. In 1930 it added plant extensions to the value of $4,787,929.11, redeemed bonds to the amount of $1,346,000, and had cash and securities for further bond redemption amounting to $1,241,735.49.

Conflict between the municipal company and private concerns has occurred in many forms. Much money was spent by the private company at the time of Ross's dismissal to defeat Charter Amendment Number 2, giving City Light control of its own engineering and taking it out of the hands of the city engineering office. The city engineer had spent City Light funds on its projects but was not responsible to the light superintendent. Mayor Edwards actively opposed the measure, while Ross championed it, claiming that much waste and inefficiency were permitted under this system where the buck could be passed around. Ross pointed out as an example that the engineering office had spent years of time and millions of dollars in building the 389-foot Diablo dam on the Skagit, and at its completion no power house was likely for two more years. Voters passed the amendment the day following Ross's dismissal, and elected three councilmen pledged to support municipal utilities.

A few days later A. W. Leonard, president of Puget Sound Power and Light Company for many years, was removed from his position and became chairman of the board of directors. About a month later Mr. Leonard resigned his chairmanship and the position was abolished. Some suspect it never existed.

Another interesting phase of rivalry was in the form of a Voters' Information League, active chiefly in 1925, 1926, and 1927 in spreading "information" which was distinctly hostile to City Light. One of the directors of this organization was Major W. Chester Morse, whom Mayor Edwards appointed as Ross's successor at the head of City Light. It later came to light that the Puget Sound Power and Light Company, moved by a spirit of altruism no doubt, had been a generous supporter of the Information League. This was revealed by Mrs. Edgar Blair of Seattle when she examined the testimony of Norwood Brockett, public-relations man for Puget Sound Power and Light Company, before the Federal Trade Commission. Mrs. Blair filed her evidence with the State Supreme Court, and Mr. Brockett subsequently was let out from the company.

The municipal lighting department early saw that the logical source of energy was in water power, since millions of horse-power were running to waste annually within transmission distance of Seattle, and one of the most critical struggles came when City Light wrested the tremendous resources of the Skagit River from the Stone and Webster company. Records over a period of twenty-five years show that demands for power in Seattle have doubled in an average time of five years. City engineers investigated every water-power site within 150 miles of Seattle and in 1917 began to negotiate for bids on hydroelectric plants at three favorable sites to meet the increasing demand for power. A few days before time to open bids the light department was informed that the private company had purchased the Hebb site on the White River, the Sunset Falls site on the Skykomish River, and someone was tying up the Lake Cushman site in litigation.

The Skagit River in the Mt. Baker National Forest had long been recognized as the most favorable large development in the Northwest, but had not been considered by City Light because it was held by the private competitor under a temporary permit from the federal government. At the time the city was blocked in attempts to secure other sites, the period allowed the private company to begin construction on the Skagit had elapsed. Superintendent Ross then personally filed on the Skagit in the name of the city of Seattle and sent supporting data to show the city's need of the power to the federal government.

The annual report of City Light for 1929 tells of some of the maneuvering:

Superintendent Ross then laid the facts concerning the Skagit before Mayor Hiram C. Gill. Mayor Gill realized the merits of the great project and its potential value to the city of Seattle and he gave it his unwavering support. He knew the strong opposition the city would meet and the pressure that would be brought to bear on him. Attempts were made to induce him to resign and he was offered other employment that would have made him a rich man. Feeling that these attempts were intended to keep the city from getting the Skagit site, Mayor Gill refused to resign and helped to carry the fight through its greatest crisis.

Mr. Ross went directly to Washington and presented the city's claim to David F. Houston, Secretary of Agriculture, who had jurisdiction over forest reserves. At the hearing Stone and Webster representatives protested against the transfer of the Skagit site, claiming the company had spent a great deal of time and money in development work. Mr. Ross showed that by the purchase of other power sites in the attempt to block the city of Seattle, Stone and Webster had indicated their intention to develop power elsewhere, and since no actual construction work had been done on the Skagit and the company was behind in its payments to the federal government under the Water Power Act, the Skagit was officially taken from Stone and Webster and turned over to the city. Announcement of the decision was received Christmas day, 1918—a Christmas present to the city of Seattle.

When developed to capacity the Skagit River will deliver to Seattle 1,120,000 horse-power, which is equal to the amount New York State will receive as its share from the St. Lawrence project and is considerably more than will be developed at Boulder Dam on the Colorado. Power development will be confined to the upper third of the short river, water being used three times over as it drops 1,200 feet in the first few miles of its course.

The ultimate development of 1,120,000 horse-power is estimated to cost $74,500,000, with transmission lines, or $66.65 per horse-power delivered in Seattle. This will be the cheapest unit cost of any large hydroelectric development in America and is one very good reason why a private concern should fear municipal competition. The city already has approximately $50,000,000 invested in distribution system, steam plant, and hydroelectric development. In 1929 there were $198.30 in bonds outstanding against the system per horse-power capacity, while the private concern had $379.32 outstanding in stocks and bonds per horse-power capacity. Seattle's connection with the municipal power monopoly of the city of Tacoma makes this the largest publicly owned super-power system in the United States today.

J. D. Ross has urged condemnation of the holdings of the private power company for a number of years. He points out that not only would this remove a source of constant political intrigue, but that it would materially lower power costs. It costs as much to distribute power as to generate it. At the present time consumers are paying for two distribution systems where one would suffice. The private company covers practically the same ground in reaching its 30,000 city customers as the municipal concern covers in reaching its 95,000 customers.

Mr. Ross now holds the upper hand in Seattle politics. He is securely entrenched and it seems probable that the near future will see Seattle follow the example of Tacoma in establishing a municipal power monopoly—and the lowest power rates in the United States.

Germany Seeks a President

By JOHN ELLIOTT

Berlin, January 31

THE failure of Chancellor Brüning's effort to obtain the parliamentary prolongation of President Hindenburg's term of office by agreement with the "National Opposition" was certainly not without its humorous aspects. It was astonishing to see Hitler and Hugenberg posing as shocked defenders of an outraged republican constitution and insisting with the fervor of true democrats on the election of the President by direct vote of the people. It was no less amazing to behold Socialists and Catholics showing more zeal for the retention at the head of the state of a Protestant military hero than the Nationalists who had put him in office seven years ago. And, lastly, Brüning's appeal to Adolf Hitler was itself a rather bewildering gesture to the general public. Only a short time previously the Chancellor had excommunicated the National Socialist leader—bell, book, and candle—in a powerful speech in which the head of the government cast strong doubts on the legality of the Nazi movement. Yet here was Brüning now inviting Hitler to come around and discuss how Hindenburg might best be retained in the service of their common country over a social cup of tea.

But the man who was at the bottom of the somewhat mysterious affair was not Brüning but General Wilhelm Groener. This gentleman, who combines the Ministry of Defense with that of the Interior, is sometimes mentioned as the possible chancellor in a future cabinet in which both Hitler and Hugenberg will be represented, but I think there can be no doubt of his loyalty to the republic. Groener represents the highest type of German army officer of the old regime, with all his virtues and failings. He would doubtless serve faithfully in Hitler's Third Reich, if it ever came into being by legal methods, just as he was a dutiful soldier under Kaiser Wilhelm, but it is almost impossible to conceive of a man of his caliber lending himself in any way to subterranean plots or conspiracies to overthrow the existing regime.

Groener views life from the simple standpoint of a soldier. During the war he acquired for a time the opprobrious title of the "Cur General," for when the first serious industrial strike broke out in Germany after the commencement of the struggle, he called the strikers "curs." He was equally stern against Hugo Stinnes and other war profiteers. As head of the department for coordinating all able-bodied Germans behind the front into one big army of workers in the interests of the soldiers in the trenches, he drew up a memorandum for the Chancellor, providing for strict limitations on the earnings of the industrialists. Before two weeks had elapsed, Groener had been dismissed from the War Office for this offense and sent to the front.

Groener's conceptions of the duties of a soldier reveal themselves in his precepts to the Kaiser at the German Army Headquarters in the crisis of November, 1918. While Wilhelm was debating what he ought to do, Groener proposed that His Majesty should go into the trenches and die sword in hand. When the Kaiser, however, proposed leading the army back home to put down the Socialist rebels by force, Groener stoutly resisted and told the Emperor that the army would go home quietly under its commander, but would no longer follow the Kaiser, "because it has lost confidence in Your Majesty!" Groener's words are said to have convinced the Kaiser of the necessity of fleeing to Holland. German monarchists have never forgiven the general this speech, holding him primarily responsible for the downfall of the Hohenzollern dynasty.

But there is nothing in the previous record of this offspring of a simple Württemberg bourgeois family who had made his way to the top of his profession solely by his abilities as an organizer to show that he entertained republican notions. However, when the republic became inevitable, Groener accepted it just as Hindenburg did. And Groener shared with the Field Marshal the arduous task of leading the defeated German army back home and seeing that it was peacefully demobilized. In the days that followed the Armistice, Groener was extremely helpful to Friedrich Ebert and the Provisional Republican Government as chief military adviser. It was Groener's common-sense counsel that persuaded the German civilian rulers at Weimar in June, 1919, of the uselessness of further resistance and the necessity of submitting to the peace treaty.

Groener's appointment as Reichswehr Minister in February, 1928, was hailed with joy by the Republican press, which saw in him a democrat who could be counted upon to make the small army a reliable instrument in the service of the republic. In this respect the Republicans have had no cause for complaint.

Groener's policy has been to "keep the Reichswehr out of politics." One of the first things that the new Minister did was to forbid German army officers membership in the notoriously royalist Kiel Yacht Club. The trial of the three young lieutenants at Leipzig in the autumn of 1930, in the course of which Hitler delivered his famous "head-rolling" speech, showed that the civilian head of the army was determined to tolerate no Nazi cells within the Reichswehr. Last November Groener delivered a radio speech in which he expressed the wish that he could pour his "unshakable faith in Germany's future" into the souls of all Germans. "The firm ground on which this optimism rests," continued the Minister, "must be the German Republic." This is a rather notable confession of faith to make at a time when most German politicians are avoiding using the word "republic" with the instinctive aversion of an American aspirant for public office to discussing prohibition.

Groener is the foremost protagonist of Germany's demand for equality in armaments with other Powers. He is always vociferous in Parliament, on the platform, in newspaper articles and interviews, and through the microphone in his denunciation of French militarism. But nobody is so insistent as he is on the necessity of Germany's arming up to the very limit permitted her by the Treaty of Versailles. He is the author of the "pocket-battleship" program, and his skill in piloting it through the Reichstag in the teeth of political opposition and financial difficulties might make even Tirpitz envious.

An amazing example of his pertinacity was given in 1928. The Social Democrats had just won a notable parliamentary success in the Reichstag elections in May that year on the issue of "food for children instead of armored cruisers." They had increased their parliamentary representation from 131 deputies to 153, which was considered a very respectable gain until the elections of 1930 upset all previous standards of value. A new Cabinet was formed, headed by the Socialist Müller and containing three other members of the victorious party. The general belief was that the pocket-battleship issue was as dead as Free Silver after the Bryan defeat of 1896. To the general astonishment, however, one of the first things that this supposedly Socialist-dominated Cabinet did was to indorse an initial appropriation for the first pocket battleship.

A secret memorandum circulated by the Reichswehr Minister among his colleagues, which was later published in the English Review of Reviews, partly explained how he turned the trick. Groener raised the familiar bogey of Poland falling upon East Prussia and Upper Silesia and grabbing them as she had seized Vilna. This menace was apparently enough to change the view of the Socialist ministers, although to a layman it was not clear why the existing German navy was not sufficient to protect German coasts in view of the fact that the Poles had only a few gunboats in the Baltic, or how even a pocket battleship could insure the safety of landgirt Silesia. Perhaps the threat of Groener to resign if his appropriation was not carried, coupled with the prospect of unpleasant repercussions from a source "higher up," carried more weight in converting the former advocates of "food for children."

Last year the Reichswehr Minister pushed through the Reichstag the initial estimates for the second pocket battleship. Moreover, he has maintained the appropriations for his department practically intact at a level of approximately 700,000,000 marks at a time when the budget has been pared to the bone in an effort to make it balance, when the public is being taxed to the breaking-point, and when funds for the unemployed and for social relief have been reduced to a bare minimum. Last summer when German statesmen and bankers, with their country bankrupt, were scurrying from capital to capital in search of a loan to stave off a complete financial breakdown, they haughtily rejected all suggestions for the postponement of construction on the Deutschland. The summer of 1931 witnessed some curious scenes, but surely no spectacle more amazing than that of German statesmen expecting the French Government to finance the construction of their new warship.

Not only is the pocket battleship sacrosanct, but all criticism of the Reichswehr budget appears to be taboo. Even the keen analytical mind of Parker Gilbert was perplexed when confronted with the labyrinthine obscurities of the German military estimates. Nothing can be more stupid than the course of the German Government, by repressing criticism at home, in giving color to the accusations of French politicians and generals that the Reichswehr is secretly arming far above treaty limits. Yet when the sentencing of Carl von Ossietzky, the brilliant editor of Die Weltbühne, to eighteen months in prison for so-called "betrayal of military secrets" unleashed a storm of protest throughout the world, General Groener replied by threatening to decree still more stringent laws against his critics.

No Cabinet Minister enjoys the confidence of President Hindenburg to quite the same extent that Groener does. The attention of the German Field Marshal was first attracted to the Württemberger by the brilliant way in which the latter handled the transport movements of the German mobilization in 1914. Consequently, when Ludendorff threw up the sponge in the autumn of 1918, it was to Groener that Hindenburg turned to fill the vacant post of Quartermaster General. Again, ten years later, it was Hindenburg who inspired Groener's appointment as Reichswehr Minister when Otto Gessler retired after seven years in this office.

Scorning politicians and their ways, it was but natural that Groener should take the lead in the movement for Hindenburg's reelection by non-partisan methods. Negotiations to this end were apparently inaugurated last autumn when Hitler was received first at the Ministry of Defense and later was granted an audience with President Hindenburg. When the way seemed clear, Hitler was summoned from Munich by telegraph by the Reichswehr Minister to meet him and the Chancellor in Berlin. But Groener had forgotten one man and the oversight ruined his plans. That man was Alfred Hugenberg, owner of the largest chain of newspapers in the country and boss of the Nationalist Party.

Hitler seems to have been greatly flattered by the Chancellor's invitation. The man who engineered the famous Ludendorff putsch in Munich in 1923 now craves for recognition of his "legality" with the ardor with which a demi-monde married into "good society" seeks respectability. Brüning's call gave Hitler for the first time public recognition that he was a power in the state to be reckoned with. Softened by feelings of gratitude, Hitler momentarily was inclined to comply with the Chancellor's wishes for a parliamentary extension of Hindenburg's term of office.

But if Hitler was exalted, Hugenberg was insulted by Brüning's action. Long before, Hugenberg had cherished for Brüning a virulent hatred. Hugenberg has never forgiven Brüning for his attempt to destroy the Nationalist Party in 1930. Brüning in those now almost forgotten days tried to form a conservative government by driving a wedge between the milder members of the Nationalist Party and the diehards under Hugenberg. Brüning brought moderates like Gottfried Treviranus and Martin Schiele, the agricultural leader, into his Cabinet and actually did succeed in splitting the Nationalist parliamentary party into two factions—one led by Count Westarp, an old-fashioned conservative, and the other by the Hugenberg machine. Brüning plunged into the Reichstag elections of September, 1930, to complete the process.

What happened, of course, is familiar history. Brüning administered a crushing blow to the once proud Nationalist Party; the beneficiary was not the Chancellor but Hitler. While the National Socialist Party rose from the contemptible status of a tiny group of a dozen Reichstag deputies to the position of the second largest party with 107 members, the Nationalists, heirs of the historic Conservative Party, dwindled into a parliamentary group of minor importance. Once it boasted 110 Reichstag deputies, but now it can claim but 44. A vindictive man like Hugenberg could not be expected to forgive the Chancellor that stroke.

The bitterness of the "German Northcliffe" toward Brüning was accentuated by the fact that the Chancellor addressed his invitation exclusively to Hitler, and only subsequently was the Nationalist leader called into the discussions. Hugenberg from the outset was firm in his refusal to consider the proposal and forced Hitler to join in the rejection. For in the race for extremism the Nazis cannot afford to be outstripped by the Nationalists. Hitler's lieutenants in all parts of the Reich telegraphed to their leader warning him of the grave consequences that yielding to the Chancellor's blandishments would entail on the party fortunes. The episode throws instructive light on Hitler's pretensions to be a dictator in the Mussolini style.

"Get rid of Brüning"—that is now the slogan of the Harzburg coalition. Brüning, in the eyes of this reactionary alliance, is the last defender of the republic and the parliamentary democracy—that "system" against which Hitler and Hugenberg deliver their daily philippics. So long as Hindenburg continues to be associated in the public mind with Brüning and hence to stand as a symbol of the existing order, the Nationalists threaten that they will oppose his reelection.

Perhaps, however, for once even the Nazis have gone too far in their demagogy. Whether it be with the simplicity of a child or with Jesuitical cunning, as his opponents charge, Brüning has maneuvered his political foes into an awkward situation. He has put them in the position of placing party considerations before country. Even from the viewpoint of party politics, the position of the parties of the right is anything but a happy one. To oppose Hindenburg's reelection means affronting thousands of Nationalist voters to whom the old Field Marshal is still a demi-god. The demand of the Steel Helmet, itself a constituent part of the Harzburg front, for Hindenburg's reelection shows this only too clearly. But by their public attitude on the issue, Hitler and Hugenberg have made a further stay of Hindenburg in the Wilhelmstrasse the equivalent of a vote of confidence for their arch-foe Brüning.

Is There Hope for Disarmament?

By M. FARMER MURPHY

Geneva, February 11

OPENING as it did in the shadow of the shameful failure of the League of Nations Council in the case of Japan's war against China, the pretensions of the Conference for the Limitation and Reduction of Armaments were calculated to make the cynical sneer. To be setting out to frame another treaty designed to check the savage instincts of man in company with the representatives of a nation which within a few months had deliberately violated three most solemn international agreements recently signed seemed to be an absurdity which approached the ludicrous. As Emile Vandervelde, president of the Labor and Socialist International, said in his prepared speech, which he was asked not to repeat in the conference hall, how could much be expected from an assembly in which sat "governments whose will to power refused to make substantial concessions" and others who were responsible for the raging of violence "in flagrant violation of treaties" and who were enforcing "the right of the strongest by fire and sword"?

It was, indeed, not an auspicious augury and the conference at first did nothing to encourage belief in its sincerity. Not only was M. Vandervelde asked to omit his reference to the events in the Orient out of consideration for Japan, but in the vote for fourteen vice-presidents forty-seven out of fifty-four nations gave their ballots to the country which was carrying on a war of aggression. But subsequent developments showed that the incongruous situation might work out for good. Many of the delegates were made very uneasy by it, and speech after speech referred to the war in the East as something which rendered decisive action by the conference all the more imperative. There is already discernible among a majority of the delegates a feeling of their momentous responsibility, and this might not have been so quickly or so fully produced had it not been for Japan's lawlessness coming on top of the world economic crisis.

The creeping paralysis which came over the League of Nations Council in its dealings with the Manchurian and Shanghai situation also served another useful purpose. It knocked the carefully prepared and adroitly presented French plan clear off its polished pedestal. The fragments which remained were then pulverized by Litvinov so that now nothing is left of it but dust to throw in the eyes of the French voters. It can only be guessed, of course, whether the French plan was intended to be a monkey-wrench to hurl into the machinery of the conference or an instrument for use in domestic politics, but if it was aimed at the conference it has missed. The whole structure of the French scheme was built up around the League, and with public confidence in the League destroyed by its conspicuous failure in the current emergency, the French plan falls with it. If the League cannot even rise to the point of showing moral courage or exercising economic pressure, who is going to trust it with the direction of a military force? If it cannot even array itself in words on the side of right, who will depend upon it to use military pressure, as Signor Grandi said, "in the service of justice"? These are questions which would riddle the French plan if it should ever be seriously pushed.

In view of the everlasting boast about "French logic," it is strange that French policy is so shortsighted. France is always exalting the League, invoking its various powers, and urging it as the proper instrument in international settlements. Yet most of the failures of the League, most of its disappointments, have been the result of secret French intrigue. If France sincerely believes in the League, the only way to strengthen it is to have it deserve public confidence. It will never have that so long as French machinations continually seek to twist its operations (and too often succeed in it) into the promotion of particular national interests, into the service of greedy enterprises, and into the vindictive perpetuation of injustices. French politicians are forever shouting about "security," but if they were as intelligent as they profess to be they would know that fairness, magnanimity, and neighborliness are a better protection than the greatest army that could be raised. In the World War France had the sympathy and support of the impartial world and it saved her from becoming a vassal to imperialist Germany. But by her course since the close of the war, which has been a negation of the qualities of fairness, magnanimity, and neighborliness and an assumption of Hohenzollern militarism, she has lost that sympathy and now stands friendless between her huge army and her mountain of gold. What the world needs is not security for France but security from France, from her insolent militarism, from her blackmailing diplomacy, from her provincialism, from her malicious meddling in international relations. If the scotching of the first dramatic move made by France at this conference means that her influence will not predominate, it gives the best possible promise for creditable results to come.

It is a deplorable commentary on the present state of democratic nations that the best presentations of the case for disarmament have been made by the representatives of countries governed by dictators. Signor Grandi, for Italy, swept away the whole mass of formulas and petty technicalities which were cluttering up the scene and put the proposition on the broad basis of justice and fair-dealing. In substance and form and in the moving quality of oratory his speech was superb. It contrasted vividly with the hard metallic whine of Tardieu. Litvinov, for the Soviet dictatorship, was no less effective in a different style. With unexpected moderation of tone and language he dissected the various plans of playing at disarmament and calmly but pitilessly exposed the hypocrisies of the different governments.

In discussing the French plan he adopted the most effective method possible by making it appear ridiculous. He showed that the proposed League of Nation's military force would not be able even to assure victory to the side to whose support it went. And how to determine who the aggressor was? And if the aggressor could not be definitely labeled, would the League of Nation's force stand in the middle and fire at both sides? How could Russia be expected to contribute to an international force to aid or work with nations which were so hostile they would not even recognize her? It was devastating. He could not help but recall that the Soviet delegation to the preparatory conference had proposed total disarmament as the only real remedy, and that if it had been adopted the war in China (not yet "certified as war by any notary public") would have been impossible. But still the Soviet delegation was not going to take the attitude of all or nothing and was willing to work with others for the largest measure of disarmament obtainable.

One cannot help wondering if the preeminence of these two governments at this conference has some deep significance. Do the sonorous, desiccated, elocutionary platitudes of Sir John Simon, the routine recommendations of the United States, and the medieval proposals of France mean that democracy is far along in the process of decay? Or that they are only in the act of sloughing off the old dead skin and will appear in a new and brighter coat with the coming generations? The latter may be the case, but the circumstance that the most vital contributions made so far to this conference have been from countries operating under a changed order suggests that it is no coincidence but the writing on the wall.

The sense of great responsibility evinced by most of the delegates is an encouraging omen. There have been other heartening things, like the deposit of petitions containing 8,000,000 names collected by fifteen international women's organizations representing fifty-six countries, the demand of students that they shall not be slaughtered on the threshold of active life, and the promise of the Socialist labor organizations that when next called to war, if they do not actually throw away their arms, they will at least not use them against one another.

The threat to substantial success, given the delegates' sense of their grave duty and the tremendous public support accorded them, lies in the fear that with the best intentions in the world the delegates will not be able to rise above the level of the befuddled statesmen in most of the governments of the world. They are trying to run a modern world according to the rules of forgotten centuries. Can the delegates to the disarmament conference be expected to perform more intelligently than their sponsors?

In the Driftway

SEVENTY-FIVE years ago the steamship Bremen made her first Atlantic crossing in twelve days and ten hours; her namesake, owned by the same company, the North German Lloyd, now grandly traverses the broad ocean in hardly more than a third of that time. The little Bremen was 334 feet long and 42 feet broad; the modern greyhound is three times as long and more than twice as wide. Between the measurements of the two lies much of the history of steamship travel. When the first Bremen was launched, steamship travel was slow, costly, and irregular. The darling of the seas was the proud, wilful, and handsome clipper ship which made the United States of America maritimately famous. The Drifter confesses to an incurable weakness for the clipper; report has it that she shipped a lot of water and was uncomfortable to sail in, but she was fast and when the canvas was fully spread she was in beauty second to no other invention of man.

* * * * *

STEAM, however, was stealing up on the clipper. Through the eighties thirties and forties various steam-driven vessels crossed the Western ocean in fifteen to twenty-five days, all equipped with sails, which whenever possible they made use of. Even the Bremen of 1858 had her sails—three masts of them—with which she saved coal. Coal was the great stumbling-block of the earliest steamships. The new and clumsy engines burned enormous quantities of fuel; the Royal William, one of whose owners was Samuel Cunard of shipowning fame, which crossed the ocean in 1833, burned 330 tons for the trip. Not until five years later did a ship make the passage with a condenser for her boilers; salt water had been used until that time, and the change marked an important milestone in steam navigation. Another milestone was passed in 1840 when Samuel Cunard started the first regular transatlantic service, with four ships—built of wood, incidentally, instead of iron. The North German Lloyd Company, therefore, came along in good enough time, eighteen years later, when most ocean voyages were still being made under sail, but when the new machine, the mechanical sail, was slowly but surely drawing ahead of its ancient and honored rival.

WITH the passing of the sail something touching and lovely has gone from the sea. Yet the Drifter is not able to see one of the great modern liners without a twinge of the heart. It is so confident, so stately, so strong. It divides the waters with such a sure and steady stroke, its black smoke streams away so firmly, its clean decks are so easy to walk upon, its brass is so bright, its beds are so fresh. In crossing the Atlantic Ocean, often unfriendly enough, there is much to be said for a firm planking and a dry blanket, for food not too salty, for a shore not too many days away. The Drifter can be as romantic as anyone at the sight of a four-masted schooner lying idly at anchor in New York harbor, or even passing discreetly along the coast with all sails set and spray flying. But when he thinks of the month-long crossings, the sea-wet clothing, the dank, ill-smelling holds, the ship's biscuit and the leathery beef, the slippery decks washed by hostile waves, he is somewhat unconvinced. He remembers the voyage of Abigail Adams and her children, bravely crossing to France to join the Ambassador; Abigail was gallant to the last, but she hated her little bunk divided by a curtain from the main—and only—cabin; she hated being kept from above decks on every day but the mildest; she hated the inescapable smell. Thirty days of it she had to try her. Recalling that voyage and many like it, the Drifter is perfectly content to walk up a modern gangplank and board a liner that will carry him, with very small chance of failure, across as many waters as he wants to go. He knows he will sleep at night, eat at mealtimes, and walk the decks confidently by day, which at his advanced age is very consoling.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Sixty-seven Years of The Nation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I be permitted to relate a very small bit of personal history and to offer what I think is an important suggestion? I have experienced in my life the extraordinary good fortune of having been a subscriber to The Nation most of the time from its beginning until now, and a reader of it all the time. I read its very first issue, and was so delighted with its fine spirit, its splendid forward look, its scholarship, its daring, and the brilliant pen of Mr. Godkin, its editor, that I subscribed at once. Of course that was a small matter, but it led to something else.

I was then a student at the University of Chicago, and I conceived the idea of organizing a Nation club. The idea met with favor, and soon we had such a club formed, consisting of upper classmen and members of the faculty. We met every Thursday evening in one of the larger rooms of the university. The purpose of the club was to discuss the last number of The Nation, all the members being pledged to read it before coming to the meeting.

Well, we soon became enthusiastic. We had not dreamed that such awakening, mind-provoking, illuminating discussions were possible. Each issue of The Nation brought, in condensed and fine form, information concerning the most significant new books. Also each issue brought striking and challenging articles on these and other themes from the ablest pens. To spend an evening each week, with a company of alert and eager minds, thinking about, digging into, criticizing, weighing, trying to form intelligent judgments on such living, vital matters was a new and amazingly stimulating kind of education. In my long life I have belonged to many clubs; but I have never found one of equal value as a mental stimulus and as a means of keeping posted on the most important events of the world.

Mr. Editor, I venture to write this letter in order to inquire of your readers whether there ought not to be just such clubs all over this land, in every college and university and in every town and city. Ten thousand such clubs would in ten years revolutionize (or, better, evolutionize) the country's public thinking and give us a new America.

Ann Arbor, Mich., February 11

J. T. SUNDERLAND

Public and Private Ownership

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When I read in The Nation of January 6 Carl F. Kirchner's letter criticizing your circular letter of October 23, I was reminded of another letter written to the New York Tribune in 1865 by its correspondent Albert D. Richardson, when he was touring the far West with Schuyler Colfax and others. He wrote, in part:

When the operations of the Wells Fargo [Express] Company were confined to the Pacific Coast and the steamers between San Francisco and New York, it transported 12,300,000 letters annually. Two and a quarter millions of writers paid nine and a half cents extra not to have their letters pass through the circumlocution office. What stronger proof of the folly of government's conveying letters? It might with as much propriety sell groceries, convey heavy freights, or deliver washing. Abolish the Post Office Department! Leave this, like other carrying trade, open to private competition, and the mail service of the United States would be performed 50 per cent cheaper and 100 per cent better than it is today.

How strangely like the sixth paragraph of Mr. Kirchner's letter this sounds! Verily, there are always those who rail against anything and everything that sounds like progress.

A few weeks after writing the above-mentioned letter to the Tribune, Mr. Richardson wrote the following:

The Union Pacific Railroad, working from Omaha, Nebraska, westward, receives in government bonds $16,000, $32,000 or $48,000 for every mile of road finished—$16,000 where the route is level and grading light, $32,000 among the foothills, and $48,000 in the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevadas. The company also acquires absolutely 13,000 acres of land per mile along its line. In addition it has a donation of nearly a half-million dollars in bonds from San Francisco and thirty acres of valuable land in the city limits from Sacramento.

Private ownership is successful when publicly financed!
Birmingham, Ala., January 8

ARLIE BARBER

Not Roman but Romanic

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the letter of Romain Rolland's on Mahatma Gandhi (February 10) you make Rolland say that the Roman bourgeoisie quivered with rage when he, Gandhi, left. This is, of course, misleading. Rolland meant the Romanic, or French-Swiss, bourgeoisie (la bourgeoisie romande). He judges the Swiss bourgeoisie at its true value, for not only French but also German Switzerland has abandoned its old liberal and progressive policies and is pursuing a reactionary and capitalistic course.

Washington, D. C., February 7

DR. A.

Contributors to This Issue

WILLIAM C. MURPHY, JR., is on the Washington staff of the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

JOSEPH BARNES has just returned from a trip to Russia and the Far East.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

ROBERT L. HILL founded and edited the Free Lance while at the University of Washington.

JOHN ELLIOTT is the Berlin correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune.

M. FARMER MURPHY is foreign correspondent for the Baltimore Sun.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

BENJAMIN STOLBERG is a writer on educational and other subjects for current periodicals.

JOSHUA KUNITZ is lecturer on Soviet literature at the New School for Social Research.

JOHN CHAMBERLAIN is on the staff of the New York Times Book Review.

A. E. ZUCKER is professor of modern languages and comparative literature at the University of Maryland, and author of "Ibsen, the Master Builder."

EDA LOU WALTON is associate professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University, and author of "Jane Matthew and Other Poems."

WILLIAM L. NUNN was formerly instructor in economics at the University of Pittsburgh.

Finance

Reserve Banks' New Powers

TO the extent that the Glass-Steagall banking bill throws restrictions around the enlarged lending powers of the Federal Reserve banks, to that extent it nullifies the possibility of inflation by fiat upon which many people seem to be reckoning as a cure for depression. The pending legislation does not fling open the doors of the Federal Reserve to any and all banks, but only to those which have exhausted their borrowing powers, or which are willing to band together in groups of at least five for the purpose of applying jointly for loans. In such cases the approval of at least six members of the Federal Reserve Board is required before a loan is granted, and a penalty rate at least one per cent above the current discount rate is to be charged.

It is hard to conceive of a new flood of credit being put into circulation under such conditions, and it should not have been necessary for the Washington authorities to explain so earnestly that no inflation—at least, not much inflation—is contemplated. Yet many in Washington, and elsewhere, still cling to the idea that inflation is a matter of the will, a thing which we can take or leave, according as it suits our purpose. None of the exploiters of the current financial measures has explained how currency is to be issued if people do not demand it from the banks, nor how bank loans are to be expanded if good borrowers do not wish to borrow, nor how commodity prices are to be raised if people will not buy. There is, to be sure, one way to accomplish these ends, which is for the government itself to do the borrowing and spending.

If the government will spend only so much as it takes from the taxpayers' pockets, or announce firm plans for doing so, the rather silly talk about inflating, anti-deflating, "reflating," and the like will be stilled, a substantial basis for public confidence could be established, and a wholesome expansion of bank loans could take place, along with a normal recovery in commodity prices, without a suggestion of inflation. In that case the new bank law would stand revealed in its proper setting as an emergency measure designed, like the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to buttress the weak spots in the present credit structure.

As to whether the Federal Reserve banks should have, as a matter of course, authority to make loans on long-term securities and other investment collateral, strong differences of opinion exist. Such powers are possessed by the European banks of issue, and if used with discretion are undoubtedly helpful. Good management should be hampered as little as possible by rigid rules and legislative dicta. Before concluding that our banks should follow the European pattern, however, it would be well to inquire carefully whether the pattern is applicable here. Ever since the flood of the world's gold set toward us, as a result of war, we have had a surplus of liquid resources above what could normally be employed in business, with the result that it was employed abnormally in the security markets. Some kink in the distributive process prevented these resources from being fully used in permanent, long-term investments, so that they largely took the form of short-term bank credits. Consequently, our banking machine has been geared to the stock market in a way which is practically unheard of abroad. The doctrine that stock speculation is a national vocation, as much entitled to bank credit as manufacturing and trade, is one that should be reckoned with before discretionary powers are granted to the Federal Reserve banks to lend on securities.

S. PALMER HARMAN

TOURS TO SOVIET RUSSIA for STUDENTS — TOURISTS SCIENTISTS

Weekly departures from New York
by Fast Steamers

Special Excursion for the MAY DAY CELEBRATIONS

Sailing on the
S.S. NEW YORK . . . APRIL 14

Moderate Rates in All Classes
Visas and other details quickly arranged

Consult your Travel Agent or HAMBURG-AMERICAN
39 Broadway LINE New York

Books, Drama, Films

Windherd

By ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

Rides the wind heavily, forth himself shouting, on his own flanks shoot his whips.
We hear him the moonedge scraping by its rasp,
or the cloud stonier, clinking hail.
Herdsman of sounds, he follows surf thunderously grazing.

Now

he effervesces in the trees; he seethes the grass.
Our windows cough his phlegm. Quick we endear
Quiet, our house pet, on a sound's tooth dying.
His horn mouth he on the chimney strikes; reaches his quick hand down, and grips the flame, by its hunting fingers;
whereat the coals, in black cat huddle, scream from their fire mouths.

Afar we hear the mob waves panic, crowding and gnashing spume;

and the sky, metal and cold, splitting with icy rust.

Clarence Darrow

The Story of My Life. By Clarence Darrow. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

MR. DARROW is not a great man. He is a great personality. The distinction is moot. But the difference is vital. He is not a great jurist or philosopher or social statesman. He is shrewd, he is often wise, he is colorful, he is very human, and he has an unerring gift for the middle of the stage. He has lived in the congenital limelight of a dramatic egocentricity; and he has illumined many things around him. And, of course, each melodramatic chapter in his career has a grand story behind it. But unlike Emma Goldman and Lincoln Steffens, who in their vividness and unconscious attraction toward the spotlight resemble him, he refuses to divulge his tales out of school; which is too bad. A great man, a Carlylean hero, can afford to write a bland autobiography if he so chooses. For history will speak for him. But an interesting character, about whom the main thing is not his views or his deeds but his life, does himself an injustice when he writes an official autobiography. And Mr. Darrow has done himself precisely such a disservice. He is a vastly more experienced man than his memoirs indicate. His book reads as though it had been carelessly dictated to a stenographer.

Professionally Mr. Darrow is a lawyer, with a tendency to rescue the under-dog from the predicament of dramatic injustice. Avocationally he has always been interested in atheism and scientific determinism, with especial regard to biology. And both his professional and avocational views he has had the rare good fortune to argue in court.

As a lawyer Mr. Darrow has contributed little to disciplined jurisprudence, to the philosophical clarification of the law, even in labor disputes or in criminal treatment, which were his main interests. Mr. Darrow is a great trial lawyer in criminal cases, a really uncanny bewitcher of juries. And it was as a trial lawyer, rather than as a jurist, that he won and lost in his great labor cases: the Debs case in 1893, the Haywood-Moyer-Pettibone case in 1905-06, and the McNamara case in 1911.

Yet in none of these trials does Mr. Darrow take the reader behind the scenes. And he fails to point out their social significance. After all, the Socialist Party, as we now know it, received its indigenous impetus when Debs embraced it in jail. The I. W. W., and its profound syndicalist influence on our more proletarian sects, had much, almost everything, to do with Haywood's experience in Idaho. And the McNamara shock to American labor literally changed its entire direction, as Louis Adamic has so brilliantly pointed out in "Dynamite." But Mr. Darrow is satisfied with a mere epitome of these celebrated affairs. It is also unfortunate that he fails to bring out the deeply tortured controversies of the McNamara tragedy—controversies which Jim McNamara and Schmidt explained to the present writer, with all the objectivity of men whose hurts have deadened all hope, during two unforgettable hours at San Quentin.

Mr. Darrow's open atheism is extremely attractive. There are, of course, no agnostics. They are merely scared atheists who rationalize their fear. Still, Mr. Darrow constantly harps on an Ingersoll atheism, which is socially antiquated in its irrelevance to the contemporary problem of religion. During the Scopes case he brought out all the village-atheist objections to Holy Writ on the ground of its bad geology, its magic obstetrics, the incredible biochemistry of Lot's wife. He laughed at the sacred cosmogony and the homiletic biology of Mr. Bryan. But what really endangers the civilization of civilized men is not that the poetry of the Bible does not work in the laboratory, but that in our twentieth century, organized religion of any kind, as a social force, is the deadly enemy of the scientific outlook, the humane rationalism, and the Socialist direction without which modern society simply cannot go on. And because Mr. Darrow failed to think through the religious predicament of the modern world, he permitted the Scopes case to point the triumph, not of "science" and evolution, but of modernism in religion—whose influence is obviously more harmful to the life of the mind than the dying rattles in the fundamentalist throat. Toward the end of his book Mr. Darrow apparently realizes this, for he records his discouragement when Messrs. Eddington and Jeans appointed the Lord to a fellowship in pure mathematics at Cambridge.

Mr. Darrow has been a voracious lay reader in biology all his life. But there, again, he is still fighting the battles of Huxley, albeit he naturally dispenses with Huxley's tactical reverence for evolution. On the contrary, he constantly dwells on the vanity which is behind natural selection, and on many occasions he contemplates his own birth as an infinitesimal accident which he deems very absurd and uncalled for. When man is once born, however, Mr. Darrow thinks of him, with Huxley, as a "manikin," wound up and determined, a sort of etiological puppet. In this view we are all psycho-physical parallelograms, in the utter grip of its forces. This leads Mr. Darrow to his favorite theory that no man can help being and doing just as he is and behaves. John Doe was a fait accompli from the beginning of time. And it is on this old-fashioned biological determinism that Mr. Darrow rears his very wise and very humane criminology; which again is a pity. For one should be able to subscribe to a decent and enlightened penology without having it rest on a Victorian mechanism.

It is in the Leopold and Loeb case, which is the most famous of the hundreds of criminal cases in which Mr. Darrow did brilliant and just defense, that he especially illustrates his homely materialism. Leopold and Loeb murdered a child for reasons, Mr. Darrow insists, which no man in his finite ignorance could possibly fathom. It seems that in the infinite past a concatenation of circumstances nebularly began which eventuated in a hammer held in the hand of Loeb and landing on the head of the Frank boy. That is all very well. Yet it would have been extremely illuminating if Mr. Darrow had added that the case was a sex crime. It is far wiser penology not to hang but to treat sex criminals, if possible, than it is to refrain from hanging mere puppets of biochemical "determinism."

So much for the review of Mr. Darrow's autobiography. But I cannot stop here. Mr. Darrow deserves so much better than he receives from his own pen. And to do him justice I must trot out the hoary but abiding line that "nothing human is ever alien" to Clarence Darrow. He really suffers prostitutes quite as gladly as philosophers; indeed, vice versa. He really is no more impressed by the high and mighty and good than he is by the low and lowly and bad; indeed, quite the contrary. All men but the righteous have his sympathy. And if they can't have that, for some practical reason, they at least have his insight. And the reason he understands all manner of men and their sisters is because, like all real human beings, he wishes to conceal quite as much as he is willing to say. Possibly this is why he did not tell the whole story.

And then, the mellowness of his wisdom, at its best, is a joy. Some eight years ago I was asked to invite Mr. Darrow to address a lunch club of journalists in New York City. Mindful of an appreciative article I had written of him in the old Sunday World, he kindly accepted and came on from Chicago. He told us what scoundrels we were and how he loved us. I shall never forget the real understanding he showed of the miserable cowardices and the deep decencies, of the trials and triumphs, of all the soft-pedaling and four-flushing and yet all the real courage and honorableness which the Fourth Estate so perversely displays. And it is a great tribute to the man that, when he finished, some of us softly referred to him in an affectionate vulgarism, at once deeply respectful and quite unprintable.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

The Kaleidoscope of Russia

The Price of Life. By Vladimir Lidin. Translated by Helen C. Matheson. Harper and Brothers. $2.

IN this novel Lidin, "one of the well-known Russian writers," gives us an extraordinary picture of university life in Soviet Russia. It is the story of Kiril Bessonov, a peasant poet who betrays his ideals for a short cut to wealth. Kiril's tragedy is played against a blaring and chaotic background—Bohemian nights in underground rooms, singing gipsies, bowls of vodka—where greed and lust vie with the ascetic bleakness of bolshevism. It is a vivid story, which is strangely speeded up to keep pace with the creation of a new social order. Involved in robbery and murder, Kiril escapes the police only to decide that life is not worth while if the price to be paid is perpetual flight and fear of betrayal.

This synopsis, taken bodily from the flap of the jacket, gives a fairly correct idea of the plot, except for one very significant, crucial detail. According to the novel, Kiril does not decide that life is not worth while. On the contrary, he surrenders himself to the police because life seems to him distinctly worth while. Indeed, toward the end of the book we read: "Kiril was suffused with a feeling of serene joy at the thought that he was returning to his own world. There he would learn the values of life, of human blood, of toil, and of love, and it would be through his awful ordeal that he would acquire his knowledge. In spite of his sorrow and remorse, his elation still persisted as he looked at the loveliness of the earth with the sea caressing its coast."

One wonders—is this simply an error made by an irresponsible writer of blurbs, or is this deliberate falsification? The sensational jacket, with the girl kneeling in anguish, the manacled youth staring defiantly into space, and the conspicuously printed legend, "Youth Pitted Against Soviet Tyranny," seems to support the latter hypothesis. It is distressing to think of the terrible shock Lidin will get when he learns of the lurid, misleading, and downright indecent way in which his book has been brought before American readers. It is even more distressing to see an old and reputable publishing firm stoop to the ethics of a calumny monger.

The truth is that the novel has nothing to do with Soviet tyranny or with anybody pitted against that tyranny. It simply depicts a proletarian youth who in the period of the NEP falls under the influence of the then revived unscrupulous, rapacious Soviet bourgeoisie. Torn away from his class, from the lofty and difficult business of creating a new and better society, the youth is lost in the morass of bourgeois individualism. This idea is not new; it is a Soviet cliché. Scores of novels have been written in the Soviet Union with this as the major theme. Indeed, rather than showing youth pitted against Soviet tyranny, the author shows the clash between the good and evil forces in NEP Russia. The whole point of the novel is that the proletariat stands for life, for health, for progress; while the bourgeoisie stands for disease, death, and decay.

Altogether, the reader seeking a correct and intimate picture of Soviet life must be warned against the numerous Russian novels that have of late been flooding the American market. I have in mind such books as Leonov's "Thief," Voinova's "Semi-Precious Stones," Pilnyak's "The Volga Falls to the Caspian Sea," and Kataiev's "Embezzlers." One must constantly bear in mind the rapid and kaleidoscopic changes in Soviet conditions. What was true of Soviet life yesterday is utterly untrue today. The rate of progress is terrific. This has been one of the greatest difficulties the Soviet writers have had to cope with. By the time a novel is completed it is obsolete. Imagine how long it takes for a novel to be written and published in Russia, be transported to America, make the rounds of the American publishers, be translated and be published, and you have some notion of the validity of the picture you get by the time the book reaches you. No wonder most of the Soviet novels published in this country deal with the NEP period, a period that has passed into oblivion, and been superseded by the great period of Socialist construction, by the noble period of the Piatiletka. When you read of "Bohemian nights," "singing gipsies," "bowls of vodka," you read a one-sided depiction of a forgotten era. Lidin's exposé of the dangers of bourgeois influence in a proletarian society is almost devoid of reality in present-day Soviet Russia.

Is Lidin a Bolshevik writer? Of course not. He is what is known as a fellow-traveler, a right fellow-traveler. Genuine proletarian and Bolshevik writers were never so dismayed by the danger of bourgeois influence, even during the heyday of the NEP. They had too much confidence in their class, in the vitality of the revolution. With the bourgeois writers the dismay was somewhat insincere, somewhat of a pose. Pretending to lament such influence, they really loved to dwell on it. Their thieves, their saboteurs, their gamblers, embezzlers, and murderers were invariably more colorful and romantic than the virtuous, "bleakly ascetic" Communists. With the introduction of the New Economic Policy it was the bourgeois writers who wept most vociferously over the failure of the beautiful ideals of the revolution, over the triumph of evil, selfish, mean human nature. They enjoyed weeping, and they would not be consoled. In this novel Lidin did not go so far; he was willing to be consoled; he was even willing to console the reader by bringing Kiril back to his proletarian world where "he would learn the values of life, of human blood, of toil, and of love." Whatever his real feeling, one thing is certain—he did not anywhere in the novel pit Soviet youth against Soviet tyranny.

JOSHUA KUNITZ

Grover Cleveland

Grover Cleveland, a Man Foursquare. By Denis Tilden Lynch. Horace Liveright. $3.50.

THESE is no interpretation, no philosophic domination of material, no sense of significant long-term currents in American destiny, in Denis Tilden Lynch's swirling, overflowing, chromatic, lively, and sometimes inaccurate biography of His Obstinacy, Grover Cleveland. There is simply a fervent testimonial, touching in these days, to an intransigent honesty—the honesty that is implied in the subtitle, "A Man Foursquare." The reason for the lack of interpretation is probably inherent in Cleveland's own personality. For Cleveland stood between two eras, that of the combination of an industrial revolution with the conquest of a frontier which followed the Civil War, and that of a rampant progressivism which attempted too late to stay the course of revolution as it knocked over the barriers of Sherman and Clayton Anti-Trust acts in its drive toward "America, Incorporated." To both industrial leaders and progressives Cleveland's answer was the same: "Honesty is the best policy." He was, successively, a veto mayor, a veto governor, a veto President, and a vetoer of Bryanism. As William Allen White has shrewdly noted in the best character study of Cleveland to date (see "Masks in a Pageant"), the man "brought no new doctrine to the people." He had no theory of government; he left no legislation behind him that is indissolubly associated with his name. It is true that he denounced the "communism of pelf," but it was his Administration that saw the teeth extracted from the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, and Cleveland, with a panic sounding about his ears, could hardly afford to wax angry. He formulated no doctrine of the "new freedom," he left behind him no La Follette speech of '97. What he stood for was a simple, old-fashioned ideal of doing a day's work along the lines set for him by the Constitution and circumstance, without looking very far ahead or very far behind. He embodied the aspiration for a decent capitalism, along laissez faire lines. And that was all he needed to succeed, to become our greatest President between the time of Lincoln and the days of Wilson. For what the ranks of Democracy, and the more Mugwumpy of the Republican following, wanted in the eighties was simply honesty personified. The country had been too long in the hands of the Blaines, soft-voiced and devious; the Oakes Ames, who could put stock "where it would do the most good"; and the "Pig Iron" Kelleys, with their everlasting prolongation of Civil War tariffs that made so profitable the politics of acquisition and enjoyment.

Cleveland became mayor of Buffalo because no business man had the guts to run for the office in a city that had its miniature Tweed Ring. He became governor with the aid of "Honest" John Kelly, Croker's predecessor as ruler of Tammany, but it didn't take him long to break with his ally. In this matter he was the practical politician, after the manner of his egregious fictional echo, "The Honorable Peter Stirling." He found himself President, in 1885, after a campaign that dripped with muck, beating Blaine by a nose after the Reverend Mr. Burchard's speech about "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion" had driven the Irish from the Republican ranks and thus effectively canceled the stigma of Cleveland's illegitimate son. Once President, he vetoed fraudulent pension bills by the score, denounced swollen tariffs, and went out of office in 1889 with the consolation that he had been too forthright to be popular. In 1892, when the country turned to him again, he found himself with a soft-money panic on his hands. Paying no heed to the Bryan element of his party, he called in the bankers, when Congress failed him, to check the flow of gold from the Treasury. He halted—for a moment—the spread of Manifest Destiny to the Hawaiian Islands; and—the one real blot on his record—he acquiesced in Attorney General Olney's "government by injunction" in smashing the Pullman strike of 1894. At his second inaugural he drained off a portion of fortifying whiskey in full sight of the multitude, which doubtless included a number of prohibitionists.

In short, he knew his own mind, and Mr. Lynch is very much alive to this characteristic. The biography is successful on two counts: it gives us a full account of the mudslinging campaign of 1884 (which Robert McElroy virtually skipped in his official life of Cleveland); and it reproduces the frenzy of party political maneuvering quite rampageously. It also takes a sensible attitude in condemning the government's course in the suppression of Debs. But the virtues of the book—the full and effective treatment of campaigning—lead to a lopsidedness in its proportions. One can gain a far better view of the second Cleveland Administration by reading James A. Barnes's recent biography of Carlisle, Cleveland's Kentucky Secretary of the Treasury. The numerous minor errors of the first edition of Mr. Lynch's book have been corrected for the second edition. The worst of these was the naming of George W. Curtis, the Civil Service reformer, as an assistant to Carlisle, when William E. Curtis was the man in question. A permanent error in the book, it seems to me, is Mr. Lynch's treatment of the Spanish-American War. Walter Millis's "The Martial Spirit" should be read to offset this.

JOHN CHAMBERLAIN

Ibsen

The Life of Ibsen. By Halvdan Koht. W. W. Norton and Company. Two volumes. $7.50.

TEACH me to will more than I can" is Ibsen's ideal as he expressed it in "Brand," while Björnson in "Beyond Our Power" tries to show that the will, if it is to be salutary and helpful, must be kept within the bounds of human ability. Nothing could show more clearly the difference between the genius of Ibsen and the talent of his lifelong rival than this comparison pointedly made by Professor Koht in his Ibsen biography, originally published for the Ibsen centenary (1928) and now translated into English. Of all people in the world Halvdan Koht is best equipped for the work: he is a native of Ibsen's birthplace, Skien; he knew Ibsen personally; Fru Ibsen and Sigurd turned over to him, for editing, the poet's literary remains; he collected and edited Ibsen's letters; as professor of history at Oslo University he knows the Norse background as well as his own pocket; and for four decades he has observed in many cities the greatest actors essay the roles created by Ibsen. In a plain and factual style, without lurid color or flashy quotations, he has written the authoritative biography of the great dramatist, adding heavily to the debt which all students of Ibsen already owe him.

In a recent letter to the present reviewer Professor Koht expressed the regret that he had not been able to revise the text for this translation to include some of the interesting material that the celebration of the centennial had brought to light. One of these items would probably be an article (published in Edda, vol. 17, no. 1) which serves to explain at least in part what Professor Koht calls hard to understand—namely, Ibsen's refusal to visit Skien or to write to his parents after 1850. We now know that he did visit there in 1860, shortly after he had married and become a father, to ask his wealthy relatives for aid during some of his very bitterest Christiania years. But the manner in which these good bourgeois refused his request and advised him to leave the theater was such a humiliation to Ibsen that in letters many years later he ignores this visit when he speaks of Skien, stating that he had not been there since 1850.

It is to be regretted, also, that Professor Koht did not feel that he could write on the life of Ibsen—of all subjects!—without reticences even at this late date. A large part of the book is taken up with a discussion of the personages who served as models for the dramatis personae, yet our author is silent, for example, on such an important one as Susannah Ibsen; he omits very striking analogies in Snoilsky's life while discussing him as the model for Rosmer, and he does not mention the name of the prototype of Jörgen Tesman. At times the text reads like what Professor Koht calls the drama of the decades before Ibsen, "small-town idealization."

The translators, Ruth Lima McMahon and Hanna Ostrup Larson, take various liberties with the text; for example, they omit numerous footnotes, and insert for the American reader a none-too-happy comparison of Peer Gynt with George F. Babbitt. They speak of plays "falling through" instead of failing on the stage, and of Sigurd Ibsen's efforts to procure a "teaching chair" at the university. There is room for improvement also in a number of translations of the Ibsen poems. But it is a fine thing that this standard work has been made accessible to American readers, and the American-Scandinavian Foundation is to be commended for making this edition possible.

A. E. ZUCKER

The Poetic Method of H. D.

Red Roses for Bronze. Poems by H. D. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

THAT H. D. is an imagist is, it seems, largely a coincidence. This poet had tried a little free verse without having heard of vers libre; she had written a few poems objectifying her emotion in a single image, when along came Ezra Pound in search of disciples for his new school, and named her "imagiste." She had, in other words, actually begun to work out her own personal technique in verse at exactly the time that the imagist school was formed. Today the imagist movement is dead; the better poets were glad to let it die, and the poorer poets died with it. H. D., a poet of some individuality, went on writing in her own manner. She was a lover and a student of Greek poetry; she chose therefore to express her own feeling through Greek images, Greek myths. She adapted Greek rhythms to English verse; she wrote balanced quantitative lines based on Greek rhythms. But despite all this, H. D. was not and is not Greek in spirit. She has no classic repose; she is actually a romantic poet. She is not hard and precise; she is emotional, even at times sentimental. What she has actually done is to use an alien ethics, philosophy, aesthetics, world, to express her own very modern inner conflict. This approach might be right for fine poetry were it not for the fact that H. D. cannot identify herself completely with the Greek world from which her images (usually rather obvious ones) are drawn; her psychological reactions are essentially un-Greek. The images which might best express her psychological outlook, those of the modern scene, she rejects. She cannot meet that world and is emotionally a recluse from it. The result is that she must try to use an imagery expressive of repose to interpret a modern psychological confusion. Even this could probably be accomplished if her imagery were subjective and used to interpret the subjective, or if, on the other hand, her imagery, being objective and Greek, were applied to an objective and contrasting modern world to interpret the ironic, subjectively felt difference. But H. D. uses an objective imagery to express subjective chaos, and the two things do not fuse.

In the seventeen or eighteen years of her writing, H. D.

has developed little. Her poetry has changed, but only by elaboration; it has grown more diffuse, more insistently personal. "Red Roses for Bronze," her latest book, is a collection of lyrics in this later manner. We still have the Greek world and it is still contrasted extravagantly with the personal subjective chaos. The poems incline to be vague; the emotions are overstressed; the imagery lacks variety. A poet who began by being precise, clear, and limited is now diffuse, dim, and still limited in outlook.

EDA LOU WALTON

A Revolutionist's Handbook

Labor Fact Book. Prepared by the Labor Research Association. International Publishers. $2.50.

TO "Labor and Automobiles," by Robert Dunn, "Labor and Coal," by Anna Rochester, "Labor and Lumber," by Charlotte Todes, "Labor and Silk," by Grace Hutchins, the Labor Research Association now adds the "Labor Fact Book." This book was prepared "to meet the need for facts felt by workers, as well as students, writers, speakers, and others eager to know the prevailing conditions." More specifically the book is intended for "the working-class vanguard" of militant organizations engaged in "fighting . . . the increasingly reactionary measures of the capitalist class."

The chapters deal with Imperialism, Finance, Capitalism, Industrial Workers, Farmers, Workers' Organizations and Struggles, the Employers' Offensive, the Soviet Union, Government and Political Parties, and Reformist and Revolutionary Internationals. A mass of well-arranged factual material is included but not to the exclusion of necessary interpretation and description. The statistical material is drawn from governmental and unimpeachable private sources. It is not a pretty picture that it presents. "During the first half of 1930 in New York City alone 72,298 warrants for eviction were issued in the city courts . . ." "In South Carolina . . . the total expenditure per pupil enrolled in 1928 was $60.25 in the white schools and $7.65 in the Negro schools." "Street laborers still work sixty hours a week in 351 cities of the United States." Forced sales "numbered 20.8 per 1,000 farms during the year ending March 1, 1930."

Members of the Democratic, Republican, and Socialist parties will take exception to the facts and generalizations presented by the compilers for absorption by American workers. "The Republican Party . . . is the party of American imperialism at its highest point of development," state the authors. This statement is followed by a description of policies of Republican governors and Presidents in connection with the Spanish-American War, Cripple Creek, Mooney and Billings, the 1919 steel strike, the 1921 march in Logan County, West Virginia, Teapot Dome, Sacco and Vanzetti, the Parker appointment, Muscle Shoals, the Fish committee, and the business connections of the present President and his Cabinet. The Democratic Party is described in terms of Jim Crowism, Tammany Hall, Ludlow, Lawrence textile workers, Homestead Steel strikes, the Pullman strike, the A. Mitchell Palmer raids, and the seizure of Haiti in 1915. The Socialist Party is disposed of by the authors in a scant two pages as being "the third party of capitalism," which is "fundamentally bourgeois and imperialist." The party is explained in terms of the marked decrease in membership since the death of Debs, the support given its Presidential candidate by capitalistic newspapers, attitudes on the Negro question as expressed by its candidates for office, and the plea made by Morris Hillquit in 1928 that the Socialists "dissociate [themselves] from the Soviet Government," which "has been the greatest disaster and calamity that has occurred to the Socialist movement."

The book is primarily intended to give to revolutionary leaders verbal ammunition to win support for the doctrines which they profess. But it may also be recommended as a peppy and easily usable compilation to those who like to see themselves in somebody else's mirror and to those who are responsible for the continuance of the conditions out of which the "Labor Fact Book" grew.

WILLIAM L. NUNN

Books in Brief

Small Town. By Bradda Field. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

Adne (Ariadne) Dwight is a pretty young girl in a small town in Ontario. Since apparently there are no boys of her age, she falls in love with Dr. Corbeil, the young French-Catholic physician who has bought her late father's practice. She tries to become a Catholic and prays to the Virgin in order to win him. But he does not want her, and so she goes off with Holman Sugden, a rich and vulgar American, on a holiday to Niagara Falls. Sugden spends a great deal of money in his attempt to seduce her, and finally succeeds. The book's implication is that Adne loses her virtue because life in the "small town" is so dull. Certainly few small towns have been regarded so unsympathetically as Miss Field regards hers. There was beauty in Spoon River and Winesburg; there is none in Elysium. Indeed, there are undercurrents in "Small Town," though the story is told with the conventional novelist's objectivity throughout, which suggest nothing less than a hatred of all life. Whatever the author touches upon, whether provincial homeliness or Catholicism or love, takes on its ugliest aspect. This kind of sordidness has nothing to do with a healthy exposure of the truth; it is in no way related to the valuable naturalism of Masters or Anderson; it is simply an adroit and vulgar commercialization of a theme which they made known years ago.

Mr. and Mrs. Pennington. By Francis Brett Young. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Francis Brett Young's latest novel is about a young English couple who meet at a popular seaside resort, fall in love and marry, take a bungalow in a modern low-price suburb, pass through a number of typical experiences as young married lovers until through folly and weakness they stand face to face with tragedy, and finally emerge from their ordeal with renewed and strengthened love. The story is very long-drawn-out. But it is told objectively and compassionately by a good craftsman. The humor of character and the dramatic conflicts are real, if somewhat mild. The principal characters, particularly the young wife, are true to life, even if some of the interlocking complications do seem a bit far-fetched. It is a novel on which one can spend some hours in relaxation without strain or undue excitement.

The Saginaw Paul Bunyan. By James Stevens. Woodcuts by Richard Bennett. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Mr. Stevens's first volume of Paul Bunyan yarns came out of the Northwest country, where axmen were called "loggers." This second volume comes out of the Saginaw Valley of Michigan, another great timber country in its day, where axmen were called "lumberjacks." The leading characters are the same: Paul Bunyan himself, the "bearded and mackinawed Hercules"; Babe the Blue Ox, who rests his chin on the top of a cliff; Hels Helson, the Big Swede who hates to take a bath; and Johnny Inkslinger, "the tremendous timekeeper." These yarns are similar to those in the first volume, though naturally they are conditioned by the different locale. One of them, for example, is entitled Why the Great Lakes Have No Whales. One year, says:

LAURENCE
STALLINGS

"This novel is worth all the books on labor conditions recently turned out."

CALL HOME THE HEART

By FIELDING BURKE

"Call Home The Heart has everything we like to find in a novel of our time. It has sentiment and feeling, guided by a writer who is following his own day among his own people. A truth and humanity over and above its immediate reading enjoyment."

—Laurence Stallings.

Longmans, Green & Co

$2.50

SUPERMAN

The Life of Frederick the Great

by NATHAN AUSUBEL

Takes its place on the required list for discriminating readers for it is not only a most dramatic story but a permanent contribution to biographical and historical literature.

"This is biography at its best"—Will Durant. "Shows wide and thorough research"—Gamaliel Bradford. "A brilliant and impressive job"—John W. Vandercook.

At Your Bookseller's

Illustrated. $4.00

IVES WASHBURN • NEW YORK

HUNGER AND LOVE

A novel by Lionel Britton
Introduction by Bertrand Russell

This novel tells the story of Arthur Phelps, whom the author thus introduces to us on the first page:

"I should think by the look of him, now, he would be somewhere about sixteen. Yes, my lord, he is a dirty little swine, there's no doubt about it. That bit of rag in his pocket, about the color of a motor tire, is what he wipes his nose on. Many working-class boys would call it snitch, but Arthur calls it nose; many would call it snot-rag, but Arthur calls it handkerchief, so that you will infer he is to some extent superior; still, it would not be at all a bad thing to send his trousers to the wash."

This overwhelming novel presents the most terrible indictment of present-day society and bourgeois morality ever written.

623 Pages

$3.00 at bookstores

THE VANGUARD PRESS

100 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

it seems, the "Big Feller" had trouble with the logging on the "wild young rivers." Herds of whales had been in the habit of swimming up from the ocean and jumping Niagara, in order to use that part of the world as a calving and nursing ground. Paul Bunyan put blinders, bridles, bits, and saddles on them, and used them to get his logs downstream. But the whales resented such treatment; so that is why there are no whales in the Great Lakes today. Mr. Stevens says that the one heresy in telling Paul Bunyan stories is to repeat them exactly as you heard them; every narrator is obliged by the timber-country code to "cast new light" on them. One criticism might be made of the new light that Mr. Stevens has cast on Paul Bunyan: he tends to be too prosy and "correct" in his manner of writing; the stories, one feels, would have much more life if refreshed with more of the vernacular, which now is almost exclusively reserved for the dialogue. But this in no way discredits the important service that Mr. Stevens has performed to American letters in collecting these wonderful legends.

An American Epoch. By Howard W. Odum. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

Dr. Odum, editor of "Social Forces," is well known for his creative work at the University of North Carolina. During the last ten years nearly a dozen volumes, in whole or in part, have come from his pen, some of them distinguished. "An American Epoch" is a sort of sociological history (almost an encyclopedia) of the political, social, and geographical forces which have shaped the South since 1850, with a short forecast of the future. The story is told mainly by vivid, impressionistic word pictures. The book is also a novel in reverse technique; the characters occupy a subordinate place, while the background, painted with a rare blending of the scientific with the artistic spirit, is far and away the principal theme. At the outset Dr. Odum introduces two typically Southern characters, Uncle John and the Old Major, private and officer in the Civil War, whose lives, together with those of their children and grandchildren, span the "epoch" under consideration. Uncle John and the Old Major, while sketched merely in behavioristic outline, are realistically done. They give continuity to the story, and they afford the author an opportunity to let us see the changing South through the eyes and philosophies of Southern men in the midst of life. The story abounds in contrasts and paradoxes, because the South itself abounds in those qualities. "An American Epoch" is the result of long and profound research, and no one who pretends to discuss the South with any authority can afford to leave it unread.

The New Conceptions of Matter. By C. G. Darwin. The Macmillan Company. $3.

This is the best non-technical exposition of the new quantum mechanics that has yet appeared. Professor Darwin has taken upon himself the task of expounding all the details of the theory while avoiding mathematical concepts and equations, and he has well succeeded. The book does not make as light reading as Eddington or Jeans, but it is more complete in its scientific subject matter and does not go off on philosophical tangents. It has also the advantage of having been written after the new conceptions have become stabilized and after the initial philosophical excitement has worn off. Professor Darwin, it should be added, follows throughout the wave conception of matter, which is far easier to visualize (although mathematically equivalent) than the conception of matter as made up of ultimate particles with paradoxical mechanical behavior. On the wave theory the paradox enters more quietly, so to speak, when we have to regard the elementary waves as coagulating for some unknown reason into groups with corpuscular properties. But once this fact is granted, the whole theoretical structure of the new mechanics takes on a marked clarity and harmony.

Drama

The Shepherd's Saw of Might

INTO the post-holiday season, hitherto dismal enough, a delightful play has come at last. The author is that same John Van Druten whose "After All" recently bored its audience to extinction, and the new comedy is as quiet, as well-bred, and as innocuous as that unfortunate effort. But "There's Always Juliet" (Empire Theater) neatly turns the trick which was fumbled before, and demonstrates conclusively that something can be made out of materials as tenuous as those which its author is apparently determined to choose.

Like so many other English playwrights of his particular generation, Mr. Van Druten carefully avoids anything inherently dramatic or clearly "significant." Obviously embarrassed by raucous modernity, as well as by old-fashioned histrionics, he likes to write about nice people whose sophistication is mildly gracious and whose lives are too well ordered to be superficially exciting. But for once at least he has escaped from the dull stuffiness likely to surround people of the sort that he admires, and he has achieved a little romance which unfolds itself upon the stage with a genuine simplicity touched here and there with unexpected beauty.

Two young people—an English girl and an American architect—meet casually, fall in love, and decide to marry. That is literally all, for there are no misunderstandings, no complications, and no real difficulties. But so charmingly is their story told, so gently and so simply are they characterized, that it is quite enough. One follows with a kind of delighted surprise the eager, incredulous unfolding of a mutual passion, and one almost forgets to admire the extraordinary if tenuous talent of the author who can thus communicate to a cynical audience the charm of a phenomenon so common that we can seldom be really aware of it. There is an amazing, unobtrusive, almost unconscious dexterity in the handling of the incidents through which the two leading characters discover each other, but it is not the dexterity which really counts. Mr. Van Druten has a freshness of feeling, an imaginative participation in the incident, which none of the brilliant technicians of the stage from Molnar on down could imitate any more than they could imitate the poetry of Shakespeare. By implication he can exclaim, "Who ever loved, that loved not at first sight?" and make that phrase seem, not the dull proverb that it usually is, but the thrilling, triumphant discovery which Marlowe announced to a responsive world.

Superficially, there is nothing unusual about the hero and heroine concerned. They are prosperous, cultivated, and decorously modern young people who know as well as their equals what the world is made of. But their problem is to say what they have to say and do what they have to do in a language and a world no longer keyed to passion of just that sort. They can no more break out into the rapturous poetry of Romeo and Juliet than they can hasten off to a hermit to get themselves joined. But neither can they talk or behave like two young desperadoes out of Aldous Huxley, and so they must play their adventures out on a plane lower than the plane of Shakespeare and yet too high not to be faintly embarrassing for sophisticated youngsters little accustomed to any phrases except those of the smart drawing-room. They must find the language as well as the behavior suited to their own experience, and the play is the record of their effort to do so. Mr. Van Druten is not asking us to believe them more than they actually are; he does not lift them above their own age and generation; but he does convincingly show how something of the miraculous may still cling to the phenomenon he is describing. The shepherd's saw is still a "saw of might." There are only four persons in the well-nigh perfect cast headed by Edna Best and Herbert Marshall.

"Blessed Event" (Longacre Theater) belongs to that rather extensive class of entertainments which are "good shows" without being "interesting plays." The present one happens to deal with the career of a big backstairs and keyhole man who regales the town with a daily column of gossip in a tabloid newspaper, and it is written with that breathless speed and colloquial, wisecracking cleverness characteristic of the "hard-boiled" melodramas of the moment. Apparently it started out to be a cynical exposé of a current racket, but somewhere about the middle it decided to be simply an exciting story instead, so that by the time it is over the villain has become a hero, and the moral (if any) seems to be that blackmail is one of the most useful of justice's tools. When the Peeping Tom in question wantonly ruins the life of a young girl by spreading a scandal, the audience seems justified in believing him a thoroughgoing scoundrel; but when he sets out to crash the gate of a night club to which he has been forbidden, and when gangsters set an ambush to shoot him, then the interest naturally changes sides, and there is obviously nothing to do except write a last scene in which he is breathlessly dictating into the telephone a story which will save a girl from the gallows. The play is exciting enough and is probably destined to success, but the authors' contribution to the discussion of the ethics of journalism would have been a little bit clearer if they had made up their own minds whether their central character was a crusader or a cad.

"Monkey" (Mansfield Theater) is a conventional detective melodrama whose novelty consists largely in the fact that this time the detective is a garrulous old man. It is not unentertaining, and something a little more may be said of "The Fatal Alibi" (Booth Theater), another detective play made unusual by the presence of that extraordinary actor Charles Laughton. Mr. Laughton is one of those very rare performers who can change, not only his lines, but his whole personality as well. Those who saw him as the defeated wretch of "Payment Deferred" will be amazed to discover him transformed into a jolly and very amusing Frenchman in "The Fatal Alibi."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Films

A Chinese Episode

THE direction and the photography, both sound and silent, of "Shanghai Express" (Rialto Theater) are of such excellence that only a first-rate story could match them. Unfortunately, the plot is hackneyed and intricate; what is more serious, it seems to be a superimposed mechanism rather than an organic part of the production. The action takes place aboard an express as it proceeds to Shanghai or in stations along the way. But from the opening scene in the railway station at Peiping to the end of the run in Shanghai, the train is the real protagonist of the piece, and its journey provides the most thrilling action. Railway trains and stations, the clang of bells, and the nostalgic whistle of locomotives are intrinsically exciting. The device of numberless swift kaleidoscopic shots is, of course, not new. But the vibrancy and freshness of treatment must be credited to the direction of Josef von Sternberg. It is he who makes the illusion of a train traveling through strange, war-ridden China as convincingly real as the Paramount news release from Manchuria which precedes the pic-

PLAYS □ FILMS □ DEBATES

The Theatre Guild Presents
EUGENE O'NEILL'S TRILOGY

MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA

Composed of 3 plays

Homecoming, The Hunted, The Haunted

All 3 plays will be presented on one day, commencing at 5:30 sharp. Dinner intermission at one hour at 7 o'clock. No matinee performance.
GUILD THEATRE, 52d St., West of Broadway

THE THEATRE GUILD PRESENTS

REUNION IN VIENNA

a comedy by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

MARTIN BECK THEATRE, 45 St. & 8 Ave. PEnn. 6-6100
Evs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

ERLANGER'S Theatre, W. 44th St. Phone PEn. 6-7963
Eves. 8:30, Mats. Wed. and Sat. 2:30
CIVIC LIGHT OPERA CO. (Milton Aborn, Managing Director) in

FRANZ LEHAR'S GLORIOUS OPERETTA

The MERRY WIDOW

With DONALD BRIAN BEPPIE de VRIES
as The Dashing Prince as THE MERRY WIDOW
The Greatest Singing Organization of the Century
Thrill Prices: Eves., 50c to $2.50. Holiday & Sat. Mats., 50c to $2

GILBERT MILLER Presents
EDNA HERBERT

BEST MARSHALL in THERE'S ALWAYS JULIET

A Comedy by John Van Druten
"Utterly delightful."—John Mason Brown, Post.
EMPIRE THEATRE, Broadway and 40th St. Eves. 8:40
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30

HELEN HAYES

in MOLNAR'S New Comedy

THE GOOD FAIRY

"One of the few triple-starred, immediately recommendable entertainments in town."—Gilbert Gabriel, N. Y. American.
HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Evenings 8:50 Mats. Thurs., Sat. 2:40

LESLIE HOWARD

in PHILIP BARRY'S New Comedy

THE ANIMAL KINGDOM

Staged by GILBERT MILLER

"The season's most gratifying adventure."
—Percy Hammond, Herald-Tribune

BROADHURST THEATRE, 44th St., West of B'way. Eves. 8:40
Mats. Wednesday and Saturday, 2:30

FOURTH WEEK THE DELIGHTFUL VIENNESE SCREEN OPERETTA

"DAS LIED IST AUS"

(The Song Is Over)

"Decidedly superior to 'Two Hearts'."—World-Telegram.

EUROPA 154 West 55th Street. Just E. of Seventh Avenue
35 Cents to 1 P. M. Continuous from Noon.

A Clearing House Of Opinion THE GROUP Meets in Auditorium
150 West 85th St.

Tuesday evening, March 1st, at 8:30 P. M.

OLGA KNOPF, M.D., will speak on:

"WOMEN AMONG MEN"

This Sunday Afternoon (Feb. 28,) at 4:30 P. M.

DR. C. P. OBERNDORF speaks on:
"PSYCHOANALYTICAL FACTORS IN MARRIAGE"

BELLE RECITAL DANCE DIDJAH SEATS NOW $1.00 TO $2.50

MARTIN BECK THEATRE, WEST 45th STREET
SUNDAY EVENING, MARCH 6th AT 8:45

"As absorbing as a book of fiction."—Syracuse Post Standard.

CROWELL'S DICTIONARY of ENGLISH GRAMMAR and Handbook of American Usage

By MAURICE H. WESEEN

$3.50

"Deserves a place at the elbow of every writer and reader who wants to understand his native tongue and use it with precision." —N. Y. Times.

SEND FOR CIRCULAR

from CROWELL'S
THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO.
393 Fourth Avenue, New York

Webster's Collegiate

guards you English from embarrassing errors

To correct your pronunciation, to build a comprehensive vocabulary, to gain a sure knowledge of the exact meanings of words, to be sure of spellings, to find at once just the synonym you need, to be right in the use of every word, let Webster's Collegiate be your guide.

The Best Abridged Dictionary

NEW FOURTH EDITION—Based upon Webster's New International—the "Supreme Authority." 106,000 entries, including hundreds of new words; dictionary of Biography; Gazetteer; 1930 Population Figures; etc., etc. 1268 pages. 1700 illustrations.

Get the Best Thin-Paper Edition: Cloth, $5.00; Fabricated, $6.00; Leather, $7.50. Purchase of your bookseller; or write for free specimen pages. G. & C. MERIAM CO., 151 Broadway, Springfield, Mass.

The plight and struggle of the unemployed—war plots of the Wall Street bankers—attack and defense of the Soviet Republic—masterfully portrayed in

THE ROAD

A historical novel by George Marlen

623 pp. $2.00

RED STAR PRESS
P.O.B. 67, Sta. D

WORKERS BOOK SHOP
New York 50 E. 13th Street

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

Blessed Event—Longacre—48 St. W. of B'way.
Brief Moment—Cort—W. 48 St.
Civic Light Opera Co.—Erlanger's—W. 44 St.
Counsellor-at-Law—Plymouth—W. 45 St.
Cynara—Morosco—45 St. W. of B'way.
Face The Music—New Amsterdam—W. 42 St.
Hay Fever—Avon—W. 45 St.
Jewell Robbery—Vanderbilt—W. 48 St.
Mourning Becomes Electra—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.
Of Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.
Reunion in Vienna—Martin Beck—45 St. & 8 Ave.
Springtime for Henry—Bijou—45 St.
The Animal Kingdom—Broadhurst—44 St. W. of B'way.
The Bride The Sun Shines On—Geo. M. Cohen—B'way. & 43 St.
The Devil Passes—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
The Fatal Alibi—Booth—W. 45 St.
The Good Fairy—Henry Miller's—124 W. 43 St.
The Left Bank—Little—44 St.
The Laugh Parade—Imperial—W. 45 St.
There's Always Juliet—Empire—B'way and 40 St.
When the Bough Breaks—48 St. E. of B'way.
Whistling in the Dark—Ethel Barrymore—47 St. W. of B'way.

ture. The characterizations are real, too, especially the lesser ones, which belong rather to the setting than to the story. It is only in so far as these very real characters are forced to take part in an unlikely plot that the illusion fades. Marlene Dietrich, along with the other principals, is overpowered by the background against which she performs, but she is as decoratively beautiful as ever, and though she continues to pose rather than act, her posing has become more restrained and more appealing.

Salesmanship has been ridiculed a great many times on both stage and screen, but it is doubtful whether satire so completely cynical in its implications as "High Pressure" could have come out of Hollywood in the dear dead days before prosperity disappeared just around the corner. The story revolves about a promotion campaign in behalf of an invention which converts sewage into artificial rubber. It is an honest venture. That is, both Mr. Guinsberg, who has bought the rights, and Gar Evans who is promoting it, believe it to be both honest and fundamentally sound; and the Golden Gate Artificial Rubber Company (the promoter points out that there must be gold in the title) is strictly legal. From the magnificent offices—the $25,000 "front" which the super-promoter insists upon and Mr. Guinsberg pays for—the word goes forth that another trough of profit has been opened for the dear public. The word goes forth in the "lines" of lesser salesmen whose spirits are fired by a pep talk that must make many a former salesman feel sheepish. It is hardly necessary to relate that in the midst of all the splendor the inventor turns up missing; and that only after fruitless scouring operations in New Jersey is he finally found in the person of a disreputable-looking creature who has been trying for days to see the president of the Golden Gate. The president, incidentally, is a professional chosen not for his connections but for his presence.

It is not the fault of Mr. Evans or Mr. Guinsberg, of course, that the inventor turns out to be slightly insane—a fact which dawns upon them when he asserts that he can also make hens lay Easter eggs that are already colored. Like many another business house, the Golden Gate Artificial Rubber Company finds that it has put too much confidence in its investment. The final touch of satire, apparently unconscious, is provided by the Hollywood device to bring about a happy ending. Obviously, the always innocent stockholders could not be allowed to lose their greedily invested pennies. To avoid this unhappy, not to say immoral, outcome, the Golden Gate Company is bought up by real rubber interests, the price being charged to a "nuisance fund" which we can only hope is not passed on to the ultimate consumer or a lot of other stockholders. "High Pressure" is directed by Mervyn Le Roy at a breathless pace which is just right. William Powell, as the dynamic promoter with unlimited enthusiasm and just a touch of superstition, is excellent, and he is supported by a very well-chosen cast that functions smoothly, both separately and together.

The latest vehicle of that highly competent actor, Mr. George Arliss, "The Man Who Played God" (Warner Theater), turns out to be an elementary and slightly smug exercise in the old problem "Is There a God?" The theological conclusions of Gouverneur Morris, from whose story the film was made, lend a quaint air, as of 1900, to a production otherwise mildly interesting.

"Das Lied Ist Aus" (Europa Theater) is one of the better examples of the German film operetta which became a vogue with "Zwei Herzen." The marionette show, which the completely arbitrary motivation of German operettas permits to be shown at great length, is especially well done and very amusing. "The Song Is Over" is pleasant, leisurely entertainment, particularly since it is reinforced by an exploit of Mickey Mouse on the one hand and an exciting interlude in the French Alps on the other.

MARGARET MARSHALL

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9, 1932

No. 3479

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	269
EDITORIALS:
Mr. Stimson's Warning to Japan.....	272
War by Boycott.....	273
Be Safe with Roosevelt.....	273
Gerhart Hauptmann.....	274
MASS MISERY IN PHILADELPHIA. By Mauritz A. Hallgren....	275
PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITIES: II. RITCHIE AND NO
REGRETS. By Gerald W. Johnson.....	278
FREE AIR: A STRICTLY IMAGINARY EDUCATIONAL BROAD-
CAST. By James Rorty.....	280
BIRTH CONTROL NOT ENOUGH FOR CHINA! By Agnes
Smedley.....	282
EAST ST. LOUIS STUDIES AMERICANISM. By C. R. F. Smith
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	283
CORRESPONDENCE	285
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.....	286
FINANCE: CLIPPING THE BEARS' CLAWS. By S. Palmer
Harman.....	287
BOOKS, ARCHITECTURE, DRAMA:
The Harbor. By Lynn Riggs.....	288
Liberalism and Economics. By Henry Hazlitt.....	288
Second Person Singular. By Robert Cantwell.....	289
In the Name of Science. By Benjamin Ginzburg.....	290
Lucretius, Jr. By Cuthbert Wright.....	291
Books in Brief.....	291
Architecture: "New Mayland." By Douglas Haskell.....	292
Drama: Treacle and Spice. By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	294
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Danish Disarmament and Neutrals. By Peter Munch.....	296

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN FRED A. KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

AS WE GO TO PRESS comes news of the proposed Chino-Japanese truce, instigated by the League of Nations in agreement with the United States. The terms, as yet not fixed, will probably include mutual evacuation of Shanghai. If war is thus averted, a grateful world will await news of it.

CONGRESSIONAL JEALOUSIES appear at the moment to be imperiling that spirit of cooperation by means of which the two parties were to help rid us of the economic depression. It was understood at the beginning of the session that the Democrats would work in harness with the Republicans in putting through an economic-reconstruction program. The Democrats needed little prompting, for they wanted to show high finance and big business that they could be just as friendly as the Republicans. But recently officials of the Hoover Administration have been making numerous speeches in various sections of the country giving Mr. Hoover full credit for the work Congress has thus far accomplished. This has irked the Democratic leaders in no little measure. They know that no part of the Hoover program could have been put through Congress without the aid of the Democratic majority in the House. They point out that many of the "Hoover" ideas have originated with Democrats, having come, for example, from men like Senator Glass. They are complaining frankly and with some bitterness that the Republican spellbinders are seeking to capitalize for the purposes of the coming election the results achieved by Congress, which could not have been obtained without Democratic votes. And so the Democrats are now threatening to put an end to their cooperation.

SENATOR NORRIS'S anti-injunction bill, introduced at the same time by Representative La Guardia in the House, may very well have been passed by the time this issue of The Nation appears. Senator Hebert of Rhode Island has been leading the opposition, but the amendments he suggested have been overruled. The bill forbids the summary granting of ex parte injunctions, and provides that injunctions may be granted only after a hearing at which both sides are represented; it contains a bill of rights for labor which declares peaceful picketing legal and outlaws "yellow-dog contracts" by calling them "contrary to public policy"; it provides jury trial for cases of contempt of court and makes it possible for the accused to demand trial by a judge other than the one who issued the contempt order; and it makes provision to avoid the delay in labor trials which now operates to keep "agitators" in jail for the duration of a strike. It will be seen that the bill offers an excellent bulwark for labor against the unlawful breaking-up of a strike, and it establishes fundamental rights for labor in a powerful and compelling form. Senator Norris defended the declaration of "public policy" in the bill by saying that "Congress has the authority to define public policy in all matters concerning which it has the power to legislate." The bill, of course, may be challenged in some points by the Supreme Court, but its passage will be a long step forward for the right to organize and strike.

REFUSING TO FIGHT OPENLY, the Hoover Administration has adopted another means of combating the critics of the President's past life. The Organized Farmer, a Farmer-Labor weekly paper published in Red Wing, Minnesota, started publication last November of a series of articles purporting to deal with Mr. Hoover's career. The circulation of the newspaper trebled immediately. But the Post Office Department just as quickly informed the publishers that the Organized Farmer must hereafter pay one-cent postage on all copies sent to 206 of its present subscribers and to all new subscribers. This extra tax, the Post Office explained, was necessary because it had found upon investigation that 206 of the persons receiving the paper had never subscribed for it. Mildred Scherf, the publisher, denies that copies have ever been sent "to persons not ordering the publication." She says that the postal authorities have "refused for several months to furnish any names of any such subscriptions or any proof whatever to show that their statement is correct." The Organized Farmer was barred from the mails a few weeks before the second order was issued, but through the efforts of a number of prominent progressives, including several United States Congressmen, the exclusion order was not enforced.

SAMUEL SEABURY, speaking at the fifth Victory Dinner of the Charter Committee in Cincinnati, sharply criticized Governor Roosevelt for his delay in removing Sheriff Farley from office, but directed his criticisms generally and directly at the control of New York City by Tammany. He said:

The power of Tammany Hall is not only a menace to New York City—it is a menace to the nation as well. It drives public men whose instincts would lead them to speak out in protest against the corruption that has been revealed to a sullen silence. They know the conditions are evil, but they fear to antagonize the power of Tammany Hall; and politicians seeking its favors cater to it even where they feel they would be discredited if they openly lined up with it. Where they hold public office and are forced or given occasions to rule adversely to Tammany Hall, they soften their opposition, so that, while the public will not regard them as pro-Tammany, Tammany Hall will not regard them as opposed to it.

An attempt was made to belittle Mr. Seabury's speech by the charge that in making it he was furthering his own political ambitions. This may or may not be true, but the truth of his remarks as such is entirely incontrovertible. He might have added one point, of course. It is possible openly to oppose Tammany Hall and it has been done; but it takes courage, and a kind of political ambition that goes far beyond a mere desire to hold office. This sort of courage is seen in politics about once in a generation; when it appears it is instantly recognized and handsomely rewarded. At present we are not enjoying any conspicuous examples of it.

FOR SHEER CAPACITY for learning nothing from experience, no one can excel the Federal Reserve authorities, who have indicated their return to a cheap-money policy by cutting the New York rediscount rate from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent, notwithstanding the complete futility of this policy in the past. The hope is now, as before, that artificially cheap money will encourage borrowing and a resumption of business activity. For five months last year the rate was kept at the astonishingly low figure of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, with no visible effects whatever in encouraging borrowing. The policy did, however, help to encourage the enormous gold withdrawals from this market by Europe, amounting to \$750,000,000, and, as a consequence of these, the rate was hastily raised in two successive weeks last October to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. In January of this year, again, the bill-buying rate was cut under prevailing market levels, also to encourage business activity, and again the only result was an almost immediate further outward movement of gold. Now, apparently on the assumption that the Glass-Steagall bill will make it a matter of indifference whether or not more gold is withdrawn to Europe, the New York Federal Reserve Bank is cutting the rate again. Some further loss of gold would not be regrettable if the cheap-money policy were in fact a sound one. But not only is there no reason to suppose that it will encourage more borrowing and more active business under present conditions; it may well have precisely the opposite effect. One of the great hindrances to an expansion of credit is the desire of banks to keep themselves in an exceptionally liquid position; another is their lack of confidence in business. High interest rates might encourage a more liberal lending policy; low rates won't.

THE WIDESPREAD AGITATION against short selling is regrettable from three points of view: It reveals a tendency to attack the symptoms and barometers of our difficulties rather than the difficulties themselves; it shows an astonishing solicitude on the part of members of Congress for the holders of securities, which they do not seem to feel, judging by the vote on the La Follette-Costigan bill, for people who are merely starving; the prohibition of short selling seems unlikely to protect even the bullish stock speculators in whose supposed interest it is urged, and in the long run will probably prove harmful to them. Nevertheless, we suggest that the Stock Exchange itself, in its own interest as well as in the interests of experiment, put a complete stop to short selling for a period of, say, six months, exempting only the selling of odd-lot houses in the course of their business and the practice of "selling against the box." Such a prohibition would be unlikely to do any particular harm in a market like the present one that has already experienced the worst deflation on record in the twentieth century; it is in boom periods that the prohibition of short selling would do its greatest harm. The prohibition of short selling by the Exchange itself would give the country an opportunity to see what a market without short selling was like. And the Exchange's action might forestall foolish legislation on the part of Congress, which might not be repealed even if it proved to be extremely harmful. If the legislation were passed anyway, it would at least be passed after a certain amount of experience in the effects of prohibiting short selling had been gained.

THE NEW British 10 per cent general tariff is in effect. Federal government experts are reported to be concerned. They point out that this tariff will be required of 46 per cent of America's annual sales to England, which have amounted to nearly a fifth of our total exports. This is in addition to duties already existing, so that hereafter only about a quarter of the total sales of the United States to Great Britain will enter duty free. Perhaps the 10 per cent duty would not be so serious standing by itself, but it is pointed out that since sterling has depreciated, purchasers of American exports in England have been required to pay substantially more for them in terms of sterling than before, though they have not had to pay more for the goods of countries that followed Great Britain off the gold basis. This puts us at a great disadvantage in competition. In short, these "federal government experts" are reported as holding that the British tariff is just another one of the artificial barriers that have resulted in "strangulation of international trade and commerce." But isn't "strangulation" a seditious word? Who are these "federal government experts" that are talking such language? Don't they know that Mr. Hoover hailed with satisfaction the boosting of our tariff to a new high record, and that foreign-trade strangulation is the official Administration policy?

GERMANY IS TO HOLD its Presidential election on March 13. Should none of the candidates receive an absolute majority of the votes cast at that time, a second election will be held in April, at which the candidate with a plurality will be declared the winner. Germany is presumably a democratic republic, but not one of the aspirants for the office is either an avowed democrat or a thoroughgoing republican. President Hindenburg, who has been put into the running by the moderates and who will have the support of the Social Democrats, is the only one of the four contenders whose support of the republic can be depended upon. The other three—Thälmann, the Communist; Düsterberg, candidate of the Stahlhelm and the reactionary Hugenberg group; and Hitler, the fascist candidate—are enemies of the present republic. It is likely that Germany will choose Hindenburg, though there is no definite assurance of it. It is impossible to estimate accurately what new strength the Communists and fascists have gathered since the Reichstag elections in September, 1930, although in subsequent state and commune elections both groups have shown notable gains. In the event that the candidate of one of these two parties is victorious, it is almost certain that the smoldering warfare between the two extremist groups will be brought out into the open. On the other hand, a Hindenburg victory would virtually assure maintenance of the status quo.

ALFONSO HAS ASKED his "beloved Spanish children" to restore him to power. His bid was made in a public manifesto charging the present republican regime in Spain with creating a state of anarchy which to the former king seems likely to lead to communism. In Spain he sees "religion persecuted, the unity of the fatherland destroyed, the family blasted, property seized individually and collectively, liberty of work and learning destroyed, not only ridiculously but degenerately, under the inspiration of communism, incendiarism, and Judaism." To him it would be "a crime of treachery" if he were to remain silent longer. He has therefore called upon "Catholics, Spaniards, monarchists," and militarists to help him regain his throne. Poor, abused Alfonso is dreaming. Whatever the conditions in Spain may be, and they are far from that state of anarchy which Alfonso pretends to see, they would be infinitely worse if the monarchists and militarists were to attempt a coup d'état such as their former monarch has asked them to try. There is little doubt that the republicans, and even many former supporters of Alfonso who now see the futility of any attempt at restoration, would go to extreme lengths in defending the existing order. Should the moderates and monarchists engage in a death struggle, the way would almost certainly be opened to a seizure of power by the Communists, thus bringing about the very situation Alfonso wants to prevent.

THOUGH NOT NEW to Northern Europe, fascism appears at last to have gained a secure foothold in the Scandinavian countries, notably Sweden, and in Finland. Indeed, in the latter country, once called the most democratic in Europe, the fascist movement now feels strong enough to come out openly in opposition to the present government. A march on Helsingfors is planned, and may have taken place before these lines appear. The Finnish fascists are for the most part peasants and war veterans. They are financed largely, or so it is reported, by timber interests and others who have been hurt by Russian competition in the world lumber market. It was the fascists—they call themselves Lapuans, from the district in which most of their leaders live—who were primarily responsible for the success of the referendum outlawing the Communist Party. But now they contend that the government of President Svinhufvud is using the anti-Communist law to suppress the direct-action tactics of the Lapuans. Hence they have demanded the resignation of Minister of the Interior Born and of General Jalander, Governor of the Province of Nyland, who, they declare, have been over-zealous in carrying out the government's policy. That the Lapuans intend to erect a fascist state if they succeed in their projected march on Helsingfors is open to question. Their movement has grown in recent months, but it seems improbable that they will try to overthrow the present moderate regime.

IT IS NOT SURPRISING to be told that American universities are almost without exception facing a considerable deficit as a result of reduced or omitted dividends. To some extent they are blameless in this matter, for there was no reason why, despite their departments of business, they should have foreseen what almost nobody except apparently Professor Keynes and one or two other Cassandra foresaw; but there are aspects of their problem for which they are open to criticism. In the first place, they have for the past fifteen or twenty years overbuilt, investing an inordinate part of the huge funds which they have obtained in bricks and stones and mortar instead of brains. The buildings which now ornament the university campus have got to be heated and lighted and cleaned, and in the long run it is the professor who pays for these menial offices. It is idle to maintain that the efficiency of American institutions of learning has increased in anything like the proportion in which buildings have been constructed. There is another point. American universities have started department after department on financial shoestrings, trusting that they could make a demonstration which would attract the necessary funds. This is unsound policy. Before a university enters a new field, it should be in possession of the funds by which its new activities can be financed. Had our universities built more modestly and expanded more soundly, they would not find themselves in their present financial difficulties.

ROMANCE, FRIENDS AND BROTHERS, is not dead. We still live in the land of opportunity and Something May Turn Up tomorrow. Witness the story of Charles Kane. Mr. Kane, once a resident of Worcester, Massachusetts, had been out of a job for ten weeks; he was walking from New York to Poughkeepsie, looking for work on the way; just south of Hartsdale he stubbed his toe. Being impelled by this to look toewards, he saw a leather valise at his feet; the valise happened to contain $13,000 worth of jewelry belonging to a rich lady of Greenwich, Connecticut, who subsequently rewarded Mr. Kane with $1,000. This story, which appeared in the New York Times, will doubtless be copied by every newspaper in the country. It will set the revolution back several years; it will be a blow to the Communists and Socialists; and if Mr. Hoover were politically astute he would immediately seize upon it for campaign material. For every member of the near-unemployed who can still buy a newspaper and who will therefore read the story will say, "There, but for the merest turn of the wheel of chance, walked I. My chance may come tomorrow. I shall not yet despair, and while I am about it I may as well vote the Republican ticket."

Mr. Stimson's Warning to Japan

MR. STIMSON is to be congratulated for that part of his letter to Senator Borah which lays at Japan's door the responsibility for having violated the Nine-Power Treaty and the Kellogg Pact, though the letter does not mention Japan by name in this connection. The Secretary of State was careful to avoid charging either party in the Chinese war with being the aggressor. "It is not necessary," he said, "to inquire into the causes of the controversy or to attempt to apportion the blame between the two nations which are unhappily involved." But there is no doubt in anyone's mind that he was speaking directly to the Japanese. Indeed, the letter is simply a restatement of this country's historic Chinese policy, which holds that China must be safeguarded against the aggression of other Powers. This, said Mr. Stimson, is the main purpose of the Nine-Power Treaty. Thus he could have meant no one but the Japanese when he asserted "that a situation has developed which cannot, under any circumstances, be reconciled with the obligations of the covenants of these two treaties, and that if the treaties had been faithfully observed such a situation could not have arisen." In brief, Mr. Stimson has come vigorously and determinedly to the defense of the various peace treaties. Through the Secretary of State the United States stands out virtually alone today as the champion of the peace machinery that has been erected since the World War, for if Japan can with impunity smash the Nine-Power and Kellogg treaties, then none of the international agreements is safe.

We sincerely hope that the section of the Stimson letter dealing with the Nine-Power Treaty and the Kellogg Pact will have the desired effect. But Mr. Stimson has again acted belatedly. Had he in his equivocal note of January 7 taken the position he has now assumed, we might have been spared the bloodshed at Shanghai. Better yet, as we have repeatedly stated, had he taken as firm a stand immediately after the capture of Mukden last September, it is entirely likely that the Japanese militarists would have been checked. The Japanese today are too excited to listen to reason; war fever has got the better of their ordinarily calm judgment. This Mr. Stimson himself recognizes by addressing his statement of policy not to Tokio directly, but to Senator Borah. In this he undoubtedly was wise, for his ill-considered attempt to link the fortifications and armaments treaties with the peace agreements might have been interpreted by the Japanese, had they in their present agitated state of mind been called upon for an answer, as a threat of armed intervention by the United States. There is little doubt that the reply of the Japanese militarists would have been defiant perhaps to the point of provoking the United States into taking action that it might later have regretted. With respect to Mr. Stimson's appeal to the other Powers to join him in supporting the peace treaties, the letter seems destined to bear little fruit. Were the European Powers disposed to present a united front to Japan, which clearly they are not, they would have indorsed or otherwise supported the American note of January 7.

The one dangerous, and to our mind wholly gratuitous, section of the Stimson statement is that which links the peace treaties with Washington's "surrender" of "its then commanding lead in battleships" and with its agreement "to leave its positions at Guam and in the Philippines without further fortification." These were "predicated upon, among other things, the self-denying covenants contained in the Nine-Power Treaty." The possibility of modifying or abrogating this treaty cannot be discussed, the letter continued, "without considering at the same time the other promises" upon which the treaty was "really dependent." In the next breath Mr. Stimson charges Japan with having already modified and at least temporarily abrogated the Nine-Power Treaty. Can Mr. Stimson mean that we intend to increase our naval armaments and fortify Guam and the Philippines, if Japan persists in its violation of this agreement? And would this not be a direct and undisguised display of hostility toward the Japanese? If he did not mean this, his reference to "the other promises" is pointless. If we have no intention of seeking to increase our navy or fortify our possessions in the western Pacific, why mention them at all? Clearly this question was brought into the letter solely to serve as a warning to Japan that we will keep the "Open Door" inviolate at all costs, even to the extent of resorting to the use of armed force should that be thought necessary.

This warning is all the more apparent because of the action taken by the Senate Naval Affairs Committee on the same day that the Stimson statement was published. The committee sent to the Senate with its approval a bill authorizing the expenditure of approximately a billion dollars on new naval construction. The significance of this action was certainly not lost upon the other Powers. It cannot be held that there was no connection between the two events. Mr. Stimson cannot say that he did not know the committee was planning to take such action, for that would be a confession of incompetence. It is the business of the State Department to inform itself as to all pending acts of the government that might possibly have any bearing on foreign relations. Moreover, the State Department surely knew what effect the Senate committee's action was likely to have. If it considered this contemplated move embarrassing to its restatement of Chinese policy, it could easily have prevailed upon the committee to postpone action for a few days. Hence the conclusion is inescapable that the two events were directly related.

This business of rattling the American saber, however carefully that rattling may be done, is foolhardy at any time, but especially so just now. It simply adds to the war sentiment in this country which we discussed last week. It appears at this writing that the Stimson warning has had some effect on the Far Eastern situation. The Japanese are cautiously suing for peace. On the strength of this development it might be contended, to use the reasoning of the advocates of an economic boycott, that any device, even saber-rattling, is excusable if it actually prevents war. But is it not just such dangerous threats to use force, whether the threats are those of boycotts or military displays, that usually lead to an uncontrollable international explosion?

War by Boycott

THE agitation here for an economic boycott of Japan has been temporarily scotched by Senator Borah's firm opposition and by the apparent attitude of the British and French governments, but there can be little doubt that it will make its appearance again as soon as the meeting of the Assembly of the League of Nations is under way. It is only natural, of course, that those opposed to Japan's brazen and barbarous attack on China should wish to see the League and the Powers take every possible step to bring that attack to a halt; but before they approve such a weapon as the economic boycott they ought gravely to consider its probable consequences.

That a successful economic boycott would be close to ruinous for Japan there can be little doubt; few of the great Powers are so dependent as she is on foreign trade. But economic ruin means unemployment, famine, and starvation; it includes the civilian population, women and children, as well as the military, and it affects most precisely those who are already weakest. The economic boycott is not a peace weapon, but one of the deadliest of war weapons, and there is not the slightest doubt that the Japanese would consider it such. Moreover, like other weapons of warfare, it hurts the nations that use it as well as the nation against which it is used. And it does not hurt them equally, but merely in proportion to their previous trade with the boycotted nation.

In the present instance the lion's share of the burden of such a boycott would fall upon the United States. Our trade with Japan is incomparably larger than that of any other nation; it is three times as great as that of China, which ranks second. As there is no equality in the burden of a boycott as among nations, neither is there any as among industries. Raw silk, for example, comprises two-fifths of Japan's total exports; the United States takes practically all of it; of our imports from Japan four-fifths, in value, consist of raw silk. Our exports to Japan show the same lack of balance. Fully one-half of them are in our raw cotton, of which Japan takes 40 per cent; the remainder consists mainly of lumber, iron and steel, machinery, petroleum, and automobiles. The outside burden of an economic boycott against Japan, therefore, would not only fall chiefly on the United States, but within the United States itself it would fall chiefly on two industries—cotton growing and silk-fabric manufacture, gravely increasing the distress in the South and the unemployment in the North. Obviously no one with elementary notions of justice would hold that the moral conscience of the world should be satisfied chiefly at the expense of American cotton growers and American silk workers. Japan could only be expected to strike back, and she would strike back chiefly at the United States, because we should have become her chief economic enemy.

The reasons for opposing an economic boycott in the present instance are obviously reasons for opposing the economic boycott in principle. Not only would there be no equality of trade loss among the participating nations in the present instance; there would never be such an equality of trade loss. Always some of the nations employing the boycott would suffer more than others through the sheer moral accident of having heavier trade with the nation against which the boycott was directed. It should be clear that if the economic boycott ever became established as a recognized weapon by League members and "neutrals" for disciplining nations, there could only follow an exacerbation of the present perilous tendency toward economic nationalism, isolationism, and "self-containment." Individual nations would prepare themselves against such a step by raising their tariff barriers still higher. A tariff is nothing more nor less than a partial economic boycott; like an outright boycott, it is essentially a weapon of war. It does not consist in a refusal to sell goods, but in a virtual refusal to buy them, which, by removing means of payment, soon makes it impossible to sell them either. The League and the Powers, including ourselves, should bend every effort to make peace in the Far East, but we must make peace with the methods of peace, and not with the methods of war.

Be Safe with Roosevelt

SURELY no aspirant for the highest office in the country has ever been plagued with knottier problems than is Governor Roosevelt. While the world is trembling under a burden of debt, unemployment, and the threat of war, the Governor has New York City upon his hands. He needs the ninety delegates of New York State in the coming convention; to get them he must remain friends with Tammany Hall. But to be too openly friendly with the Tiger might very well cost him votes in other parts of the country. The Seabury Committee has been barking at his heels for a year; the reformers, progressives, and other friends whom the Governor wishes to conciliate have been urging action. The Tiger has merely sat tight. On January 23 Mr. Roosevelt declared himself formally a candidate for the Presidency; on February 24 he removed Sheriff Farley from office. The month between must have been one of soul-searching and sleepless vigils. Not for the Sheriff. He, noble man, bears the Governor no ill-will, but announces that he will campaign for him just as heartily as if nothing had happened. But for the Governor, a bad four weeks.

During those first weeks of his candidacy, Mr. Roosevelt quite properly made a number of pronouncements on subjects of world import. He took several stands. For one thing he came out firmly and unequivocally against the entrance of the United States into the League of Nations. He has not yet declared his position on whether or not this country shall to a man join the Mormon church, but it can confidentially be asserted that he is against that, also. He opposed the cancelation of war debts, thus lining himself up with an overwhelming majority of both parties in Congress and of public opinion in the country. He discussed prohibition, and advocated the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment, stressing, in a period of depression, the revenue to be gained thereby. In its place he would substitute State control, local option, but never, never the return of the saloon. He did not say how the saloon could be successfully prohibited, but presumably by those federal agencies which were at the same time preventing liquor from wet States from being carried over into dry ones. Finally he came to the great Democratic subject of the tariff. And for the tariff Governor Roosevelt advocated a world conference to consider "reciprocal methods by which we can start the actual interchange of goods."

Having disposed of these weighty subjects, the Governor took up the Farley case. His manner when he respectfully questioned the Sheriff on the mysterious funds that he had somehow accumulated in his bank balances was kindness itself. His note covering Farley's dismissal was equally kind. He dismissed the charges that the Sheriff had been incompetent, that he had appropriated interest on public funds, that he had wilfully refused to testify in a private examination. The sole reason for dismissal was: "I am not satisfied with the explanation of the sources of a large portion of the sums of money involved, and I hold that Sheriff Farley has not complied with the spirit or the letter of the rule which should guide public officials."

The Sheriff, therefore, is removed from office, with no hard feeling, and Tammany is waiting for the Governor to appoint another Tammany district leader in his place, this time, doubtless, one with a better memory for cashed checks. Mr. Roosevelt has been able to avoid offense. He is safe. He is safe on the League of Nations, which almost nobody wants anyway, on the debts, which only a few cranks would like to cancel, on the tariff, which no really practical man, though it be in accordance with the traditional position of the Democratic Party, would wish to lower, on prohibition, which we may talk about changing if we do it by passing the buck of the necessity for firm control from one governmental agency—which has failed in the last ten years—to another which failed long ago. When Mr. Roosevelt announced for the nomination, his supporters enthusiastically declared that 678 of the necessary two-thirds' vote of 770 in the convention were already his. In spite of the booms for Speaker Garner and Alfalfa Bill Murray, which are merrily rolling on, in spite of the stern pronunciamiento from former Governor Smith that he will not "in advance of the convention either support or oppose the candidacy of any aspirant for the nomination," the Roosevelt enthusiasm is evidently well placed. If a candidate can successfully continue, through the duration of his candidacy, to give offense to no one, if he can be happily all things to all men, why should he not be rewarded with admittance to the sacred precincts of the temple, why should not the accolade, the guerdon, the last and farthest symbol of public trust be his? Why should he not, in short, be nominated in June and elected next November? There are, of course, a number of answers to these rhetorical questions. They can be left to another day.

Gerhart Hauptmann

THIRTY-EIGHT years after his first visit Gerhart Hauptmann has returned to America. Whereas a generation ago Hauptmann passed an unobtrusive short stay in this country, living in a small boarding-house while he was helping to produce his "Hannele's Way to Heaven," today he is met at the City Hall by an official reception committee consisting of Mayor Walker and Nicholas Murray Butler, a swarm of college professors, and eager newspapermen. He is presented with an honorary doctorate and hailed as the foremost spirit of German letters. His coming to celebrate the Goethe centenary lends emphasis to the often-repeated claim of his admirers that he is the rightful heir to the mantle of the greatest poet Germany has produced. The banquets and speeches of the Goethe celebration will no doubt see the names of Hauptmann and the classical poet linked in expressions of fervid praise, but these will little indicate to Americans the real status of Hauptmann in contemporary German life and literature. Little is known of the wide gulf which stands between the once rebellious and secular, but now complacent and religious Hauptmann and the immediate needs and problems of his fatherland and the world.

Hauptmann has always been a consummate craftsman whatever his subject or his medium. He received the Nobel prize for his prolific output of plays, novels, stories, and poetic narratives, all as nearly perfect from the point of view of technique as one could wish. Perhaps too often this technical perfection, this richness of language and fidelity to dialect blinded us to the essential weakness and obscurity of his romantic philosophy. Hauptmann is doubtless the ideal subject for literary analysis by college professors; he belongs rather to the cloistered quiet than to the noise and heat of modern life.

His physical similarity to Goethe and his belief that he follows in the great man's footsteps have led to a curious idolatry of Hauptmann. Since the celebration of his sixtieth birthday Hauptmann has established himself as the unofficial Poet Laureate, and more and more is becoming the perceptor Germaniae. It is true that admirers regularly have suggested his nomination for President of the Reich, but few have taken seriously this noble gesture. He has been made the legendary hero of a cult at Hiddensee, and his castle at Agnetendorf is a place of pilgrimage. He has posed with dignity for a film on "Ways to Strength and Beauty," and his philosophic conversations have been put to paper by an unofficial Eckermann. Yet while Goethe achieved a cosmic outlook which found expression in an amazing mass of poems, plays, novels, and important scientific studies, of great value to mankind at large, Hauptmann has never stepped beyond the narrow confines of an individualist bourgeois attitude. His ideas never ran toward radicalism, and his essential romanticism and religious solution of life's problems have long shown themselves. His naturalistic style, his use of dialect, the themes of workaday life, of all of which "The Weavers" is the classic example, have only been an outer garment for a pious belief in individual salvation.

Goethe was fascinated by the power of the French Revolution, the mighty conquests of Napoleon; the second part of "Faust" is a great plea for man to immerse himself in the public life, to strive eternally for the communal good. Hauptmann, on the other hand, remained immobile, as a great war and several revolutions shook the world. In 1920 he was still dealing in the same way with the same problem to which he was so powerfully attracted at the beginning of his career—the problem of the sensitive man torn between two women. His recent "Buch der Leidenschaft," a diary in two volumes, reveals how completely he lives in an air-tight chamber apart from world events, and how his exalted personal experiences have come to preoccupy him. Today when we honor the seventy-year-old Hauptmann we really acclaim the young man whose ardor flared up for a span and then burned out into innocuous fantasy three decades ago.

Mass Misery in Philadelphia*

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Philadelphia, February 23

SOON after he took office last month Mayor J. Hampton Moore declared: "I toured the lower sections of South Philadelphia. I went into the small streets, and saw little of poverty. . . . I have counted automobiles and watched them pass a given point. Rich and poor, white and colored, alien and native-born, all riding by. . . . There is no starvation in Philadelphia."

To this Mac Parker, investigator for the Philadelphia Record, replied:

Mayor Moore need not have gone into the lower sections of South Philadelphia. He need not have traveled the wide boulevard which is the Parkway. From the porch of his own home at 318 Carpenter Lane, in well-to-do and comfortable Germantown, the Mayor could have flung stones upon the suffering and poverty in his immediate neighborhood. . . . Behind the lace curtains which the Mayor saw hanging in the windows of "the clean and comfortable homes" lies the picture he didn't see. Gaunt children, sunken eyes, ten-year-olds nineteen pounds under weight. Children in rags, without sufficient clothes to permit their attendance at school. Children without shoes. . . . Starvation in Philadelphia today is an accumulative starvation; starvation through undernourishment; slow starvation from insufficient food.

A day or two before I arrived in Philadelphia a Negro youth of patently deficient mental powers confessed that he had assaulted and murdered a white girl of seven. The crime took place in an abandoned tenement on North American Street. This narrow and shabby thoroughfare lies near the heart of Philadelphia's "Bandbox District." Here extreme poverty has existed since long before the bull-market crash in 1929. The Bandbox tenements are almost all narrow, three-story affairs, one room to a floor. They have no modern heating or plumbing, the majority of them having to depend on outdoor toilets. They are dirty, dingy, and dark, facing upon narrow lanes and courts, some of which are no more than five feet across. Approximately 140,000 people live in the district, in these unsanitary and depressing slum dwellings. In some of the tenements they live two, three, and even four families to a room. What effect such conditions have upon human conduct may be seen from a study recently made of fifteen families that had crowded themselves into nine of these tenements. Over a period of three years there had been reported in the fifteen families thirteen cases of illegitimacy and attacks on girls and women, eleven cases of desertion, three of imbecility, eighteen of communicable diseases, seven of absolute poverty, five of cruelty and incorrigibility, and five of chronic drunkenness. This offers but a brief picture of what must be happening to many of the other thousands of families in the district.

The Bandbox District was suddenly called to the attention of the social-minded residents of Philadelphia by the murder of Dorothy Lutz. There is now in full swing a campaign to abolish these hideous slums. But, one may ask, what of the larger social problem that has fixed itself upon Philadelphia as a result of unemployment? What of the distress and mass misery to be found in every quarter of the city? Will it take, let us say, a few more murders or perhaps a hunger riot or two, to awaken the good people of the city to the true significance of this problem? There is a distinct connection between the Bandbox District and unemployment in Philadelphia, for under the pressure of unemployment whole sections of the city are sinking into conditions not unlike those obtaining in the slums.

Many of the more fortunate residents of the city, though they know there is unemployment, have really no conception of its extent or severity. I heard it said by more than one person that the mild winter was a blessing, for it meant that the jobless were not suffering! And there are any number of business men and other affluent citizens here who are only too anxious to believe with Mayor Moore that there is no poverty in Philadelphia. They quite obviously think that if this poverty is discovered, something may have to be done about it, and that something would certainly mean an increase in taxes. To the last man these Philadelphians are opposed to higher taxes. Their representatives in Washington say that the federal government must not help because the problem is one for the States and communities. Clinton A. Sowers, machine Republican and a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature representing a Philadelphia district, declared that "Governor Pinchot thinks that all this relief should be distributed from Harrisburg under his personal direction. We think that the neighborhoods of the State know more about the needs of the people than the Governor does." And in this neighborhood the principal public servant, Mayor Moore, declares that "there is no poverty." So the political merry-go-round runs on, while at least 300,000 Philadelphians are in dire need. The poverty and spreading destitution are not thrust under one's nose as one walks along the principal business streets. There are without question thousands of automobiles to be seen daily on the boulevards, and more raccoon coats along Chestnut Street than can be found on any college campus. But just beyond the business section, in the homes of the unemployed on the river front, in the Bandbox District, in South and West Philadelphia, one may quickly learn whether there is any actual suffering.

In Philadelphia, as in most other cities, the poor are taking care of the poor. Thousands of small, independent shopkeepers are going bankrupt trying to help their neighbors. The Philadelphia Record found any number of these corner grocers, butchers, and bakers, heavily in debt themselves, who had on their books unpaid accounts of customers running in some cases into the hundreds of dollars. John Nigro, a baker, was sued for debt a few days ago. His accounts receivable totaled $5,000. He could collect none of them; he knew when he was letting these bills run up that he was dispensing charity, but he continued to provide relief for his neighbors until he himself went to the wall. In the same neighborhood another shopkeeper, pointing to a bill of

* The second of a series of articles by Mr. Hallgren on unemployment in various parts of the country.—EDITOR THE NATION.

$200 that was owed him, said: "Eleven children in that house. They've got no shoes, no pants. In the house, no chairs. My God, you go in there, you cry, that's all. What can you do? Let them go hungry?"

So, too, with many of the landlords. There have been evictions seemingly without end, but inquiry reveals that in most of these cases the landlords own extensive properties. The bulk of the residential property is in the hands of small property-owners, people who own their own homes and perhaps one or two other houses. And untold numbers of these landlords are now destitute or nearly so. Yet they allow their tenants to live on for months without paying rent. In one small area covering a few city blocks I found more than two hundred families who were back in their rent anywhere from six to eighteen months. I visited the home of Mrs. Stout, a widow with a grown son who for months had been without work. She had been buying her home through a building-and-loan association. Some time ago she found it necessary to rent out the second and third floors as separate apartments. Her tenants like her son lost their jobs; they stayed on through the summer and fall, paying no rent. The day I was there all three families were destitute. The gas and electricity had been shut off; all three pantries were virtually empty; Mrs. Stout had not a nickel to meet the next building-and-loan payment which was due that evening. She was about to lose her home. Her case was by no means exceptional. There are hundreds of landlords who hang on to the bitter end, letting go only when the mortgage-holder or tax-collector steps in—and then they and their tenants have to double up with relatives or neighbors, or go out into the streets. No fewer than fifteen hundred dwellings are being sold at public auction in Philadelphia every month.

How heavy is the load that these shopkeepers and landlords are carrying can never be measured. But another tremendous load is being borne by the Unemployment Relief Committee, as to whose work statistics are available. The chairman of the organization is Horatio Gates Lloyd, partner in the local branch of Morgan and Company. A year ago Lloyd was typical of his class, a conservative banker, thinking little of the masses. Today he does not hesitate to advocate direct government relief for the unemployed, to support the Costigan-La Follette bill, to which those of his kind in Philadelphia are bitterly opposed. It may be that Lloyd has been sincerely moved by what he has seen of privation among the workers, or it may be that he is acting out of pure selfishness, knowing that a hungry people will imperil his property and his wealth. But whatever his motive, his committee is doing a remarkable job—with the all too slim resources at its disposal. I say this in all frankness, although I do not believe in the sort of private charity to which Philadelphia is having to submit. Lloyd himself has come to acknowledge the limitations of private charity, of the American system of "self-help" concerning which we hear so much from Washington. In a recent statement he pointed out that the average amount of relief expended by his committee per family is $4.38 per week. "While it must be remembered," he said, "that in most instances this was supplemented from such other sources as relatives, churches, wages of minors, and the like, this amount was grossly inadequate. It can best be described as disaster relief, merely enough to maintain existence."

The Lloyd organization began operating last June as a special branch of the Department of Public Welfare. The municipal government borrowed $3,000,000 to pay for the relief to be distributed. Lloyd insisted that the work of distribution be taken out of the hands of the politicians and placed completely in his charge. His organization also took over the relief work of all the private agencies. Thus with one agency dispensing relief, and that agency beholden to no political machine or privileged group, the task so far has been efficiently accomplished with a minimum of overhead expense. In fact, overhead charges, including service and administration supplies and the pay roll of the relief workers, have averaged only 6.8 per cent of the total outlay of the committee, all the rest of its funds going into food, milk, gas, shoes, and coal for the unemployed. This is probably a better record than can be shown by any similar organization anywhere in the country.

Toward the end of December the city's $3,000,000 was exhausted, and the Lloyd committee had to resort to panhandling on a large scale. In a public subscription drive which began in November, the sum of $10,404,446.71 was raised in cash and pledges. It is hoped that this new fund will last until May, but with the number of families being helped growing daily there is considerable doubt as to this. After that the city may get $2,500,000 from the State—if the State Supreme Court upholds the Talbot Act, which provides for the distribution of $10,000,000 in direct relief to the unemployed. And then? Philadelphia is not thinking, hardly dares think, beyond this point. The municipality is broke and cannot even pay its own employees. The men and women who conducted the United Campaign drive feel certain that very little additional money, if any, can be raised by public subscription. They say that private citizens have just about given their all, or at least those citizens have done so who intend to give anything toward helping the jobless.

And what if the need for relief should continue to grow, and the funds now in sight be exhausted before May? There is every likelihood that this will happen. In December, 1930, relief was being extended to 6,590 families by the original Unemployment Relief Committee. This figure grew until in April it reached 24,031; from this point it declined somewhat until August, when it again began to mount. In August there were 23,114 families on the dole; in September, 28,923; October, 31,584; November, 35,595; December, 47,779; and January, 55,643. Last week the total had swelled to 57,126. Where it will end, it is impossible to forecast. Every day brings new applicants to the relief stations. Of late these people have been of a distinctly better class, better, that is, in the sense that their standard of living had been much higher than that of the average worker; they had been well paid, had known many comforts and even luxuries, and had never before been in want. They were skilled artisans, professional people, men and women of the white-collar class. They had continued to depend upon the corner grocer, the church, and relatives for help until all these sources of aid had dried up and they had been forced to come to the Relief Committee, begging to be placed on the dole. Most of them had refused to come until every last scrap of bread had been eaten and every last chunk of coal burned. How many more families, too proud to ask for charity, do not come at all cannot even be guessed. Every day dozens of these families are turned up by relief workers in the field, or by neighbors who are too poor themselves to help but who cannot bear to see the people next door go hungry.

What the applicants get in the way of relief is all too meager. Approximately 77 per cent of the money expended goes into grocery orders; another 12 per cent for food; the remainder, bare pittance, for coal, shoes, and gas. No electric bills are paid, and the Lloyd committee has decided it cannot possibly undertake to meet rent bills, for this, it has been estimated, would add 25 per cent to the cost of relief and cut down the food distributed in corresponding measure. It is more essential that the unemployed at least get something to eat. Neither food nor money is directly distributed. Applicants are given grocery orders, the money value of which is determined by the number of persons in each family. The average family every week gets a grocery order worth approximately $4. These orders are honored by most of the stores of the city, who use them in meeting their obligations to the wholesale houses, and the wholesale dealers turn them into the Relief Committee for cash. Families with small children get in addition a weekly milk order. Obviously it takes a great deal of stretching to make $4 cover a week's food for a family of five.

What are the effects of depression—and the dole—on Philadelphia's unemployed? It is perhaps too early to tell; the real consequences may not be known for years, when the children now being brought up on starvation rations reach working age. Nevertheless, close students of the local problem see the physical energy and the nervous resistance of the jobless workers being slowly ground down. Each individual requires more care, more medical attention than he did a year ago. Dr. Jacob Billikopf, who as head of the Jewish Charities has carefully watched the present situation as it developed, is authority for the statement that "the 250,000 persons affected by unemployment today are suffering much more than 300,000 would have suffered a year ago, or 500,000 two years ago."

I could not possibly have talked with all the miserable families in the city. However, in company with different workers attached to the Relief Committee I did visit about thirty homes. Most of the homes were those of normally well-paid mechanics and building workers. I found bewilderment and confusion rather than discouragement or desperation. Not one of the many persons I talked to had really given up hope, but every one of them was rapidly drifting in that direction. All were heavily in debt, had borrowed to the limit on their insurance policies; some had sold much of their furniture, and would have sold more if they could have found buyers. The younger men spent most of their waking hours looking for odd jobs, but the rest were inclined rather to remain in the seclusion of their homes, visibly ashamed of their misfortune or else convinced that it was futile to look for work when there was no work to do. Inquiry revealed that temporary jobs invariably go to the younger men; the middle-aged and older men are simply not given a chance. The most discouraging sign I noted was the total lack of interest in outside activities on the part of all the men I talked with. Although workers for the Relief Committee have repeatedly urged them to seek recreation in study, at the public gymnasiums and playgrounds, or in the free museums and art galleries—printed lists of the various recreation centers, settlement houses, public evening schools, art schools, and museums, which can be attended without charge, have been distributed to the unemployed—these men will not take advantage of the opportunities offered. It seems to be the first instinct of the jobless man to want to withdraw from contact with normal society, in which he feels he no longer has a place. But this, while undoubtedly a result of the depression, cannot be put down as a consequence of the "soul-destroying" dole. I noted little evidence that the dispensation of charity was undermining the character of Philadelphia's unemployed. There was, of course, the man I found lying abed at two o'clock in the afternoon, who clearly felt that so long as other people were feeding him there really was no reason for him to look for work; and there were a number of families who appeared to have lost their sense of responsibility, and who probably would have shown more initiative in finding for themselves had they not known they would get their regular grocery orders at the end of the week.

Again, no positive sign of revolt was discernible, though admittedly it was difficult to get these men to speak frankly. They were afraid that whatever they had to say might prejudice their chances of obtaining continued relief. Nevertheless, an undercurrent of rebellion was noticeable. Strangely enough, most of the grumbling was directed not against the employers or the government, but against the churches. A skilled mechanic by the name of McCollan, a Roman Catholic, complained bitterly that the clergy did not appreciate the extreme plight of their parishioners. Five other families, all Protestants, had given up going to church because, Mrs. Brown, wife of a cabinetmaker put it, "the church no longer means anything to us." A man named Johnson said that at least half the members of the congregation of his church were continuing to attend only in the hope that the church would be able to help them eke out the slim relief they get from the Lloyd committee. Only one family was openly in revolt. I reached the home of Mrs. Duffy, whose husband is a gardener, about thirty minutes after the constable had been there to serve an eviction notice. Mrs. Duffy cried throughout the interview. Her greatest worry was that her husband and three sons really meant to go out that evening to steal bread for themselves at the point of pistols. They had procured weapons and laid careful plans for their foraging expedition.

But there is no assurance that more Duffys will not turn to robbery, or that other jobless men will not rebel in other ways. Last June, before the city's $3,000,000 fund became available, all relief was suspended for three weeks. The stations were kept open and applications for relief continued to be taken, but toward the end of that period the relief workers in the stations had become seriously alarmed by the rising temper of the applicants. They spoke roughly, demanded food in no uncertain terms, and a few even threatened to take direct action. Should there be another suspension of relief, now that the misery has greatly increased, there is no telling what might happen. In anticipation of trouble the Philadelphia police force is undergoing special training in gas warfare and in the suppression of riots. According to the Evening Bulletin, 1,800 policemen have now had sufficient training "and could prove their skill at a moment's notice. The department is always ready for anything, particularly in hard times." So far it has been unnecessary to bring out the gas bombs and riot guns.

Presidential Possibilities

II. Ritchie and No Regrets*

By GERALD W. JOHNSON

ALBERT CABELL RITCHIE, Governor of Maryland since time immemorial, treats his brain as a tool, not as a toy. With it he can do beautifully finished and accurate work; but he does not like to play with it.

And this is, perhaps, the basic reason why he has not run away with the Democratic nomination for the Presidency. For he has all the other trappings of a popular hero—an impressive bearing, a handsome face, a good voice, courage, ability, and honor. He has the face and figure of a Plumed Knight—but never a plume.

Present Ritchie in his official capacity with the stubbornest, knottiest sort of governmental problem, and he will think his way through it, smoothly, swiftly, accurately. But it never occurs to him to engage in a battle of wits for the sheer delight of intellectual exercise. There is in him none of the quality that inspired Theodore Roosevelt's resounding forays against objectives far outside the field of politics. A result is that Ritchie is not, like Roosevelt, adored by every mad fellow with a restless brain. Nor has he, like Wilson, made scholarship his business, so that he does not impress the populace with the extent of his learning. Highly intelligent as he is, his is a matter-of-fact intelligence.

Thus, while he takes the very highest rating as an administrator, he does not rank equally high as a popular leader. He can inspire confidence. He can, under the right circumstances, inspire enthusiasm, but not the shouting, camp-meeting brand of enthusiasm. No convention would ever be moved to sing "Onward, Christian Soldiers" as it nominated Ritchie. If the Democrats in Chicago next June get to the singing stage, Ritchie is sunk, for he is not the sort of candidate to appeal to a singing convention.

At that, he is no languid campaigner. Maryland, in Presidential elections a doubtful State, has elected him four times to the Governor's office, each time by a majority larger than the one he received before. The last time, in 1930, his majority broke all records for a candidate for Governor of Maryland. There is significance in the campaign slogan his managers chose for him on this occasion. It was "Ritchie or Regret." That is the way Maryland feels about it. Thousands of men who could have picked out a dozen candidates they liked better voted for Ritchie simply because they felt that no other man in public life would make as good a Governor. His appeal was to reason, not to emotion.

But it worked, and the fact that it worked is Maryland's excuse for offering him as Presidential timber. For Ritchie has done something more than simply administer admirably the affairs of a small and relatively insignificant State. He has introduced a new technique into American political practice, and has demonstrated that it will work. He has held the Governorship continuously for twelve years, and in not one of the twelve has he failed to make enemies; yet at each successive election his majority has continued to grow, eliminating any doubt of his political craftsmanship.

This technique can be summed up in a word—candor. In none of his four successful campaigns has Albert C. Ritchie obtained any man's vote under false pretenses. The outcome is that he has lighted no fires of resentment to smolder in the breasts of honest men who voted for him believing him other than he proved to be. On the contrary, he has obtained a powerful grip on the loyalty of sincere men. Neither as a candidate nor as Governor has he straddled, or equivocated, or evaded; even his mistakes have been patently honest mistakes, and therefore retrievable.

For instance, about four years ago certain minor employees of the State Roads Commission were engaged in steady peculation. Ritchie had named a head of the commission a man in whom he had all confidence. As an engineer the man deserved confidence, for he was good; but as an executive he was, unfortunately, less competent. The thieves were getting away with thousands, but he suspected nothing. A man who had been a political enemy of Ritchie for years got some inkling of the facts and proceeded to broadcast charges. Ritchie summoned the head of the commission, who assured him that all was well, whereupon the Governor jumped to the conclusion that the charges were purely political and proceeded to castigate the broadcaster in blistering terms. Unfortunately, though, the charges were true, and Ritchie found himself out on a very long limb.

But he saw and immediately took the only way out. With grim resolution he set to work to prosecute the thieves, and never rested until the last of them was behind prison bars. This did not recover the $400,000 they had stolen, to be sure, but it did satisfy the public sense of justice. Maryland, marking the long sentences inflicted, decided that there would not be much more stealing under this Governor, and voted for Ritchie more heavily than ever.

Once before he had denounced the wrong man. On the other occasion the victim was an official of the State University, who criticized the Governor and the legislature for what he considered their niggardliness toward the university. But on that occasion, also, Ritchie believed that the criticism had behind it another motive than sincere interest in the welfare of the institution. Probably his belief was wrong, but it was none the less profound, and his anger mounted accordingly. It is significant that the two most conspicuous errors in his career were both due to rage against what he believed to be the ancient political trick of employing a good cause to cover a selfish aim. Devious political trickery is one provocation under which the ordinarily cool, unemotional man is capable of blowing up with a deafening roar.

* The second of a series of articles on leading Presidential candidates. The third will appear next week.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Maryland likes this forthright attitude, and with the passage of each successive Ritchie administration the State has liked it better and better. Maryland believes firmly that the country would like it, if the country could once be induced to try it. Maryland feels that if Ritchie were once elected, by ever so small a margin, at the end of four years he would be reelected practically unanimously. For while Ritchie never sets the boys howling with his flaming oratory, there is exhilaration in following a man who makes his words good, who refuses to promise what he can't perform, but who invariably performs what he promises.

What the candidacy of Ritchie offers the electorate is easily defined, but not so easily described. It is conservatism limited only by rigid honesty—intellectual as well as financial honesty. He has been subjected to the severe test of twelve years' continuous incumbency of the highest office in his State without exhibiting any symptoms of megalomania. His attitude toward his Presidential candidacy is typical of the man. His Presidential boom was formally launched at a dinner given by a Baltimore political club in January, and he began his speech at the dinner with these words: "Of course I would like to be President; who would not?"

There is Ritchie—honest enough to be honest with himself, as well as with the rest of the world, simple-minded enough to believe that the best way to protect his own dignity is to tell the truth, honorable enough to give his competitors warning that he will employ all fair means to secure the nomination. It is by no means certain that this is the best political method in the present circumstances, but it is Ritchie's method, and by it he will stand or fall.

His platform, as he outlined it in that speech, is a return to the Jeffersonian theory that that country is best governed which is least governed. But Ritchie is both intelligent and honest. He is aware that the world has moved since the sage of Monticello breathed his last, and he knows that while the theory of Jeffersonianism may remain unaltered, its practice in 1932 is far indeed from what it was in 1801. His discussion of the dole illuminates his whole political philosophy. He dislikes and distrusts the dole system, not because it is expensive, and not from any hypocritical fear of "pauperizing" the poor, but because it means "a bureaucracy so great that it would outbureaucrat all our other bureaucracies put together."

Nevertheless, strongly as he opposes it, he envisages the possibility that it may be inevitable. For his philosophy embraces a greater thing than any theory of government, Jeffersonian or Hamiltonian, and that is justice: "Industry benefits from labor in times of prosperity, and economic justice demands that some adequate provision be made for labor when adversity comes. But if industry does not fulfil its part in this obligation, then I very much fear that the pressure on government may finally force it to step in."

On international affairs his viewpoint is flatly, finally, and completely American. The war debts, for example, cannot be canceled because "if the foreign nations do not pay the money, the American people must." How blood is to be squeezed out of the foreign turnip he did not explain; it is probably one of those questions on which he has no views, because his lack of intellectual curiosity has not led him to think through a problem which has not directly concerned him as yet. But by the same token he did not commit himself to the existing debt settlements. He would not cancel a dollar in the interest of any foreign nation; but if anyone can show him convincing reasons for believing that softening the terms of settlement will subserve the interest of this country, he is free to move in that direction.

The thickest and longest and strongest plank in the Ritchie platform, however, is his insistence that the government be taken out of business. This is his old war-cry, but it is interesting to observe how it is slowly being modified with the passage of time. Even as lately as four years ago it was simply the doctrine of laissez faire with practically nothing else. But since then Ritchie has been edging over, until this year he has almost reached the point of view of those who hold that the only way to take the government out of business is first to eject business from the government.

To a large section of the population Ritchie is known solely as the wettest of all the men frequently mentioned as Democratic possibilities. The more fanatical drys are unable to believe that he is wet because he is a champion of local self-government, not the other way about. These people overlook the fact that although he is wet, he has signed more local prohibition laws than any other Governor of Maryland. Although he has consistently opposed the adoption of a State Volstead law, he has never objected to the enactment of local prohibitory statutes for the benefit of counties or municipalities in Maryland that desire them. Many such laws have been enacted during his incumbency of the Governor's office, and he has promptly signed them.

Doubtless what the country needs is a candidate with the tongue of Wilson and the integrity of Ritchie, a flame in the campaign and a rock in office, a man who can stir the voters to a delirium of enthusiasm, yet never defeat their hopes. But in the absence of such a marvel, Maryland ventures to offer Ritchie. He is not the flaming leader of a crusade. He can lead, but he cannot flame. He is the fire-proof candidate, the asbestos man. But he is an essentially conservative man who yet holds intelligence as more important than conservatism, a cautious man who nevertheless values honor above caution, a politician of high skill, yet one whose bag of tricks does not include either lying or dodging. A man of this type could make himself extremely useful in the White House.

As regards all the minor qualifications, Ritchie is amply equipped. Perhaps he doesn't look quite as much like a President as Harding did, but he is a fine-looking man, at that; and Harding, indeed, was a shade too perfect to be credible. Ritchie has the bearing of the old Southern aristocracy at its best; and whatever may be one's opinion of the social value of that aristocracy, it did carry itself with grace and dignity. There is a glint of humor in the Maryland Governor's make-up—not enough to convert him into a jokesmith, but too much to allow him ever to aspire to convert the Trinity into a quartet, no matter how great his success in earthly affairs may be. He is courteous to a fault in his personal relations and wholly devoid of affectation.

The Maryland Free State presents his name to the country not without dubiety. But the doubt is as to the country's readiness to appraise such a man at his true value, not at all as to that value. The Maryland delegation in the convention will vote for him to the bitter end with no mental reservations; for, no matter whether the country realizes it or not, Maryland is profoundly convinced that voting for Ritchie involves no regrets.

Free Air

A Strictly Imaginary Educational Broadcast

By JAMES RORTY

GOOD evening, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Great Radio Audience: I am speaking to you tonight through the courtesy of the Universal Food, Candy, Cigarette, and Gadget Company, makers of Cheeryoats, Wet Smack Bars, Old Mold Cigarettes, and Sweetie Washing Machines. My subject is education by radio. I shall try to explain to you why the National Committee on Education by Radio, representing nine educational associations, including the National Education Association, is sponsoring the Fess bill, which is now pending in Congress. The officials of the Planetary Broadcasting Company are opposed to the Fess bill. Its passage would, they think, affect adversely both their own commercial interests and the interests of other companies with which they are closely affiliated. They are, nevertheless, devoted to the principle of free speech, and loyal to their stewardship of the great national resource of the air. Accordingly they have offered the use of their facilities to me without charge, in order that I may place before you the issues which you, representing public opinion, the ultimate authority in a free democratic country like ours, must some day decide.

If you will have patience, I shall read the Fess bill in full. It is very brief.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled that . . . not less than 15 per cent, reckoned with due weight to all factors determining effective service, of the radio broadcasting facilities which are or may become subject to the control of and allocation by the Federal Radio Commission, shall be reserved for educational broadcasting exclusively and allocated, when and if applications are made therefor, to educational agencies of the federal or State governments and educational institutions chartered by the United States or by the respective States or Territories.

Who and what are these educational broadcasting stations that are claiming 15 per cent of the air? Most of you, probably, have never heard them or even heard of them, and I don't blame you. You see, ever since the passage of the Radio Act of 1927, and even before that, the educational broadcasting stations, operated chiefly by the State universities, have been running on flat tires. The air is free, all right, but try and get some of it. The records of the Federal Radio Commission show that in May, 1927, when the present radio law went into effect, there was a total of ninety-four educational institutions licensed to broadcast. On March 9, 1931, the number had been reduced to forty-nine. At present, out of a total of 440 units available to the United States, educational stations occupy only 23.16 units, or one-sixteenth of the available frequencies. During the same period, however, educational broadcasts, largely over commercial stations, have increased from almost nothing to almost a tenth of the total times used by all broadcasting stations now on the air. Harold A. LaFount, Federal Radio Commissioner, is authority for these figures. Commissioner LaFount also points out that although the forty-nine educational institutions now licensed to broadcast have been assigned a total of 3,669.2 hours per week, they have actually used only 1,229.28 hours, or one-third of the time which has been made available to them, and that of this time only 283.85 hours per week have been devoted to education. He further declares that the reduction in the number of educational stations since 1927 has occurred by virtue of the voluntary assignment or surrender by educational stations of their licenses, because they were unable financially to maintain them, or because they did not have sufficient program material to continue operation.

Commissioner LaFount believes, with the majority of his colleagues on the Federal Radio Commission, that the status of education on the air is healthy, and that the educators ought to be happy. I am here to tell you that the status of education on the air is not healthy and that the educators—their militant wing, at least—are not happy. On the contrary, they are bitter, rebellious, and determined. Let us get back of Commissioner LaFount's figures and see what actually has been happening.

To begin with, the Radio Act of 1927 reserves our national quota of broadcasting channels as public property and licenses their use, subject to revocation practically at will by the Federal Radio Commission. This body has discretionary power, subject to court review, to interpret and apply the principle of "public interest, convenience, and necessity" which the law embodies. But as at present constituted, the members of the Federal Radio Commission are not educators. They are business men, and they regard the interests of business as paramount in our civilization. From this point of view the right and proper disposition of every genie, such as radio, that pops out of the laboratory bottle of modern science is to put him to work making money for whoever happens to hold the neck of the bottle. If he makes enough money for somebody, then, in some mysterious way, "progress" and "civilization" will be served. This, I say, is the point of view of the business man, and it is the application of this point of view, more or less sympathetically aided by the Federal Radio Commission, which is responsible for the present preposterous and imbecile condition of radio broadcasting in this country. Does this seem strong language? Forgive me, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Great Radio Audience. Admittedly, I am neither a business man nor an inventor. From where I sit, as a simple naive professor, the radio looks to me like the most revolutionary instrument of communication ever placed in human hands; it seems to me that its free and creative use, not to make money, but to further education and culture and to inform public opinion, is perhaps the most crucial problem with which our civilization is confronted. But, of course, I didn't invent the con-founded gadget, and I may be wrong. Let us listen to the man who did—Dr. Lee De Forest, who, more than any other single American, has been associated with the science of radio from its beginning. A while back Dr. De Forest spent some time listening to what the business men have been doing to his child. Here is what he said:

Why should anyone want to buy a radio, or new tubes for an old set? Nine-tenths of what one can hear is the continual drivel of second-rate jazz, sickening crooning by degenerate sax players (original or transcribed), interrupted by blatant sales talk, meaningless but maddening station announcements, impudent commands to buy or try, actually superposed over a background of what might alone have been good music.

Get out into the sticks, away from your fine symphony-orchestra pick-ups, and listen for twenty-four hours to what 80 per cent of American listeners have to endure. Then you'll learn what is wrong with the radio industry. It isn't hard times. It is broadcasters' greed—which is worse, much worse—and like T. B. grows continually worse, until patient radio public dies. That's all the trouble. Simple, isn't it?

You know, it's strange, but Dr. De Forest talks almost like a professor. He reminds me of the late Professor Vernon L. Parrington, who, in the last volume of his "Main Currents in American Thought," remarked that science in this country had become "the drab and slut of industrialism." This again is harsh language. In justice to science, it may be granted that the lady is more sinned against than sinning. Yet it remains true that in competing for her favors, the educators, who are notoriously platonic in their enthusiasms anyway, have been at a marked disadvantage. Take, for example, this "voluntary" surrender of the air which Commissioner LaFount is so cheerful about. What has actually happened is that the educational stations have steadily been given less desirable frequencies; they have then been asked to divide their time with some commercial broadcaster; they have been obliged to meet some new regulation involving costly equipment—often, as the educators themselves admit, a regulation essentially right in itself, but applied with such suddenness as not to allow time for adjustment in the educational budget; finally, by the time they had got together the money for technical and program improvements, they would be obliged to spend it on lawyers' fees and on trips to Washington to defend their right to broadcast at all.

While, for these and other reasons, the voice of independent education on the air has been fading, the voice of education sponsored by such companies as my host tonight and by the commercial broadcasting companies themselves in sustaining programs has been rapidly swelling in volume. Many of our most eminent educators have, tentatively at least, accepted this substitution. Some of them serve on the Advisory Council of the National Broadcasting Company; others are on the National Advisory Council on Radio in Education, which includes in its membership not only educators and publicists but also representatives of the two great broadcasting chains—National Broadcasting Company and Columbia Broadcasting Company. This organization is financed jointly by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and the Carnegie Corporation. Its announced objectives are primarily fact-finding and fact-dissemination, and it has made and published valuable studies of both the technical and social problems of broadcasting. More recently it has sponsored educational broadcasts given over commercial stations, the first of the series being by Dr. Robert A. Millikan, who is president of this National Council. The commercial broadcasters greeted the formation of the National Council with enthusiasm; they have, in fact, repeatedly declared their willingness to give the educators all the free time on the air they can use, when and if the educators come prepared with educational programs which "do not bore too great a proportion of their audiences too much."

What do they mean—"their audiences"? Our national quota of radio frequencies is public property under the law, and these broadcasters are licensed to use assigned frequencies, subject to revocation practically at will by the Federal Radio Commission. I assert that they are using this public property, not in the "public interest, convenience, and necessity," but in their own private commercial interest and that of the commercial advertisers whom they serve. For example, what public interest, convenience, or necessity is served by the disingenuous superlatives which are lavished night after night by my host, the Universal Food, Candy, Cigarette, and Gadget Corporation, on Cheeryoats, Wet Smack Bars, Old Mold Cigarettes, and Sweetie Washing Machines? If you really wanted to know the truth about these things you would demand that disinterested government experts from such departments as Public Health and the Bureau of Standards broadcast a genuine educational program which would, incidentally, debunk nine-tenths of the radio advertising now on the air. If, in addition, you want entertainment, including jazz, I suggest that you pay for it straight by means of a tax imposed on receiving sets, as is done in England and in Europe, and will shortly be done in Canada if the recommendations of the government radio commission are followed.

Do not imagine that you are not now paying for what you get and paying high. As taxpayers, you are paying directly the $444,179.94 annual budget of the Federal Radio Commission, most of which is spent in futile attempts to "regulate" the existing commercial chaos. As cigarette smokers, gum chewers, gadget users, and antiseptic garglers, you are paying indirectly the total budget of all the broadcasting stations, which is estimated to be over $75,000,000 a year. This total is more, far more, than is paid by the radio listeners in all the countries of Europe combined. All you really get free is the efforts of philanthropic organizations like the National Committee and the National Council to inject some sort of civilized decency into the absurd situation which has resulted from your failure to make representative government represent your true interests.

Do you realize, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Great Radio Audience, that your ears and minds are offered for sale to the highest bidder by profit-motivated corporations which have no title to what they sell and no title to the medium they use except squatters' rights which, if contested, they will defend in the courts? Do you imagine for a moment that education can permanently function as an appendage of toothpaste- and cigarette-sponsored jazz and vaudeville? Do you suppose that your views, your preferences, your rights, can make any headway at all against the economic determinism which obliges the commercial broadcaster to sell his most valuable time to advertisers, to permit the advertiser to cajole, bore, deceive, and insult the intelligence of his hearers to the limit? Do you imagine that even if educational institutions were able to pay for the facilities of commercial stations, instead of accepting their compromised and qualified gifts of free air, educational programs would thereby obtain ■ complete right of way? Even so conservative an expert as Mr. H. V. Kaltenborn, editor of the Newspaper of the Air, does not think so. As he points out, commercial stations would insist that the programs must interest most of their listeners, lest competing stations win them away; they would also refuse to offend important advertisers by denying them the right to purchase popular periods on particular days. Finally, although Mr. Kaltenborn does not make this point, they would ultimately be obliged to censor any educational broadcast which affected adversely the interests of their advertising clients.

Admittedly, Ladies and Gentlemen, the Fess bill, even if passed, would not represent a complete or permanently satisfactory solution of the problem of converting broadcasting to intelligent social uses. It would, however, drive a wide breach into the existing system of commercial exploitation, and prepare the ground for the recapture by the people of the free air which they have never legally surrendered.

Birth Control Not Enough for China!

By AGNES SMEDLEY

Shanghai, January 5

IF one wishes to develop a theory about the need for birth control and its possible effects upon society, China affords one of the most fertile fields imaginable. Many Chinese intellectuals have already developed this theory and, bolstered up with formidable figures, have advocated birth control as the cure for overpopulation, famine, poverty, ignorance. They tell us of the 500,000,000 Chinese, of the famines that carry off millions, of frightful infant mortality, of illiteracy as high as 98 per cent, of a destitution that has no parallel on earth except in other subjected Asiatic lands such as India and Indo-China.

But pure theory like this comes up against many practical facts and is no more sound than are the arguments of automobile firms who see no reason why each Chinese family should not have an automobile. Believing in and working for birth control as I do in China, still I oppose birth-control advocates such as these. There has come ■ time in China, as in all Asia, when birth control, unless preceded and linked with ■ social revolutionary program, is reactionary and counter-revolutionary. For many of these Chinese birth-control advocates today see in birth control ■ barricade against revolution—a mirage to deceive the masses or a new way of controlling them.

Let us take a few social facts, in the light of which we can and must consider the theory of birth control as a solution for China's problems, a consideration of which is absolutely essential. I personally have been much among the Chinese peasants, in the northern, central, and southern parts of the country—and the peasants constitute from 80 to 90 per cent of the Chinese population. Nothing on earth can describe their poverty. In the south it is doubtful if most of them have ever possessed ■ pair of simple Chinese shoes. Everywhere their huts are bare of everything except the most naked means of the most naked existence. If tenants, they must share 50 per cent of their crops with the landlord, and sometimes more. If owners of ■ tiny bit of land, they are periodically stripped of all excess worldly goods by government taxes and by the never-ending requisitions of the militarists. In some places as many as sixty different taxes are imposed upon them, and in still other places these taxes have been collected "in advance" up to 1939. What amounts to actual serfdom exists in many places in China, some of them within a few hours of Shanghai. When Chiang Kai-shek or any other militarist needs beasts of burden to carry military supplies to the front or to dig trenches under a hail of machine-gun fire from a rival general, he captures peasants and workers in the villages and cities, binds them together by the arms or the neck with ropes, and marches them off, to receive a bowl of rice a day and to be left behind wherever they happen to fall. Except in the Soviet territories of China, where the peasants have guns in their hands and have their own red army, the Chinese peasants are utterly defenseless. In other places they are stripped so naked of every reserve in food and money that the slightest dislocation—a drought, a flood, a locust cloud, or a new civil war—results in wholesale deaths.

There is a certain broad historical social tendency in China which must form the background of all our considerations of any problem or any movement. All kinds of studies already made show that the tendency is for the landowning peasant to become a tenant via the route of usury. To meet his obligations or the needs of life he borrows from the landlord, who is landlord, money-lender, government official, and business man, all in one. Paying as high as 35 per cent interest on money, the peasant loses his land to the landlord-usurer and becomes a tenant; then the tendency is to further bankruptcy and dispossession. He becomes a land laborer; he goes himself or sends some of his sons into the army to earn their bowl of rice; or sends them drifting to the city to seek work in factories or as wharf or rikisha coolies. If he remains on the land, he has a number of courses open to him: serfdom, to be a victim of famine when famine strikes his land, or banditry—or, if he is class-conscious and militant and is in a district where these things count, he can join the Soviet forces and fight for a new social order. This is the social background. In the seats of government in China sit men who are landlords, business men, bankers, militarists, and foreign imperialists, all intensifying this social process, all considering the peasants as a dangerous element to be exterminated when they attempt to defend themselves.

Within the cities the conditions are no better. Because of China's subject position, Chinese industries do not develop quickly enough to absorb the bankrupt peasants that press upon the city. The factory workers are not yet entirely weaned from the land. The militant labor movement that developed down to 1927 has been almost crushed by the government during the past five years, and thousands of militant workers have been shot, beheaded, or strangled to death. Shanghai, the center of combined foreign and Chinese capitalism, with a gangster organization sharing control of the labor movement with the Kuomintang, has been one of the centers of this terror. Unemployment and the pressing body of bankrupt peasants looking for work, combined with the onslaughts of the ruling classes, have kept the conditions of life of the industrial worker at a very low level. Shanghai is a city of primitive, dangerous mat huts and of jammed, dangerous tenements in which workers crowd like flies, a whole family sharing a tiny room, and perhaps a whole family of father, mother, and three or four little children all working but earning hardly enough to keep life in their bodies. The cruel feudal mentality of the Chinese ruling class has been reinforced by the mentality and methods of American-educated men who admire American capitalist methods. Only counter-revolutionary organizations like the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. or superstitious religions like Christianity could openly work among the laborers.

■ Miss Smedley's article arrived too late for The Nation's birth control issue, for which it was intended. We print it now as ■ interesting commentary on the situation at Shanghai.—EDITOR THE NATION.

It is just these organizations, just such individuals, who have advocated birth control as the solution for China's problems or who have drawn up paper factory laws which are not to be applied in any particular. Why? Because behind such programs, such methods, lies the attempt to deceive the masses and stave off the revolution. These people advocate everything on earth to keep the workers from seeking a fundamental solution for their desperate situation. Any old thing goes to keep the present system on its rotten legs. I have talked with all shades of birth-control advocates in China. One Christian woman spoke of birth control as an "approach" to the workers, to be followed by suitable Christian doctrine. Others, aping the Pope and certain American reactionaries, consider birth control a sin—that is, unless the "better classes" use it in secret. One Chinese woman physician told me that she would not give birth-control knowledge to a woman unless she had first investigated her home life to learn if she was married or unmarried, if she was moral or immoral, if she had children or too few children. Whatever the argument has seemed to be, it has always been basically the fear of the Chinese people felt by the ruling classes, and an attempt to keep them under control.

The experiences in actual birth-control work in China have been far from encouraging, although they are at least socially enlightening. From everything I have observed and learned among the peasants, birth control among them is absolutely impossible today. If you asked a peasant in China to spend five dollars for contraceptives, he would consider you utterly insane. And you would be insane indeed. For they do not even have enough food, and their very right to existence depends upon the will of the landlord, official, militarist, capitalist. Furthermore, they cannot read. But they can, without reading, see that the landlord, the official, the militarist live in fine houses, give banquets that cost more than they can earn in a lifetime, wear silk gowns, and send their children to expensive educational institutions at home and abroad.

As for the city workers: in one small Shanghai clinic in a factory district, where birth control has been tried, we have spent within six months the sum of two hundred American dollars, and received free contraceptive supplies from America that must have cost four or five hundred gold dollars. With this outlay we have supplied contraceptive information and supplies to about two dozen women only!

Yet there are 800,000 workers in Shanghai, of whom at least one-third are women. In other words, China's poverty is a very, very expensive thing—too expensive to be cured by such means as this.

There is, however, one field for birth-control work in China: that is, among the upper, middle, and lower-middle classes. The women of these classes suffer (as do all others) from what women abroad suffer—never-ending fear of pregnancy, physical exhaustion due to too frequent pregnancy or childbirth, abortions caused by the widespread use of old Chinese medicines, and husbands who seek other women outside the home. The women of these classes can read, and they have enough money to buy the necessary contraceptives. All they desire is the knowledge of the best methods. There is no law against giving birth-control information. With such women there is a big field for the spread of birth-control literature.

But while these classes are important, they constitute an infinitesimal fraction of the Chinese people. For the poverty-ridden workers and peasants of China, or 95 per cent of the people, birth control can solve nothing in the present stage of development. To say anything else would be to lie. The Chinese masses will have first to establish the right to existence before they can claim the right to knowledge. Birth control in China, apart from the revolution, is meaningless, reactionary, and nothing but a deceptive theory in the hands of the ruling classes. With a fundamental revolutionary society and government, birth control would be one of the great forces of advancement and of freedom for women.

East St. Louis Studies Americanism

By C. R. F. SMITH

DURING the past several weeks, East St. Louis, Illinois, has been having a little lesson in Americanism—considering the best rather than the worst connotation of that much-abused word. Scarcely two months ago, if a man of Communist leanings wished to get together with a few friends of like mind, he found it desirable to meet with them quietly in some out-of-the-way corner of the city, and even then he was taking at least his freedom in his hands. Today, when he wishes to engage in a little discussion of the same subject, he may gather openly with his friends in the respectable Trades Council Hall. Thanks to the activities of the St. Louis Civil Liberties Committee, an enlightened press, an aroused public, and a straight-talking circuit judge, the East St. Louis police are now following a more liberal interpretation of the constitutional right of their fellow-citizens peaceably to assemble.

When City Judge Borders, on January 22, dismissed the case against Ray Wycoff, twenty-seven-year-old resident of East St. Louis, who was arrested by police after they had broken up a street meeting last August, the judge cleaned the slate of a series of cases arising out of police interference with alleged Communist meetings in the community. Wycoff had been arrested on a charge of disturbing the peace, because he was reported to have said, as the police were retiring from the scene of their little performance: "Go to hell, you flat-footed cop." Obviously, Wycoff's remark could hardly be classified as expedient just at the moment, but the police felt even more strongly about the matter. Louis Martin Wolf, representing the St. Louis Civil Liberties Committee, came to the rescue as defense counsel, and Wycoff was released on appeal bond. Judge Borders was not so sure that anyone's peace had been disturbed, unless it was the police officer's, and as there was no evidence as to the condition of the officer's feet—they might have been quite flat—the judge settled the matter quickly by taking it out of the hands of the jury, dismissing the case, and discharging the defendant.

But Wycoff's case was an anti-climax. The event which turned the spotlight on the status of constitutional liberty in East St. Louis had occurred on the evening of December 11, when a large force of East St. Louis police and detectives, led by Chief of Police Leahy without a warrant, raided a private residence, confiscated papers, and arrested sixteen persons—four Negro men, five Negro women, and seven white men—whom the police suspected of holding a Communist meeting. The raid was summarized briefly and evaluated succinctly in the following editorial, which appeared a few days later in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, after the facts had had a chance to crystallize:

NOTES ON A RAID

A raid by a squad of East St. Louis police last Friday evening on a residence where a meeting of alleged Communists was being held suggests the following points:

1. It shattered the First Amendment to the Constitution, guaranteeing citizens the right peaceably to assemble.
2. Conducted without a search warrant, it violated the Fourth Amendment, guaranteeing the right of citizens to be secure in their homes against unreasonable searches and seizures.

3. It was brutally conducted. The police rushed into the house firing off tear-gas shells as if they had come upon a nest of dangerous criminals.

4. It was terribly bungled. One police officer was struck in the face with a wad from a shotgun and, with two others, suffered from the gas. Another fell dead, presumably from heart disease.

5. Three of the raiding police figured in the famous police-blotter alibi of the Shelton brothers at their trial for the Kincaid bank robbery in 1926, which was denounced as a fake by the State's Attorney. Police who go to the bat for gangsters can hardly be depended upon to respect the constitutional rights of citizens.

Being unlawful, stupid, and tragic, the raid runs the entire gamut. It sets a record.

Let it not be thought, however, that the East St. Louis police were without defenders. The Cahokia Mound Chapter (Cahokia Mound, Illinois,) of the Daughters of the American Revolution rose nobly to the occasion and sent a letter of commendation to Chief of Police Leahy. "Your fearless raid on Communists with the successful arrest of leaders," the letter said, "was very gratifying to the Cahokia Mound Chapter, D. A. R. The full support of the Cahokia Mound Chapter in wiping out communism is thoroughly yours."

In the justice-court trial which followed the raid, the defendants were charged with vagrancy. D. J. Bental of Chicago, representing the International Labor Defense, the chief defense lawyer, attempted to show that the raid was illegal, since the meeting was held in a private house and the raid was made without a warrant. Bental asked one of the policemen who participated in the raid if he had a warrant.

"I didn't need a warrant," the policeman replied.

"Why?" Bental asked.

The Assistant State's Attorney then objected to the questioning of the defense "on the ground that it is argumentative, silly, and asinine." The objection was sustained.

Justice of the Peace J. C. Brady sentenced N. P. Logue, one of the defendants, to sixty days in jail on a charge of vagrancy, in spite of Logue's testimony that he had been a resident of East St. Louis for thirty-four years, that he had worked as a steamfitter since 1920, that he was a union member, and that he was employed both at the time of the raid and the day before the trial. Three defendants accepted pleas of guilty and were sentenced to six months in jail, but their sentences were stayed on their promises to keep away from Communist meetings. The cases against the other defendants were continued and later dismissed.

During Logue's trial one Morris Charney was arrested on charges of inciting to riot. The officer who dragged him from the courtroom reported that he had overheard Charney make a derogatory comment on the proceeding. Bond was set at $5,000, in default of which Charney was then held in jail.

Attorney Wolf, of the St. Louis Civil Liberties Committee, representing Logue and Charney, asked for writs of habeas corpus. As a result of this action, the climax came on January 8 in circuit court at Belleville, Illinois, when Circuit Judge Henry G. Miller granted the writs of habeas corpus and delivered a strong indictment of police methods in handling the whole affair.

The arrest of these men [declared the judge] comprises the most dastardly act ever perpetrated by the East St. Louis police department. I happened to be on the streets of East St. Louis at the time of the Logue trial. I noticed that the police department had every man they could summon in the middle of Main Street in front of the court where the trial was being held. They were armed with every type of weapon they had at their disposal, acting as if the world was about to be plunged into a riot.

With Justice Brandeis of the Supreme Court I say that we Americans have more to fear from lawless acts of law officers than from others who may be planning cursory acts with the purpose of executing them.

Such action on the part of the East St. Louis police department makes this a time for strong language. The arrest of these men was contradictory to the traditions of the American Constitution. I know of no occasion when police may invade a home to get they know not whom, guessing at the reason for which they will make the arrest. It is conceded that there were no warrants on which to make the raid.

Peace reigns again in East St. Louis as the mantle of constitutional liberty now rests gracefully on its shoulders. And across the bridge, on the Missouri side, residents of St. Louis who wish to discuss communism may attend a series of weekly open forums which are being held in one of the branch libraries under the auspices of the Communist League of America, announcement of which series appeared openly in the St. Louis Star on January 8, 1932.

In the Driftway

NOT for a long time has the Drifter felt like writing a diatribe. Indeed, looking up the word in the dictionary, he finds that it means "an acrimonious or invective harangue; a strain of abusive or railing language; a philippic," and it sounds very tiring. But lately, when he was dutifully occupied with thoughts of George Washington, he chanced to see a picture of Washington's face cut on Lookout Mountain, and the sight of it almost made him equal to a diatribe in all its various meanings. It seems an inoffensive enough mountain, and why the face of it should be scarred and pitted into the supposed likeness of a long-suffering great man, the Drifter cannot for the life of him see. Nor will the rocks be adorned only with the Father of His Country; General Lee will be there and his horse Traveler, and no doubt General Grant and Cal Coolidge and Herbert Hoover, and their various mounts, and perhaps the yacht Mayflower, and President Harding's little green house on K Street, and the Senate Office Building, and maybe even a couple of Senators themselves. Once the mania for monuments has seized the mind of man, there is no telling where it will stop. The Drifter would like hastily to say that he means no discourtesy to his friend Gutzon Borglum, the sculptor whose chisels are cutting the mountain's face. Poor Mr. Borglum is a worker like the Drifter or any of his readers, and since he cuts stone for a living, he must needs cut it where the orders lie. But if the monument makers would like to see a mountain carved cunningly in the likeness of the human physiognomy, let them look at Smugglers Notch in Vermont; and if they would like to see a good portrait of General Washington, let them consult the numerous Gilbert Stuarts in various parts of the country. And let it go at that.

• • • • •

WHILE he is diatribing, the Drifter may as well mention the matter of putting monuments in public parks. It is now planned to place the replica of Mount Vernon in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, and the replica of some other famous Washington building—probably the one-hundred-and-ninetieth Washington's headquarters—in poor old Bryant Park, New York. It is not enough that Bryant Park should have been visited with a subway excavation for more months than one can remember. It must now suffer from a replica. And Prospect Park, a really lovely green oasis in a desert of brick and wood and stone, must include part of the desert itself, a small Mount Vernon for its grass seekers to trip over.

• • • • •

WHENEVER the Drifter thinks of city parks he thinks of London's green and pleasant squares, set unexpectedly and frequently all about the city. Plane trees grow in them but no replicas. They are not strange to grass—real grass, not the synthetic rubber product that we were lately threatened with, and not hard-packed earth with a spear or two of muddy brown now and then. The Drifter wishes that the habit of green squares could take American cities. Meanwhile, he has a suggestion for the monument makers. Let them carve General Washington on the real

Mount Vernon; or let them, now that Lookout Mountain is so completely given over to the monumentists, place all the replicas on the top of the rocky cliff and give them a gentle push. They will then slide disastrously down to the bottom, erasing, as they slide, the General, his horse, his aides de camp, and all the rest. The sculptor could be rewarded with a handsome pension; the monumentists could exile themselves to Berlin's Tiergarten; and everybody else would find himself greatly relieved and infinitely happier, particularly

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Mr. Buell Disagrees

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial No War with Japan in the issue of March 2 is an example of the flabby logic which at one time was the monopoly of the perverted nationalist. You do not seem to be disturbed by the fact that a war is already in existence which is bringing misery to thousands of people. To be true to its humanitarian principles and to enlightened self-interest, The Nation should support a program "to stop war" no matter where it is found.

Yet in the same editorial protesting against war you state: "It is hardly to be supposed that Washington would sit idly by while the Japanese" tread upon the "sacred principle" of the Open Door in China. Does not such a sentence invite Washington to mobilize its forces against Japan? The dangers of this policy of threats which The Nation thus paradoxically supports can be averted only if the United States fully co-operates with the League of Nations in carrying out Article 16 of the Covenant. It is inconceivable that Japan, which already has its hands full in China, would on account of an international boycott declare war upon the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy. Already the world-wide discussion stimulated by the Lowell-Baker boycott petition has profoundly affected Japanese leaders, who had remained indifferent to "moral suasion." If the nations of the world stand together in preventing the Japanese military machine from scrapping the Washington treaties, the anti-war pact, and the League Covenant, they will deal a vital blow to the institution of war and create an atmosphere which should immeasurably facilitate the solution of the reparation, disarmament, and other acute problems confronting the world. On the contrary, if these nations follow the advice of your editorial and cynically trade with the aggressor, the peace institutions built up with so much difficulty during the last twelve years will be destroyed, and all hope for disarmament and security must disappear.

New York, February 29

RAYMOND LESLIE BUELL

Registration of Aliens

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The proposed bills now before the Congress providing for the registration of aliens cannot be defended. They are a step in the direction of bureaucracy and arbitrary power. In the discussion of these bills there will be an attempt made to confuse the issue and to raise the question whether the saturation-point for immigrants has been reached. Obviously these bills have no relation to the problem of a future immigration policy. Arguments will be made by those who believe that our immigration policy in the past has been too lenient, and they will contend that these registration bills are a means of curing what they consider to have been a mistaken policy in the past. It requires no argument to show that this position is both illogical and unfair. It does not require the services of a seer to predict that the aliens who have entered this country illegally are not going to register and subject themselves to immediate deportation. The proposed bills will not accomplish what they intend to accomplish, but they will be very effective in subjecting law-abiding, legally admitted aliens to constant espionage, intimidation, blackmail, and extortion, and will furnish bigoted employers and their hired gunmen an admirable weapon in times of labor disturbance. As a result of the war psychosis, which still continues, we have already had too much intolerance and too great an infringement of personal liberty. There is no compelling need for such legislation at the present time.

Lexington, Ky., February 10 FORREST REVERE BLACK

Our Trained Reserves

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation for February 3 there appears an interesting article on the present Geneva conference. Mr. Wainhouse mentions that the United States possesses the professional type of military personnel while France, Japan, and other countries have conscript armies. His articles, including the one appearing February 10, would lead one to believe that the systems of military preparedness in our country and France are so different that establishing limitations on trained reserves would only affect the latter nation. However, our National Guard and our Reserve Officers constitute a trained reserve in this country, and there should be some basis for regulating the whole system of trained reserves if adequate precautions against military competition are to be taken.

Whether a nation has a conscript army or depends on draft legislation and trained officers, the problem is practically the same. Until trained reserves of all the great Powers are adequately controlled by international agreement, military competition will continue. To ignore these matters and confine ourselves to limitations of regular standing armies, which probably will be the result of the Geneva conference, will mean an avoidance of national problems at the expense of international safety.

Austin, Tex., February 9

ROLLAND BRADLEY

From the Gayety Theater

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Being a constant reader of The Nation I was very much surprised to read in your issue of February 10 the article headed Minneapolis Morals. I am herewith inclosing a copy of the letter sent to Mr. Sime Silverman, editor of Variety, which is self-explanatory.

MY DEAR MR. SILVERMAN: You can well imagine my consternation and surprise when, six weeks after the dismissal of our men's chorus, I noticed and read on the front page of Variety the following: "As runway attractions the masculine group failed to lure sufficient feminine trade to warrant retention despite the free exposure of manly figures up and down the orchestra gangplank."

Now, Mr. Silverman, we have no runway or orchestra gangplank in this theater, nor has there been one here for five years. Then this article, written by your correspondent, whom we have not seen in this theater to witness a single performance in the eight years that I have known him, further states that the police had okayed stripping with the use of a dark spotlight. Now while this may not sound so bad in Variety when read by show people, it sounds very different when a magazine like

The Nation in its February 10 edition reprints in full the article from your magazine under the caption Minneapolis Morals, and is read by local residents of this city who do not know what kind of shows we are giving and also by city officials; it is bound to blot into oblivion all the care and watchfulness that we have bestowed on our shows, so as to meet with the requirements and approval of our city officials, and to cause them to lose the confidence they have displayed in us by allowing us to operate, as well as placing in jeopardy the means of earning a livelihood for the people we have working here, in the event that this article is taken for granted to be the true facts by the authorities.

I am writing this to you only to acquaint you with the injustice done us, and to your paper, by your correspondent, for reasons which I am at a loss to understand.

Minneapolis, February 9

HARRY HIRSH

Better Movies

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A small group is interested in forming a permanent society in New York City to show, once a month, the best American and foreign films. The aims of the society would be the revival of important films of the past, the presentation of new films which cannot be seen elsewhere, and the formation of a permanent film library. Will all persons interested communicate with the undersigned at 102 East Twenty-second Street, New York City.

New York, February 2

KENNETH WHITE

For Readers in Florida

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your Florida readers will be interested to know that a group is forming in Central Florida for the purpose of organizing a third political party to cooperate with the League for Independent Political Action. Communications may be addressed to 200 West Gore Avenue, Orlando.

Orlando, Fla., February 24

J. C. HOWELL

Contributors to This Issue

GERALD W. JOHNSON is on the editorial staff of the Baltimore Evening Sun.

JAMES RORTY is author of a book of poems, "Children of the Sun," and is preparing a book on advertising.

AGNES SMEDLEY, author of "Daughter of Earth," has lived in China for many years.

C. R. F. SMITH is connected with the Citizens' Committee on Relief and Employment in St. Louis.

LYNN RIGGS is the author of a volume of poems, "The Iron Dish."

YOUNGHILL KANG, a Korean student of the literature and philosophy of the Orient, and a member of the department of English of New York University, has written the story of his life in "The Grass Roof."

ROBERT CANTWELL is author of "Laugh and Lie Down."

BENJAMIN GINZBURG is author of "The Adventure of Science."

CUTHBERT WRIGHT is author of "The Story of the Catholic Church."

PETER MUNCH is Denmark's Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Finance

Clipping the Bears' Claws

IF selling stocks short has been a factor in depressing security values, we should soon be enjoying a lively boom on the Stock Exchange, which has taken steps to make this speculative operation more difficult and probably more hazardous and costly. Hitherto, brokerage-house customers have as a rule merely given a blanket permission to the broker, as part of the usual form of agreement on opening an account, to lend their stocks. Many customers have probably never read this agreement, or understood its real meaning. But in the future the broker must obtain his clients' signatures on a separate document, permitting stocks held in margin accounts to be lent to short sellers, and the Exchange hints that it may from time to time require its members to remind customers that they have the right to rescind the authorization previously given.

Bear traders, on the publication of this news, rushed pell-mell to cover their commitments, for if they cannot borrow stocks they cannot do business. In the scramble they almost sent average prices to new high records for the year, but the flurry was over in an hour and prices sank heavily toward lower levels. The bulls, apparently, were not convinced that the shackling of the bears had removed the last obstacle to a sweeping advance in prices. To the longer heads in Wall Street, at least, this doubt seems well founded. For the philosophy which assumes that short selling forces prices to unwarranted low levels is a curious one. It is based on the assumption that a number of astute, bold, and financially powerful men exist who are capable of driving prices below intrinsic values, but that there does not exist any group of astute, bold, and financially powerful men ready to pick up the bargains thus created.

Statistics notoriously can be made to prove anything, so it will not do to rely on them too heavily in examining the effect of short sales on prices. Yet the figures in the case are at least entitled to the weight of circumstantial evidence. Last May 25 the total short interest on the New York Stock Exchange was officially reported as 5,589,700 shares, and the average price index of the Standard Statistics Company stood at 106.4. By the end of the year the outstanding short account had practically been cut in half and amounted to 2,842,072 shares, but along with this reduction the price index had fallen to 64.5. It may legitimately be argued, from that record, that the buying in of shorts does not provide a cushion for falling prices, if outside conditions are such as to produce a decline; but it certainly cannot be argued that short selling provoked the decline, for short sales were curtailed on balance.

But during the period cited, outside conditions were obviously unfavorable, including the credit collapse of Central Europe and the fall of England from the gold standard. A shorter interval ought to furnish a better criterion. Does it? Between December 10 and December 31 there was a reduction of 925,164 shares in the outstanding short interest—in other words, a net covering of shorts; yet the price index declined 3.6 points. During January there was an increase of 758,193 shares in the short account, and the price index ended the month substantially where it began.

Justification for altering the established procedure, here as in other directions, is cited in the alleged abnormal and temporary condition in which we find ourselves. But to the extent that precedent is lacking, the changes made ought to be supported by a strong basis of probable benefit. Even well-meant errors must be eventually paid for.

S. PALMER HARMAN

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

RUSSIAN TRAVEL MADE EASY

In visiting Russia, you want to travel as widely as you can, gain as many first hand impressions as you can, and know what your expenses will be. The Open Road has devoted five years to perfecting its organization in the U. S. S. R. Open Road representatives in Moscow and Leningrad know the travel facilities of the country, and the things worth seeing. They save you time and money. They help you to see what interests you most.

When inquiring for rates, please indicate whether you prefer to travel alone or in one of many specially constituted Open Road groups. Also, state what phase of Russian life interests you most. Round trip rates as low as $238.

The OPEN ROAD

Salmon Tower, 11 West 42nd Street, New York City

Cooperating in U. S. S. R. with INTOURIST

The Greatest TRAVEL VALUE

30 DAYS of delightful travel
$202.00

Tour to RUSSIA

Includes; Ocean passage in Modern Third Class, TOURIST CLASS SECTION, fare to Russia via England or Germany and Finland, hotels and meals en route to Russia and during 7 DAYS IN LENINGRAD AND MOSCOW, with sightseeing, entertainment, conductor's and interpreter's services, visas, etc.

Witness the enormous
MAY DAY CELEBRATIONS
in Moscow on May 1st

A variety of trips at surprisingly low rates offered in our booklet "N"

RETURN PASSAGE FROM GERMAN OR FRENCH
PORT INCLUDED.

AMALGAMATED BANK

11-15 Union Square

New York City

FRENCH BYWAYS AUTOMOBILE TOUR—Sailing S. S. Champlain, June 30th, returning Lafayette, August 29th. Circular routing of 5 weeks, in unexplored French wonderlands—week in Brittany, visits to Loire and Dordogne Chateaux, hill towns of Burgundy and through the Pyrenees, Cevennes and Alps. Conducted under expert leadership of college professor. Cost $915, or $815 with tourist steamer accommodations. Write Frederick Lack Travel Service, Empire State Bldg., N. Y.

Books, Architecture, Drama

The Harbor

By LYNN RIGGS

To come upon such quiet in a town
With amber ropes and earthy nets to dry,
The sun ■ torrid bloom against the eye,
And mirrored boats with orange sails thrown down—
Is to be chastened by the miracle
Of earth and sun and man and moving seas
Caught in a crystal momentary peace
Still as ■ rock, eloquent as a bell.

Along a water that is ironed of motion,
Thus, disbelieving, we must stand and stare:
A glassy well forsaken of commotion
May cup and hold such latitudes of air
And sun and silence and a shining ocean
And men at work as if they knelt at prayer.

Liberalism and Economics

Essays in Persuasion. By John Maynard Keynes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

MR. KEYNES has collected here what he calls "the croakings of twelve years—the croakings of a Cassandra who could never influence the course of events in time." The volume includes what he believes to be at present most relevant and interesting in his writings on the peace treaty, on inflation and deflation, on the gold standard, on Russia, on liberalism, and on the future; it reveals both his detailed proposals for dealing with various post-war crises and circumstances and his general economic and political philosophy. The collection is surely an impressive one. Mr. Keynes has good reason to be proud of the astonishing accuracy of most of his predictions. This accuracy is not the result of good luck; it is the result of a brilliant understanding both of economic "principles" in the narrow sense and of political and mass-psychological forces. The analysis, for example, made in 1919, of Germany's ability to pay reparations, which seemed to most readers at the time to place that ability at an almost ridiculously low figure, reads in the light of events merely like a calm statement of the incontrovertible; it could still be read with great profit by anyone who still believes that Germany has been deliberately "welching." And Mr. Keynes's predictions before 1925 of what would probably happen if England returned to the gold standard at the old parity have likewise been very closely fulfilled.

But one must still quarrel with Mr. Keynes, and that quarrel must be based not on any minor issue, but on the one issue with which his name in recent years has been most closely associated—the abandonment of the gold standard for what he is pleased to call a "managed" currency. It is one thing to decide whether and under what circumstances and to what extent a currency ought to be devaluated in terms of gold; it is quite another to propose permanently cutting loose from the gold anchor altogether. It is not possible here to do more than indicate Mr. Keynes's principal fallacies and misconceptions on this point. He is an adherent of the quantity theory of money, apparently in its strictest form. He believes, that is, that the price level in any given country varies directly and precisely with the quantity of money in circulation (including under "money" total bank deposits, and not forgetting "velocity of circulation"). Now if this view were correct, it would obviously make no real difference whether the money in question were redeemable in gold, or merely in an equal weight of silver, lead, or tinfoil, or whether it were not redeemable in anything at all. The only question of importance would be the regulation of its quantity. And Mr. Keynes writes, most of the time, as if this were true. He writes also as if it would be extremely simple for ■ central bank or board of control to regulate the quantity of money and credit, merely by raising or lowering the discount rate to the right amount and at the right time, or by some other minor adjustment. But experience shows that while it is always possible to discourage the expansion or bring about a contraction of the volume of credit by raising the discount rate high enough, it is impossible to know under any given circumstances by precisely how much a rise in the discount rate will affect the volume of credit. As for lowering the discount rate, such ■ move may not, at a time of depression, affect the volume of credit at all.

One need not press these considerations, because Mr. Keynes's own argument is far from consistent. Though he calls the gold standard "already ■ barbarous relic," though he was jubilant last September at the breaking of England's "gold fetters," though he has only sarcasm and derision for those who have anything good to say for the gold standard, yet, in the section of the present volume on Positive Suggestions for the Future Regulation of Money, which he tells us in his preface represents his own present scheme for dealing with the currency problem, he actually puts forward ■ plan closely resembling Irving Fisher's "compensated dollar" (less clear-cut than that, but quite as unworkable), and ends by keeping gold as "an ultimate safeguard and as a reserve for sudden requirements," on the ground that "no superior medium is yet available." All that this means, I think, is that Mr. Keynes wants to eat his cake and have it too. He wants to be both off the gold standard and on it. He wants the privilege of thumbing his nose at it most of the time, and running to it in emergencies. This is what he calls a "scientific" currency scheme. (To avoid misunderstanding, perhaps I ought to remark that I agree with Mr. Keynes that the gold standard works in some respects rather badly, and that I do not expect it to last for ever and ever. But it is so immensely superior to any "management" scheme so far suggested to take its place that it would seem to me disastrous to abandon it now.)

One does not like to end, however, with such a criticism when writing about an author who says so many admirable things and says them so admirably. I prefer to quote a few sentences from the political section of the present volume which ought to give pause to some of those liberals who are now hurling themselves so recklessly into the arms of the Communists. Mr. Keynes believes that the political problem of mankind is to combine three things: economic efficiency, social justice, and individual liberty. "The first needs criticism, precaution, and technical knowledge; the second, an unselfish and enthusiastic spirit which loves the ordinary man; the third, tolerance of variety and independence, which prefers, above everything, to give unhindered opportunity to the exceptional and to the aspiring." Communism helps to secure social justice, but at the sacrifice of economic efficiency and particularly of individual liberty. Only a new liberalism, free from the dogmas of nineteenth-century liberalism and adjusted to contemporary facts, seems likely to secure all three.

On the economic side I cannot perceive that Russian communism has made any contribution to our economic problems of intellectual interest or scientific value. I do not think that it contains, or is likely to contain, any piece of useful economic technique which we could not apply, if we chose, with equal or greater success in a society which retained all the marks, I will not say of nineteenth-century individualistic capitalism, but of British bourgeois ideals. Theoretically at least, I do not believe that there is any economic improvement for which revolution is a necessary instrument. . . . How can I accept a doctrine which sets up as its bible, above and beyond criticism, an obsolete economic textbook which I know to be not only scientifically erroneous but without interest or application for the modern world?

HENRY HAZLITT

The Awakening East

The Challenge of the East. By Sherwood Eddy. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

Japan. By Inazo Nitobe. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

Western Influences in Modern Japan. By Inazo Nitobe and Twenty Others. University of Chicago Press. $4.

Far Eastern International Relations. By H. B. Morse and H. F. MacNair. Houghton Mifflin Company. $6.

Rural Education for the Regeneration of Korea. By Helen Kim. New York: 150 Fifth Ave. $1.50.

LOOK at the map of Asia. You will find the large country of China in the most chaotic and complicated unrest, one-fourth of the human race undergoing a revolution toward a new order and unity. This revolution has many folds, social, political, industrial, intellectual. You will find Japan, rapidly modernizing, becoming one of the six most powerful nations of the world, beginning to stand out as the most imperialistic. Her policies of conquest in the southwestern Pacific, including Formosa, the Dutch East Indies, the Philippines, and islands below the equator, are only partially completed, owing to Western possessions, but her other ambition, that of dominating the eastern part of the Asiatic mainland, with control over Korea, Manchuria, Mongolia, and the important parts of China, we see in process of accomplishment. On the map you will find Korea, where peaceful revolution against Japan has been going on since 1919, where the inhabitants say they will never give up until they reach once more the goal of liberty. You will find India, also in a non-violent revolution under the leadership of Gandhi—Gandhi, "sitting cross-legged upon the floor in the posture of Buddha, turning his spinning-wheel, a wheel of fate, of freedom for one-fifth of the human race." The Philippines are here, too, clamoring that they are ripe for their independence and claiming that they would have been better off if the Americans had never gone in. An era of rapid progress is inaugurated in Turkey, and in Palestine there is a movement for a rebirth of Jewish culture.

All this constitutes what Dr. Eddy calls "The Challenge of the East." He has traveled widely in these several countries and has interviewed their leaders. Thus he has gathered much first-hand information, although his views tend to satisfy neither the conquerors nor the conquered. But his ideas are fair and moderate, and would give the layman some conception of the outstanding events in these seething Eastern countries. Dr. Helen Kim's valuable formula for rural education in Korea might be used to supplement Dr. Eddy's chapter on the Korean renaissance through education.

In "Japan" Dr. Nitobe, well known to the West, gives the brief historical background of his subject, then devotes most of his pages to the modern Japan of the last sixty years. He analyzes Japanese government, politics, educational problems, labor, food, and population with comparative comments. Dr.

Nitobe is well versed in both Japanese and Western politics, having spent many years in Geneva, where he was a keen student of international affairs, yet he has always retained to the full his national personality. All that he says in this book is typically Japanese in outlook, even when he makes comparative remarks. For this very reason the book is important in helping the reader to understand the Japanese point of view, in which "knowledge is not to be sought for its own sake, but for a patriotic purpose." Now that Japan with her imperialistic program shares honors with Russia and her Communist experiment as one of the two most-talked-of nations of the world, it is important to understand the Japanese samurai, a "patriot to the core."

"Western Influences in Modern Japan" is a collection of articles in the form of a symposium. Like many another symposium the result is very unsuccessful. Yet here are a number of articles with excellent ideas—for instance, Politics in Japan and Two Exotic Currents. On the whole, however, this book is poor, particularly in arrangement and in style. As to the latter, all, perhaps, could be excused except the chapter on English Literature in Japan, which was written by a professor of English literature in Tokio University. This collection, assembled by Dr. Nitobe, however unsatisfactory, has at least the advantage of being written by the Japanese about their own country and from their own viewpoint.

"Far Eastern International Relations" gives a brief summary of conditions and incidents in the relationship of Western nations in the Far East, but more particularly of Eastern nations among themselves. While it is dull reading, it may give the student of international affairs an idea of the subject. Though none of these books touches the present conflict in Manchuria and Shanghai, any one of them prepares the reader for what is happening, so that he will view the facts with no surprise. Dr. Eddy treats of the great awakening of the Far East in the midst of angry and uncertain currents; Dr. Nitobe treats of Japan's progress and inevitable leadership; Mr. Morse and Mr. MacNair sum up the whole international situation in the Far East; and Miss Kim shows why the Koreans of recent years have moved in such large numbers into Manchuria.

YOUNGHILL KANG

Second Person Singular

Towards a Better Life. By Kenneth Burke. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

WE have had novels written in the first and third person singular often enough in the past—novels in which "I" performed certain actions and made various descriptive and analytical comments upon the actions, explaining them, apologizing for them, or merely describing them. The repetition of this process has had the effect of making literature a humble and shamefaced profession; the artist stands before his audience, explains what has happened and why it is important, draws character sketches of various people, and suggests the relationship between them, and the involved course of coincidences, resentments, and affections that led to the catastrophe. In "Towards a Better Life" Mr. Burke may be said to have written a novel in the second person singular—instead of "I did this" or "he did this" we have the accusing "you did this." Instead of pleading with his audience, Mr. Burke attacks it. Reading "Towards a Better Life" may be likened to overhearing a quarrel in the street. A character named John Neal is addressing someone we do not know, a man he calls Anthony, and we learn of what has happened in the same way that we build up an imaginative preface to a quarrel we overhear; stray clues may guide us, or a mention of some specific incident, but the quarrel is the important matter, not its cause, and in the end each listener's interpretation of the cause will depend upon his own experiences and upon his memories of them.

It is John Neal's emotion that attracts us first, and his wit. He feels that Anthony has wronged him, and he attacks him with a savage sarcasm, making incidental remarks on the implications of some incident that are concise and unexpected. Neal is a brilliant speaker, but his emotion seems to prevent his developing his arguments logically. His moods change rapidly; he remembers various encounters, people they both knew, a suicide, a trip. We learn that Florence, whom he loved, has been Anthony's mistress, and presently we learn that he has found Florence, learned of her disgrace, and sent her away. Another woman, Genevieve, has entered his life, but he has sent her away as well, and quarreled with his friends. Unlike most apologists, Neal seems determined to present himself in as unfavorable a light as possible, and he succeeds. He lies continually; he is pompous and boastful; he paints himself in an attractive light only to confess that he has been lying. Yet when we grow impatient with him, and turn away from his confused troubles, he wins us again with a brilliant phrase, or a flash of pathetic recollection, or a purely lyric flight—for Anthony has disappeared, the "you" has become the reader, or society, or all mankind. And with Anthony's disappearance Neal grows increasingly eloquent; he no longer speaks in confidence, but addresses a multitude, calling upon the outcasts—"Oh, lepers of mankind, gutter rats, printers of the sewers"—and turns upon the prosperous—"the well-fed and well-intrenched, comfortably summoning the people to rebel." He tries to pray but he cannot believe, and in the end his eloquence has exhausted itself; he can only speak in disjointed whispers, telling himself that he is "humbled . . . that silence cannot be advocated silently."

There is no parallel for "Towards a Better Life." In form it resembles the sermon, but based on the authority of observation rather than Scripture. Ideally, the comments should treat of experiences common to everyone, rather than an involved and personal story. It is important in that it seeks to restore the original dignity of learning and art, advocating a militant literature of command rather than the persuasive plucking at the sleeve the novelist has been forced to resort to in his attempt to gain attention.

ROBERT CANTWELL

In the Name of Science

Man Comes of Age. By John Langdon-Davies. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

THE French have a way of characterizing certain discussions as fit only for a public meeting. On the same principle "Man Comes of Age" should be catalogued as a lecture-platform book. It has all the charm and appeal—and all the vices—of the popular lecturer dispensing culture before women's clubs and Chautauqua circuits. And if you like to be titillated with grand phrases—"Science says," "What science means to you"—if you do not want to be provoked to thought but to be encouraged in the prejudices you already have, if you are interested not in intellectual clarity and consistency but in imaginative fireworks and tours de force—then this is a book which you will surely like and enjoy. But if you are at all intelligent and have a genuine respect for the world of thought and the things of the spirit, you will probably be irritated to fury in reading it.

The purpose of the book, as Mr. Langdon-Davies explains in the preface, is to interpret the panorama of science in terms of the daily life and philosophy of the average man—to tell the average man what he may do, what he may believe, and how he may be happy in the light of the discoveries of modern

